the arbitrators awarded 30s. compensation to be paid by Cilimba to Cikoja, less 5s. owing. This money was to be paid to Ayesi in compensation for the loss of her baby. Ayesi, however, refused to accept the money because she said she wanted to have her baby. The matter now became an intra-segment affair and Cikoja, Amidu, Kanyenga and Kaifa (F36), the son of Ayesi, with Bt. Amisa had a meeting on what to do. Ayesi was quite adamant about it. There was nothing to do but to drop the matter, and the state of tension between the segments remained as it was before.

The next incident occurred in 1943. Mpulula, the husband of Bt. Amisa, had some goats. One day two of them strayed on to the verandah of Bt. Madi's hut. Bt. Madi (F10) was the daughter of Asuna (F2) and a member of the senior lineage segment. One of the goats nosed its way into a basket of flour that was lying under the verandah and started to eat it. Bt. Madi came out and picked up a log that was lying nearby and threw it at the goat. It broke the goat's leg and the goat had to be destroyed. The owner, Mpulula, who was watching at that moment immediately rebuked the woman. He went and reported the matter to Cikoja and he sent a message to Mpulula's marriage surety who sent back to say that they would meet at Chiwalo's hut the following morning. The arbitrator in the case finally decided that the correct action should have been to take the goat to the owner and to lay a complaint against him. As it was he had to award compensation of 30s. to be paid to the owner of the goat. Mpulula, however, refused to take the money. He argued that although the goat was his, so was the offender.[1] He said that he was afraid of sorcery so he would take a token amount of 3s. only. Cikoja gave him this.[2]

A few months later the eldest child of Bt. Bwana Isa (F16) suddenly fell ill and died.[3] Kanyenga, Kaifa and Msusa went to the diviner. Kaifa, the son of Ayesi, went as the headman's representative. Kanyenga went as the warden of the sorority-group, i.e. the child's mother's brother. Msusa was the marriage surety of the child's father. Kanyenga consulted the diviner who indicated that Kanyenga's mother Bt. Amisa was responsible but that she was not a sorceress. Sorcery, he said, was introduced by an unknown person who was using Bt. Amisa's grumbling as a screen. Kanyenga refused to accept the finding of the diviner, saying that his mother had never been 'caught'

[1] His wife's collateral sister's child he also calls 'my child'.

[2] Mpulula is a stranger in the village and in this situation Cikoja represents both segments to Mpulula, even though the senior segment is guilty.

[3] Sudden illness, called cikomo or 'the hammer', is believed to be without a doubt due to sorcery.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

village had its regular place of torture and masui drinking, two or three miles from the village. Those used by Malemya, the old Zomba chief, may still be seen. 754

A clear way is made two feet broad and fourteen feet long in the bush and here the accused takes up his position attended on either side by the two pleaders, the defending pleader on the right, the prosecuting on the left. Facing east or west or following the directions originally given by the caster-of-lots, that is, taking up the position in which the accused is supposed to take a midnight bath, or practice some rite under a tree or an ant hill, etc., he is given a decoction of masui to drink from a gourd. This decoction is made on the spot, the bark being pounded up on a stone by one of the prosecutors. The accused must have had no food that day. He then starts to walk up and down the short cleared path with the two men, one on either side of him, the one saying, "Now you have drunk masui, you shall die as you deserve; you did in So-and-So," the other denying the accusations, saying, "He shall vomit the poison." He is watched by the assembled crowd who note the various symptoms of which vomiting is the first and said to be the most characteristic. After this has gone on for some time, they watch for what is called the nyongo which is said to be "a ball of bile formed in the mouth and expelled by vomiting so that it bursts on reaching the ground but not before", followed often by a second ball, twenty minutes later. Should this be expelled, recovery may be expected, foreshadowed by clearing of the vision. If he recovers, he is indeed a wonderful man and is hailed on all sides. The women trill with their tongues and shout, and he is carried back in triumph; the defending pleader will swagger about and demand anything he wants for his client. 695

A fatal termination is characterised by little and non-forcible vomiting. Purging is common but said to be painless. Vision is affected and as time goes on, the spectators ask what he can see, "Do you see that over there?" indicating a hill. If he makes mistakes, then they say, "Ah, he is going to die!"

The poison may not take full effect for three or four hours. The end is ushered in by a last stage when the legs become weak; he staggers, then unable to stand any longer, falls to the ground dead, execrated by the onlookers who rush in and hurl stones upon the body, crushing it. The relatives take the mangled corpse and lay it on logs covered with grass in the bush. No other covering is permitted. It may be placed in a tree by people acting as mole. Burial is forbidden. [766]

In some cases masui used to be burned, not being given the chance of the poison trial. This took place at a recognised spot like ndoso. The last man to be burned by Malemya was Mtulula in 1892. Burning was also a punishment in some bad cases of murder. Such was the fate of Chingale. The man was put in a slave-stick, a pile of logs was built round him and then set on fire. [683]

Witch-finder. In addition to ordeal poison, another method of discovering a masui is by "smelling out." If a number of people have died in a certain village, the inhabitants may begin to think that there is a masui among them, and procure the services of a mbiashila. 754 695 791

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

766 by his relatives. For the feasts during the mourning at a chief's 661 death the food is acquired by institutionalized pillage (cipinimbe). The villagers in a chiefdom are often first informed of the death of a chief by the appearance of men from his village. These men are by custom allowed to take from a village any article of food they can find—flour, a goat, some chickens, prepared relish, or whatever is lying around in the village. The owners of the food may not charge them with theft. This food is used in the funeral feast. The excesses to which the chief's men may go became circumscribed after the White conquest. Previously, almost any crime short of murder could be committed under the guise of cipinimbe. More recently, owing to Government opposition, it has been restricted to the taking of smaller articles of food, such as flour and chickens. Some people are beginning to object even to this. The chief's funeral is a public affair and all his subjects may attend it. The effect of the cipinimbe is to bring together enough food for the chief's funeral feast. Here, as before, the chief's men may not cross the boundary for fear of reprisals, and the effect is to impose a levy in an informal way over most of the villages in the chief's area.

The Chief as a Symbol of Unity

643 The chief is a representative of his people and it is his par-579 ticular duty to ensure their welfare and that of the chiefdom as a whole. His symbolic representation of the unity of his people is brought out clearly by his right to fines in cases involving bloodshed and arson. Strife and division in a chiefdom in the old days were likely to end in spilt blood and burnt huts so that the Yao associate bloodshed and hut-burning with dissension within the chiefdom.

684 Most other offences are against the individual and not the 685 chiefdom as a whole: the case is brought to the chief so that compensation may be awarded. Adultery and theft thus are definitely civil offences. Nowadays, a fine is imposed, but this is seen to be a White innovation, and the money from it is looked upon as 'Boma' money.[1] In disputes where blood has 682 been shed, however, the chief is entitled to fine the guilty party on his own account. The chief is said to be 'blinded' by the 683 blood and a payment must be made to him before he may 'see'

[1] i.e. Government money.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

culties are settled by the marriage sureties [1] who only report to him after the affair is settled. In disputes of unusual gravity, the headman may call in unrelated persons [2] to arbitrate, but he himself must be present.

His own behaviour is expected to be exemplary. Any deviation from the norm is likely to be strictly censured, not only by his own villagers, but also by other village headmen, who may say, 'Important men do not behave in this way.' A man who had an argument with his sister's son was told this. He had taken the dispute to a neighbouring headman who decided against the village headman and rebuked him for behaving in a way not consonant with his position. Village headmen should be above squabbling with their villagers. A village headman who was also a leech had virtually raped a woman whom he was treating. He tried to maintain this was part of the treatment. Her matrilineal relatives reported the matter to the headman of her village and he brought the errant headman in front of the chief who said, 'You are wrong to do this when you are an important man. You are a big man and you act as a commoner does. You ought to be able to show the commoners how to behave.' He was made to pay a compensation of £2 10*s.* and fined 10*s.* Had he been a commoner he would have been made to pay a compensation of only 30*s.*

The ultimate sanction to which all headmen are subject, is that their people will leave them if they behave badly. This was the fate of Cikumba.

In 1944 Cikumba had a village of about 30 huts. The son of the first Cikumba, Meya, had two wives who were living virilocally in Cikumba's village. Meya had enlisted in the army. While he was away, Cikumba, the village headman who was Meya's father's sister's son (though he called him 'father' because of positional succession), started taking Meya's two wives to beer drinks. Meya's sister one day asked Cikumba about his behaviour, but he only said that Meya could not do anything as he was far away. Things had gone too far, however, when one morning he was seen coming out of the

[1] The representative of a spouse in all affairs arising from conjugal relationships. They are usually senior matrilineal relatives. See Chap. VI, pp. 176–7. Their rôle is discussed fully in Marriage among the Machinga Yao of Southern Nyasaland.

[2] Mundu juampambali, i.e. a person from outside.

604 578 Mwanace. He was the junior marriage surety to the marriage and it was his duty to go to the man's marriage surety, report the matter and arrange to take some action to get the man well again. Mwanace, however, refused to take any action. Instead he tauntingly said, 'Take the matter to Ali Kasunka, it is his village.' The woman did so, and Ali Kasunka asked immediately whether she had not taken the matter to Mwanace. She replied that she had and repeated Mwanace's words. Ali Kasunka took the matter up with Mwanace who now objected to being ordered about. Ali Kasunka, however, impressed on Mwanace that the village was his (Ali Kasunka's) and the authority rested with him. He then went to the man's home to tell them of Wayison's illness. The man's representative came and he and Ali Kasunka consulted a diviner. They found that the man was ill from ndaka, which he had contracted in his home village. They found medicine and treated him and he recovered.

604 578 833 787 684 Things came to a head in 1947. Mwanace's younger sister Nyangu II (D11) was married to a soldier who was away. One morning she came to her mother's elder sister, Mbalasyao (C1),[1] and told her that she had found semen on her pudenda and could not recall having had intercourse with anyone. Mbalasyao told Ali Kasunka about this. It was clearly a matter for divination and Ali Kasunka called Mwanace and told him that they ought to consult a diviner. But Mwanace's attitude, even in such a crisis as this, was hostile. He refused and said it was not his work to do this sort of thing. Ali Kasunka therefore went to a diviner with his sister Mbalasyao. The diviner said the semen was Mwanace's. He said that he had entered her hut magically and had sexual intercourse with her without her knowing it.[2] When Ali Kasunka got back to the village he called Mwanace and asked him what tricks he was playing in the village. Mwanace said that he had done nothing—it was not his village. Ali Kasunka then vaguely hinted at his crime. Mwanace pressed for more details and Ali Kasunka accused him outright of sleeping with his sister. He had hardly uttered the accusation before Mwanace had drawn a knife and attacked him. Mwanace was screaming something to the effect that Ali Kasunka had come to him with lies about having seen a diviner. Ali Kasunka beat off the attack and reiterated the accusation. Mwanace now turned his rage upon the woman and tried to catch her. Two of the men in the village then caught Mwanace and subdued

[1] Her mother, Amaliama, was dead.

[2] This is called ciponeceya. It combines the use of magic with sister-incest. [835] To the Yao mind there could be no clearer proof of sorcery. I have already mentioned the importance of sister-incest in relationship to the beliefs surrounding the sorority-group. See p. 146.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

him. The woman in the meantime had run to Chiwalo's hut half a mile away. Here she complained to the chief that Mwanace wanted to kill her. Chiwalo refused to listen to her complaint and sent for Ali Kasunka. When he had come and explained the sequence of events, he continued saying that he would like to take the case to court. Chiwalo, who was Ali Kasunka's wife's father's sister's son (hence a classificatory younger brother) and whose henchman Ali Kasunka was, refused to arbitrate in the case but referred it to Kawinga. On the day of the case the woman's husband came back from the Army. The case was tried and eventually the court assessors awarded a damages claim of £3 to be paid by Mwanace to his sister. The husband, at the same time, said that he could not remain married to her because whenever he saw her he would think that she had slept with her brother and in court he gave Ali Kasunka a marriage termination payment. The tension between Ali Kasunka and his 'sister's son' did not end there however. When they got back to the village Ali Kasunka remonstrated with Mwanace saying, 'Are you not ashamed to have married your sister?' Mwanace said that he could not stand that sort of thing and went back to live uxorilocally.

A crucial point in this case history is that the women did not like Mwanace. Almost certainly there would have been a split in the village had the women had more confidence in Mwanace. The tension between Ali Kasunka and Mwanace, although the conflict is inter-generational, started, as it consistently does, from the relationships of a man to the women of his matrilineage. Without the support of the women, younger brothers or sister's sons are impotent against the power of their senior relatives. It is only when they can induce the women to follow them and to leave their rivals that they can found a new village and thereby begin to earn prestige. Therefore, although the men are the active agents in bringing about a physical act of fission, they are in fact only making manifest a situation which is latent within the lineage.

The position of the senior male matrilineal relative is of fundamental importance in questions involving segmentation. His position is seen most clearly in the dominant matrilineage, in which the name of the village is inherited. The Yao practise 'positional succession'. A man not only succeeds to his mother's brother's name but also to the position of the mother's brother in the social structure as a whole.[1] It follows that when the pregnant, the meeting of the sponsors will have to be postponed until after the ceremony connected with her first quickening with child, Litiuse.[1] This ceremony must be performed whether the girl is regularly married or not. One party cannot ask the other for permission that both ceremonies take place at the same time. The answer would be given, "You are asking me to kill two beasts with one bullet." In rare cases, the chief may sanction the marriage and Litiuse ceremonies taking place at about the same time, i.e. the marriage is arranged before the child is born. 584 843

[1] See Chap. V, p. 121.

Widowhood. A widow is considered unclean for a period after the death of her husband. She wears a band of palm-leaf or string around her forehead. When the period is passed and some man wishes to marry her, arrangement is made with some other man to cohabit with her for payment; she is then said to be clean and can go to her prospective husband. This ceremony is called kuteme nponji, "to cut the strings," or in Chinyanja, ku-dula mlese, "to cut the palm"; unless it is performed, the new husband will sicken. The man introduced for the purpose is called by the Yao, hitwa, the "hyaena," "he who comes by night." 589 587 [833]

Divorce. From time to time, married people disagree and one deserts the other. If the woman leaves the man, he has a claim against her and the man to whom she goes for all the clothes he has supplied her with during their married life. The husband usually sides with the wife's relatives and arranges that they look after the children; he does not claim them. When the husband and wife mutually wish to separate, they both meet with their sponsors and everything is duly arranged. The husband will give his wife an arrow, saying, "Mpamba (the arrow)," meaning, "If I come back, may it kill me." The place of the arrow may be taken by a bullet or any other object, even a piece of grass. The man will add, "Swaka, swaka, na likewu! (rattling, rattling, it is a rat!)," inferring that if his wife hears something rattling in the house, it is a rat, not himself trying to come back. There is no definite payment of compensation. If the woman marries again, she presents the "arrow" to her second husband as a sign that she has been freed from her first marriage; without this token, no man would marry her. 586

Actual adultery was in the old days very rare owing to the strict enforcement of rules, and the case of a woman demanding divorce on account of the adultery of her husband formed a causa célèbre. The case heard by the chief would last for days and hundreds of people would come to listen. Neighboring Anyanja pleaders would be invited to speak and great excitement prevailed, as these latter would be accompanied by their villagers, who, to the accompaniment of continuous drumming, would sing, "Mbewala anakadwa m'nkonde,[2] (The bush-buck has run his head into the net)," while they ran about running their heads into their game-nets. 684 586

Other causes of separation are neglect of duty, sterility of the wife, and habitual death of the children born. 586

[1] Vide infra, p. 274. [2] Chin.

643 ivory by his own hunting parties or as a kind of tithe on other hunting expeditions. The ground tusk, i.e. the tusk on the side on which the elephant falls when killed, was the chief's share. In the same way, the hind leg on the ground side of any game animal killed was sent to the chief. He took a share of the spoils of war and most of his people yearly gave him either service in building houses, etc., or kind in the form of food-stuffs, but he enforced no service and levied no tax, except for the making of a new burial place.[1] New settlers in his village were expected to invite him to drink beer made with their first crops.

In return, he always provided cloth to invest the body of the dead. He also made presents at the time of Unyago.[2]

A chief's life, therefore, may not be "all beer and skittles," though he consumes a good deal of the former and a kind of skittles[3] was a favorite pastime of one of the Malemyas. A saying embodying this idea was used when pleading for a man who had [538] committed adultery with his chief's wife "one who carries a tortoise (on a string over his back) is likely to get his clothes soiled"; a man has to put up with the troubles his belongings bring him. So a chief must bear with his own people who do wrong.

643 Ample opportunity for exercising such forbearance was provided, since the chief was formerly the adjudicator of all disputes and dispenser of justice in all crimes. The headman 692 did the same in a smaller way but appeal could always be made to the chief. Cases were heard by the chief sitting in council. He and his headmen and elders would assemble in the village open space and here cases were stated, often at great length.

Each party to the case would employ some man well known for his powers of oratory as leading counsel. The speaker for the plaintiff would start proceedings by a recital of all the evidence he could collect. After him would follow innumerable speakers, whether actual witnesses or not, each telling as good a story as he could, and the defendant's case would then be put by his representatives. There was no cross-examination but at the end, a summary was made and judgment given. A chief often took the advice of some one of his old men whom he trusted.[4] The chief received no payment for his services, except in the case of murder; neither did the "counsel" receive anything for their efforts.

674 Crimes. Causing the death of a person by witch medicine, usuwi, was the most heinous [754] crime; a wiwi ordeal might be held, but if the offense was proved, burning was the punishment which usually followed.

[684] The offense second in gravity was adultery. This might be expiated by payment or by death, according to the circumstances under which it occurred; mutilation was often [696] performed in the case of a chief's wife. All death sentences with the exception of those

[1] Vide supra, p. 244. [2] Vide supra, pp. 248, 264. [3] Vide infra, p. 360.

[4] The old Malemya (Nahtumbo) has some very fine men among his counsilors. Kumtupa and Chinguile, the latter renowned for his oratory, were his chief advisers in legal matters. Ndakka, a slave, was his mentor in all personal and family affairs, while Chekasongo was in charge of all ceremonies and served with his assistant, Mpanje, as high priest on all occasions of intercession. Others acted as his emissaries, such as Mkapiti who always went on any missions to the Angoni, among whom he was known as Ndunjira.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

for witchcraft were carried out by strangling with a piece of calico at a place appointed for the purpose some miles from the chief's village. 674 696

There was no case against a man who seduced an unbetrothed girl, the latter being considered entirely at fault. 684

After divorce, the children always remained with the mother. The man left his wife after the case, saying, "I will take my spear and some of the goats and chickens, but the children will always know their father." 586

Murder was a question of compensation to the deceased's relatives and was not punished by death. 682

Stealing was a serious offence but many who were found guilty were rather despised than punished. The thief with the stolen goods tied about his body but otherwise stripped naked would be driven through the village and prodded with sticks to the sound of drums and hoots of derision. Most crimes, however, might be punished by exacting compensation. Payment took the form of goods or slaves. In the case of murder, the accused might have to pay several slaves to the deceased's relatives, and in addition, a fine to the chief for spilling blood, consisting perhaps of one slave. The amount of compensation expected was mentioned by the plaintiff in the case. One of the expressions used was, "My compensation must cover an ant hill," meaning enough slaves, standing hand in hand, to surround an ant hill; ant hills in this country are sometimes very big. If a man had no slaves, he would send his relatives or he himself might be forced to become the slave of the plaintiff. There is a saying anent this practice: 685 681 539

Chitumbili wachitowile mchila wakwe!
The monkey they tied (with) tail his (own).

Slaves passed over to a man in payment for crime became free men; they were an addition to the village and might even be adopted in place of a murdered individual. 567

When compensation was made by the defendant to the plaintiff, the latter always returned some part of it as a sign that friendship was again established.

Goods or money received in compensation for murder, i.e. blood money, might not go for the purchase of food or clothing. Detection of a guilty party by means of magic and proof of guilt or otherwise by ordeal poison are dealt with elsewhere.

Bluffing anyone into giving something for nothing, obtaining goods by false pretence, was not considered a crime, as anyone was "fair game." For instance, a party of youths would waylay a man with a load of fish, saying they had been ordered by their headman to commandeer it. If the man parted with his fish, so much the worse for him; if he showed fight, he was respected and friendship made with a give-and-take of fish and snuff. Such bluffing is called kulpa nsuso, "to eat with them." To add to their appearance of bona fides, the party might have secretly borrowed some well-known article belonging to their headman. 674

3: Stanous D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

This has led to the word being translated as Bright's disease (Hetherwick). No symptoms referable to the pudenda are included under this disease. Mwera (Chin. Kapunda): hydrocele; said to be another sequela. A woman soiled by the excrement of her infant after birth is not considered unclean and intercourse will have no ill result to the husband. Sometimes in the event of Apali ni chilwala, recourse is had to the practice of intercourse between the woman and some other man. She is thus rendered "clean" and the man who is not her husband will not sicken. Such a man is called Lituwa (see Widowhood). 164 192 753 688

Lusse: a disease similar to Chingwa, which inflicts a man having coitus with his wife who has not been cleansed after abortion.

Kusinimula: a practice indulged in if a new-born child falls ill; the word refers to the "hardening" of pots when they are being made and the same idea is applied to the child. If the new-born child gets fever, the illness is ascribed to the carunculae myrtiformes about the vulva of the mother. These are cut off by an old medicine-woman and the blood allowed to drop into a mortar; water and some leaves are added and pounded together, and the mother attired only in a cloth reaching to the loins, washes her breasts with the liquid while the baby is supported on she thigh; the child is then given the breast and the mother, turning her back on the mortar, pushes it over backwards with her buttocks.

Ya njete (from salt; Chin., das mchere): If a woman who, after the death of a child, has not been cleansed by medicine, adds salt to her husband's food, he eating it will sicken.

Tsempo (a Chinyanja word): If a man or a woman commits adultery and any member of the family falls ill, the natives say the illness is due to the unlawful act; the sinner is said "to have gone in front of the other"; kwapunda (wapambana, Chin.), "he has gone in front of," from ku-punda and ku-pambana, to go in front of, or ku-ampha (Chin.), to go slyly in front of. Hence the word tsempo which also is used loosely for das mchere. If a child who according to custom has gone to stay with the grandmother, returns to the parents' house and the parents continue to have sexual intercourse, the child may sicken; it is said that the house is "hot" for the child and its disease may be called tsempo. Or if a child which has been weaned is again given the breast after the mother has resumed cohabitation with her husband, it may sicken with tsempo. And the husband is called kwapunda.

A child which is suckled after menstruation is reestablished, is not affected by any untoward symptoms.

In the event of a woman dying in childbirth, if it so happens the husband has committed adultery, he is held responsible for the death and her relations claim very heavy compensation. [684]

Ku-simwilwa, to be met with (ku-kumwilwa, Chin.): if the act of coitus causes the onset of menstruation and the husband cannot draw back in time to prevent himself being contaminated, he will sicken, and he is said "to have met with (it)" when referring to his illness. In this disease, the penis is said to withdraw into the bladder. Soot from the roof genous group, in which his jurisdiction over one part of the village arises from his position as the warden of a sorority-group, and that which he exercises over the other sorority-group derives partly from his position as a non-matrilineal relative and partly from his own personal qualities. The warden of the second sorority-group is the headman's own son and it is he who takes over all the functions proper to that position, but the successor to the headmanship is a man's sister's son, usually, though not invariably, the first-born son of the eldest sister. Each village headman in turn brings his wife to live in his village and each headman's wife in turn tends to set up a fresh group which is of a different lineage affiliation from that of the headman. In addition to this the warden of the sorority-group formed from the first headman's children tends in due course to live patrilocally and the children of his wife set up yet another foreign group in the village. Hence, theoretically, with each generation the number of opposed groups in a village doubles itself, and in a few generations, were this to continue, the position would become extremely complex. In fact a village of long standing is seen to be composed of a central lineage group to which the headman belongs, and a series of other lineage groups related to the headman's lineage group through one or other of the past and present headmen of that village. Such groups of different lineage make-up are usually mutually opposed and are held together only by the combined influences of a weak patrilineal connexion with the headman's lineage and the personality of the present headman.

This situation is clearly an uneasy one for the headman. His wife is looked upon as a stranger and is often made to feel it. The headman's sorority-group often expresses its hostility and jealousy towards her. The children of the two groups are on no easier terms. They call each other ' cross-cousin ' (asiwani) and are expected to marry one another. At the same time the hostility between them is formulated in joking relationships. This critical situation of the headman is made clear to him on the day of his succession. One headman was told: ' As you have got wives, do not listen to what they say. They may be lying. Sometimes they will quarrel with your sisters and say that your sisters have been insulting you. This is false. When you hear these reports you may be unfair to your sisters and the people will say that you have broken your village through listening to nonsense.' Thus when conflicts arise between members of a village the headman is in a peculiar position and it is difficult for him to remain impartial. In such a situation the tendency is to call in an outsider to try to settle the differences. Sometimes these differences are patched up and the village continues as a unit. But, particularly after the death of the first village headman, the tendency is for one of the groups to move away to a completely new area, there to set up a unit of its own.

I quote an actual case to illustrate this procedure:

621 'In 1946 village A had about 30 huts in it. A certain man B was the son of the 622 previous headman called A_1 and hence mother's brother's son or cross-cousin of the 578 present headman called A_2. B had two wives living patrilocally and while B was
684 serving in the Army he had a letter from one of his sisters (i.e. his mother's brother's daughter or cross-cousin to the headman) to say that A_2 was sleeping with B's wives. When B returned he started making inquiries from his wives and he eventually secured a confession from them. B then went to a man called C, who stood in the relationship of mother's brother to the original A_1 and complained about the behaviour of the village headman. C also instituted inquiries and ascertained that it was true. C then approached a local headman of some standing (whom I shall call D) and asked him to arbitrate in the case. D pronounced A_2 guilty and awarded compensation of £6. 10*s*. to B. B, however, refused to take the money, and said that he wished to leave the village. D observed that he had every right to do this and that A_2 had no right to complain 'since he had broken the village himself'. B took his sorority-group, who occupied about twenty of the thirty huts, to a place about thirty miles away and set up a village of his own. The sorority-group of the village headman A_2 remained behind in the old village.'

This case illustrates the points that I have made. It shows how the two groups in this village stand opposed to each other in that B's sister wrote to tell him of A_2's conduct. Also when the village did break up it did so along certain very clear lines of genealogical relationship. Second, it illustrates the operation of the desire for dependants in that B refused what by Yao standards is a very large sum of money for compensation and preferred to move off and establish a village of his own. This attitude is also shown by the arbitrator who takes the point of view that regrettable as it is, the village must in the circumstances split, and while he appreciates the headman's feelings he makes it clear that the headman has no one to blame but himself. Third, it is interesting to note that this split took place after the death of the old village headman when the personal ties with both opposed groups were severed. Though the new village headman A_2 assumes the kinship terms of his predecessor and also calls the children of A_1 'children' yet in fact he is their cross-cousin while the old village headman was their father.

622 The position of the village headman in Yao social structure may be summarized 554 thus: the village headman is the leader of a group which may be a simple kin-group
621 or a composite group of two or more opposed matrilineages linked to each other through himself or one of his predecessors whom he represents to them. The numerical size of the village determines the status of the headman, but the size that it can reach is limited by an immanent instability in the kinship structure which is expressed, in terms of their status system, first, in the competition of brothers for the wardenship of the sorority-group, and second, in the competition between the headman and the wardens of the patrilineally linked sorority-groups, who wish to set up villages of their own.

621 The Yao see villages as units and this is clearly shown at the initiation ceremonies
881 of boys, when the initiates are kept in grass-sheds, each partition of which refers to a particular village. In the same way a person is identified as belonging to a particular village known by the name of the village headman. Thus a man might say: 'I come from Kumpumbe's village.'

766 by his relatives. For the feasts during the mourning at a chief's death the food is acquired by institutionalized pillage (cipinimbe).
661 The villagers in a chiefdom are often first informed of the death of a chief by the appearance of men from his village. These men are by custom allowed to take from a village any article of food they can find—flour, a goat, some chickens, prepared relish, or whatever is lying around in the village. The owners of the food may not charge them with theft. This food is used in the funeral feast. The excesses to which the chief's men may go became circumscribed after the White conquest. Previously, almost any crime short of murder could be committed under the guise of cipinimbe. More recently, owing to Government opposition, it has been restricted to the taking of smaller articles of food, such as flour and chickens. Some people are beginning to object even to this. The chief's funeral is a public affair and all his subjects may attend it. The effect of the cipinimbe is to bring together enough food for the chief's funeral feast. Here, as before, the chief's men may not cross the boundary for fear of reprisals, and the effect is to impose a levy in an informal way over most of the villages in the chief's area.

The Chief as a Symbol of Unity

643 The chief is a representative of his people and it is his particular duty to ensure their welfare and that of the chiefdom as
579 a whole. His symbolic representation of the unity of his people is brought out clearly by his right to fines in cases involving bloodshed and arson. Strife and division in a chiefdom in the old days were likely to end in spilt blood and burnt huts so that the Yao associate bloodshed and hut-burning with dissension within the chiefdom.

684 Most other offences are against the individual and not the chiefdom as a whole: the case is brought to the chief so that
685 compensation may be awarded. Adultery and theft thus are definitely civil offences. Nowadays, a fine is imposed, but this is seen to be a White innovation, and the money from it is looked upon as 'Boma' money.[1] In disputes where blood has been shed, however, the chief is entitled to fine the guilty party
682 on his own account. The chief is said to be 'blinded' by the 683 blood and a payment must be made to him before he may 'see'

[1] i.e. Government money.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

again. In the past, disputes hinging on murder had this aspect, though they were usually settled by a feud. Nowadays, of course, all murder cases are lifted altogether out of the hands of the chief, but the special fine for bloodshed is still levied in cases of assault. When a man is convicted of assault in the chief's court he will have to pay three separate amounts: one to the victim as compensation, one as a fine to the Native Treasury, and one to the chief 'so that he may see again'.

A similar provision applies to cases of arson. When a case is brought to the chief because a man has burnt another's hut, the chief will say that the guilty man has 'brought a torch into his country'. The man convicted of arson will have to pay a special fine to the chief in the same way as the man who caused bloodshed. The association of the unity of the chiefdom with fire probably has some place in the attitude of the chief here. People who have come to a chiefdom as strangers are said to have come to 'seek the chief's fire',[1] and all the fires in the chiefdom are supposed to have been kindled from one flame. This expresses the unity of the chiefdom: the burning of the hut, therefore, symbolizes the introduction of discordant elements, as well as being a serious crime in itself.

The Chief's Judicial Functions

It is clear from MacDonald's writings that in pre-White days the chief settled most of the serious disputes in his chiefdom. Nowadays, this function of the chief has been given legal sanction under the Native Courts' Ordinance of 1933. 'A' grade courts have the power of imposing fines not exceeding £5, or 6 months' imprisonment and 12 strokes whipping; and 'B' grade courts may impose fines not exceeding £1 and imprisonment including hard labour not exceeding one month, but not corporal punishment. The Native Authorities, Jalasi, Nyambi, Kawinga and Liwonde, all have 'A' courts; the Subordinate Native Authorities, Chikweo, Ngokwe, Chiwalo, Chamba, Mposa, Mlomba, Stora, have 'B' courts. Only a certain proportion of disputes is brought for trial in these Native Authority courts. This is because, firstly, the Administration does not admit the legality of some disputes. Most of these centre on charges of witchcraft,

[1] A similar view of fire in the village context is discussed in Chap. V, p. 112.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

621 identity of villages more clearly seen than in the arguments that 423 arise over rights over waterholes. These are usually dug next to a stream or a marsh, or in some other place where the water will percolate into them. The physical labour of digging a waterhole establishes the rights to it, and a village retains these rights if at some time in the past any of its members had dug it.

621 In normal years, and of course during the rainy season, there
423 is enough water for all and no friction arises, but in drought
●685 years difficulties arise. Friction between Nampeya and Cikuwita arose in this way in 1933.
622

During the dry season the waterholes that were normally used were drying up and the people of Nampeya decided to open up a disused one. When Cikuwita's people saw Nampeya's people using it they came to use it too. Nampeya's women saw this and told the other people they had no right to use the waterhole. Words passed between them and eventually there was a tussle between the two groups, during which a waterjar of one of Cikuwita's women was broken. Cikuwita's women said they would take the case up to Ntibwilibwi, a headman of local importance, and when they returned to their village they complained to their headman who took the complaint to Ntibwilibwi. He sent a message to Nampeya to arrange a date on which the dispute might be settled. On that day the members of the two villages gathered at Ntibwilibwi's hut. The dispute was settled amicably: the person who broke the waterjar was ordered to take a chicken and give it to the owner of the jar, and Cikuwita was told to gather his people the next day and make them dig a waterhole of their own.

The villagers in each of these situations had acted with regard to their fellows primarily as members of villages. They had seen themselves as members of corporate groups and had interacted as such. In the dispute in which the jar was broken, the individual responsibility was fixed and compensation awarded, but at the same time the village headman was instructed on behalf of his villagers to make a new well and thereby ensure peace in the future. In all these disputes, however, the headman had appeared as the responsible representative of his village.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

the arbitrators awarded 30s. compensation to be paid by Cilimba to Cikoja, less 5s. owing. This money was to be paid to Ayesi in compensation for the loss of her baby. Ayesi, however, refused to accept the money because she said she wanted to have her baby. The matter now became an intra-segment affair and Cikoja, Amidu, Kanyenga and Kaifa (F36), the son of Ayesi, with Bt. Amisa had a meeting on what to do. Ayesi was quite adamant about it. There was nothing to do but to drop the matter, and the state of tension between the segments remained as it was before.

The next incident occurred in 1943. Mpulula, the husband of Bt. Amisa, had some goats. One day two of them strayed on to the verandah of Bt. Madi's hut. Bt. Madi (F10) was the daughter of Asuna (F2) and a member of the senior lineage segment. One of the goats nosed its way into a basket of flour that was lying under the verandah and started to eat it. Bt. Madi came out and picked up a log that was lying nearby and threw it at the goat. It broke the goat's leg and the goat had to be destroyed. The owner, Mpulula, who was watching at that moment immediately rebuked the woman. He went and reported the matter to Cikoja and he sent a message to Mpulula's marriage surety who sent back to say that they would meet at Chiwalo's hut the following morning. The arbitrator in the case finally decided that the correct action should have been to take the goat to the owner and to lay a complaint against him. As it was he had to award compensation of 30s. to be paid to the owner of the goat. Mpulula, however, refused to take the money. He argued that although the goat was his, so was the offender.[1] He said that he was afraid of sorcery so he would take a token amount of 3s. only. Cikoja gave him this.[2]

A few months later the eldest child of Bt. Bwana Isa (F16) suddenly fell ill and died.[3] Kanyenga, Kaifa and Msusa went to the diviner. Kaifa, the son of Ayesi, went as the headman's representative. Kanyenga went as the warden of the sorority-group, i.e. the child's mother's brother. Msusa was the marriage surety of the child's father. Kanyenga consulted the diviner who indicated that Kanyenga's mother Bt. Amisa was responsible but that she was not a sorceress. Sorcery, he said, was introduced by an unknown person who was using Bt. Amisa's grumbling as a screen. Kanyenga refused to accept the finding of the diviner, saying that his mother had never been 'caught'

[1] His wife's collateral sister's child he also calls 'my child'.

[2] Mpulula is a stranger in the village and in this situation Cikoja represents both segments to Mpulula, even though the senior segment is guilty.

[3] Sudden illness, called cikoma or 'the hammer', is believed to be without a doubt due to sorcery.

3: Stanzus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 ??? ??? ???

for witchcraft were carried out by strangling with a piece of calico at a place appointed for the purpose some miles from the chief's village. 674 696

There was no case against a man who seduced an unbetrothed girl, the latter being considered entirely at fault. 684

After divorce, the children always remained with the mother. The man left his wife after the case, saying, "I will take my spear and some of the goats and chickens, but the children will always know their father." 586

Murder was a question of compensation to the deceased's relatives and was not punished by death. 682

Stealing was a serious offence but many who were found guilty were rather despised than punished. The thief with the stolen goods tied about his body but otherwise stripped naked would be driven through the village and prodded with sticks to the sound of drums and hoots of derision. Most crimes, however, might be punished by exacting compensation. Payment took the form of goods or slaves. In the case of murder, the accused might have to pay several slaves to the deceased's relatives, and in addition, a fine to the chief for spilling blood, consisting perhaps of one slave. The amount of compensation expected was mentioned by the plaintiff in the case. One of the expressions used was, "My compensation must cover an ant hill," meaning enough slaves, standing hand in hand, to surround an ant hill; ant hills in this country are sometimes very big. If a man had no slaves, he would send his relatives or he himself might be forced to become the slave of the plaintiff. There is a saying anent this practice: 685 681

> Chitumbili wachituwila wakwa!
> The monkey they tied (with) tail his (own).

539

Slaves passed over to a man in payment for crime became free men; they were an addition to the village and might even be adopted in place of a murdered individual. 567

When compensation was made by the defendant to the plaintiff, the latter always returned some part of it as a sign that friendship was again established.

Goods or money received in compensation for murder, i.e. blood money, might not go for the purchase of food or clothing. Detection of a guilty party by means of magic and proof of guilt or otherwise by ordeal poison are dealt with elsewhere.

Bluffing anyone into giving something for nothing, obtaining goods by false pretence, was not considered a crime, as anyone was "fair game." For instance, a party of youths would waylay a man with a load of fish, saying they had been ordered by their headman to commandeer it. If the man parted with his fish, so much the worse for him; if he showed fight, he was respected and friendship made with a give-and-take of fish and snuff. Such bluffing is called kulya nasu, "to eat with them." To add to their appearance of bona fides, the party might have secretly borrowed some well-known article belonging to their headman. 674

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

436 calico currency was an impossibility.'[1] The Africans could hardly have resisted the change over to a money economy. The taxation system introduced in 1893 was based on the Governor of 436 Zululand's Proclamation III of 1887, and ruled that a tax defaulter 651 was liable to be conscripted for labour until he had earned the 687 amount of his tax. Coffee estates owned by Whites in the Highlands were at the same time in need of labour.[2] Tax was then taken in kind but it was soon changed to cash as a further inducement to Africans to come on to the labour market. The Africans were forced into the cash economy of the Protectorate even if they were unwilling. The measures were so successful that in 1899 the Gazette announced that the labour market in Blantyre was flooded.[3]

Modern Economic Structure

177 In modern Nyasaland, the wants of the Africans have become even more varied than they were in the earlier days. Most younger 511 men wear European-type clothing and shoes. Many own bicycles and sewing machines. Many houses have glass windows and panelled doors and most of them are furnished with some rough furniture which has been bought from local craftsmen. Many have beds and mosquito nets. Few women cannot boast of enamel dishes to replace their clay pottery or china cups to replace drinking gourds. The food habits of the peoples too have broadened. Most households use sugar these days, and many people drink tea. I should say that all households occasionally buy soap. Certainly all need salt, which formerly was burnt from the saline grass around Lake Shirwa or dissolved out of special soils in Portuguese East Africa. The stock-lists of an Indian-owned village shop in Chiwalo's area and of an African-owned canteen in the same area, which I have set out in Appendix A, indicate the range of the wants of the modern African.
434 It is clear that these wants are over and above food require-463 ments. The people in these tribal areas live primarily on the

[1] Report of the Consul and Acting Commissioner Sharpe on the Trade and General Condition of the British Central African Protectorate for April 1896 to March 1897. C. 8438.

[2] See the B.C.A. Gazette, iii, 5 (March 1895), and iii, 17 (Sept. 15th, 1896), which print advertisements offering 'native labour arranged for and supplied to plantations at a commission of 7*s.* 6*d.* a head'.

[3] B.C.A. Gazette, vi, 6 (June 24th, 1899).

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

175 565 622 643

2. Free men are under their elder brother in the first instance, but they may carry their cases to the headman of their village or even to the chief of the country.
3. Slaves were entirely under their own master.[1]

The headmen's subservience to the chief is described in the following passage:

> In all public transactions the headman represents his village. He receives the chief's orders and sees them carried out. When he kills an elephant he sends one of the tusks to the chief. Should he kill twenty elephants he is not expected to give up twenty tusks—two or three would be sufficient. If he shoots a large buck he gives one haunch of venison. For all such tributes he expects to receive in return a present (generally a little powder). . . . He is expected to attend the chief's parliament unless he is under an elder brother in which case he is not allowed to speak, except when especially commissioned. Headmen are expected to report all cases of war, but they often attack enemies without telling their chief beforehand, saying, 'Let him hear of the enterprise when it succeeds.' Yet this is dangerous unless they are sure of success, and well acquainted with the chief's private sentiments. On reporting an attack they present the chief with part of the booty. In times of war each headman when summoned, must follow his chief's flag, otherwise his village is burned down, and all that fail to escape are killed or enslaved.[2]

[651] [646 593] [721] [687]

175 578 622 643

Yet within the framework of this organization villages were markedly autonomous. MacDonald's description, which I have just quoted, brings this out very well. Elsewhere he writes: 'The chief may often have less influence than powerful headmen, and we have known cases where he simply contented himself with grumbling when his headmen acted contrary to his desire.'[3] The chief did not differ greatly from his more powerful headmen. A certain amount of ritual in terms of ancestor worship embellished his position, and he had some ascendancy over village headmen to whom he had given land. Yet, in the last analysis, the chief had to rely on his personal following and military power to subjugate headmen who were becoming too powerful. The chief was therefore in direct competition with his subject village headmen, and involved in a constant struggle with them for followers. MacDonald describes how the chief himself was a

[1] MacDonald, Africana, i, 155.
[2] MacDonald, Africana, i, 157.
[3] MacDonald, Africana, i, 155.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

Native Authority, to the Native Authority, and eventually to the District Commissioner if the case is one which he will countenance. In practice, most cases reach the chief and go no further. Most people accept his decision. Thus the chief has important judicial functions. 692 643

The Chief as his People's Representative

In special situations where the welfare of the chiefdom as a whole has been endangered by an infringement of the mores, the chief may take action. For example, a chief prosecutes a village headman who allows a woman in his village to bear her first child before she has been through the litiwo ceremony. Every woman who becomes pregnant for the first time must undergo this ceremony, during which she is instructed in child welfare and child care. If she bears a child without undergoing the ceremony, she is said to have 'spoilt the country' (ajalwice cilambo), in the sense that she has besmirched its reputation.[1] 643 687 843

Chiefs usually call in magicians 'to smell out' those responsible for keeping back the rain.[2] When the rains fail as they did in 1948–9, their failure is held to be due to the magic of some evilly disposed person. It then becomes the chief's duty to call in a magician to indicate who this person is. The fees for this duty are paid by the chief himself on behalf of his people. 643 787 821

The chief also acts as a representative of his people when they are affected as a whole. For example, Nyambi called in a magician after man-eating lions had taken some of his subjects. This magician called for the hearth-stones and domestic utensils from all the villages in the area, and built them up into a pyramid over which he made some anti-lion medicine. This was to clear the whole chiefdom of man-eating lions. 643 789 731

Nowadays, the chief's representation of his people is seen most clearly in his position in the Administrative framework.[3] The chief represents the Administration to his people since they approach it through him. At the same time the Administration clearly treats him as the representative of his people and consults 643

[1] I was told in Mponda's area that the women undergo this ceremony after the birth of the child, but that it is still obligatory.

[2] Kutawa ula—lit. 'to tie or bind the rain', in the sense of to make it a prisoner.

[3] I have dealt with this aspect more fully in 'The Political Organization of the Yao of Southern Nyasaland'.

.3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

164 Mangengolosi: round-worm of dogs or found in the ground.
753 Wakengwe wajumu: a barren woman (lit. dry).
192 Chinungula: sterility in the male.
Chinyungula or gojo: an impotent man or Mundu jwa ipuyo: a useless man!
Mpuli: impotent.
Mchese (ku-chera = to cut off): a "cut man"; a man soon after he has been castrated.
Mtonga: a eunuch after he has become fat.
Namtundira (nalimwimwi Chin.): the word is derived from kutunda, to micturate. Natives say that when disturbed, the insect of this name which is a locustid, Euschiopsis durandi, makes water which falling on the skin of the passer-by causes ulceration. I have seen a variety of cases of extensive ulceration due to syphilis, etc., assigned to the effects of this insect; I have, however, shown that it does secrete a corroding fluid from pores at the sides of the body which dropped on to the skin will dissolve the superficial layers of the epidermis and should such abrasions become infected, ulceration may, of course, result.
Utendeu: tremor, similar to the movements of one of the wasps.
Manjenje: tremor of old age, paralysis agitans.

164 The preceding short list of words will give some idea of the richness of the language in 192 some directions and also its limitations. There now follows an account of diseases which are 753 based on superstition, generally connected with the idea of uncleanness or the transgression
688 of some rule of life. Whatever the symptoms, if there has been a transgression, the disease is labelled with the name of the disease supposed to follow the act. Similar diseases are to be remarked among the other tribes in the country; some of those relating to the Anyanja I have already mentioned,[1] and the following may be read as an amplification of the remarks previously made.

Chinyera (Kanyera Chin.) from kunya, to defecate: At the birth of a child, if the contents of the bowel (meconium) are passed before the body is born (as often happens in breech presentations), the child is said to be "born with disease." One of the women attending the confinement will always go out and inform the husband of what has happened, saying, "Apali 'chenene," (it is born well) or "Apali ni chihwale," (it is born with disease). This only refers to the passage of meconium and not to any antenatal disease.

When this significant event has happened, the husband may not occupy the same sleeping mat as his wife and have intercourse with her until the child of its own accord crawls from the mother's sleeping mat to that of her husband on the other side of the hut; Ku-pitisya muanache ku magono (Ku-pititsa mwana ku mpasa, Chin.) = "to go the child to the mat." Should the husband disregard this custom, he will sicken with Chinyera. The symptoms commonly ascribed to Chinyera are pain in the loins and in the hypogastrium.

[1] 'Notes on some tribes of British Central Africa,' op. cit.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

This has led to the word being translated as Bright's disease (Hetherwick). No symptoms referable to the pudenda are included under this disease. Mwera (Chin. Kapundu): hydrocele; said to be another sequela. A woman soiled by the excrement of her infant after birth is not considered unclean and intercourse will have no ill result to the husband. Sometimes in the event of Apali ni chilwala, recourse is had to the practice of intercourse between the woman and some other man. She is thus rendered "clean" and the man who is not her husband will not sicken. Such a man is called Litunu (see Widowhood). 164 192 753 688

Lungo: a disease similar to Chinyera, which inflicts a man having coitus with his wife who has not been cleansed after abortion.

Kusisimula: a practice indulged in if a new-born child falls ill; the word refers to the "hardening" of pots when they are being made and the same idea is applied to the child. If the new-born child gets fever, the illness is ascribed to the caruncules myrtiformes about the vulva of the mother. These are cut off by an old medicine-woman and the blood allowed to drop into a mortar; water and some leaves are added and pounded together, and the mother attired only in a cloth reaching to the loins, washes her breasts with the liquid while the baby is supported on one thigh; the child is then given the breast and the mother, turning her back on the mortar, pushes it over backwards with her buttocks.

Ya njete (from salt; Chin., dzu mchere): If a woman who, after the death of a child, has not been cleansed by medicine, adds salt to her husband's food, he eating it will sicken.

Tsempo (a Chinyanja word): If a man or a woman commits adultery and any member of the family falls ill, the natives say the illness is due to the unlawful act; the sinner is said "to have gone in front of the other"; kwapunda (wapambana, Chin.), "he has gone in front of," from ku-punda and ku-pambana, to go in front of, or ku-sempha (Chin.), to go slyly in front of. Hence the word tsempo which also is used loosely for dzu mchere. If a child who according to custom has gone to stay with the grandmother, returns to the parents' house and the parents continue to have sexual intercourse, the child may sicken; it is said that the house is "hot" for the child and its disease may be called tsempo. Or if a child which has been weaned is again given the breast after the mother has resumed cohabitation with her husband, it may sicken with tsempo. And the husband is called kwapunda.

A child which is suckled after menstruation is reestablished, is not affected by any untoward symptoms.

In the event of a woman dying in childbirth, if it so happens the husband has committed adultery, he is held responsible for the death and her relations claim very heavy compensation. [684]

Ku-simanihwa, to be met with (ku-kumanidwa, Chin.): if the act of coitus causes the onset of menstruation and the husband cannot draw back in time to prevent himself being contaminated, he will sicken, and he is said "to have met with (it)" when referring to his illness. In this disease, the penis is said to withdraw into the bladder. Soot from the roof

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

164
192
753
688

of the hut, chanjiola, and the red part of the flower of the banana, doubtless on account of its shape, are used as medicine for this disease.

Kwimbangana or Ndaka: If a man dies and his relatives eat of the food-stuffs left by him, such as corn from his grain-store, before they have been cleansed by medicine, they will sicken with ndaka, the symptoms being anaemia and wasting. The word kwimba ndaka is also used for sickness due to partaking of food cooked by an unfaithful wife.

Chipata is a word used by both Yao and Anyanja to denote a disease which a man contracts from adulterous intercourse. Scott[1] derives the word from ku-pata, to stick to; the woman is so influenced by medicine made by her husband that should any man have adulterous intercourse with her, the disease will "stick" to him, while it will not affect the woman herself nor her own husband. Both the disease and the medicine made to cause the disease are known as Chipata. Secondarily, the word has come to be used for any disease which may be gained by sexual intercourse and is sometimes used as a general term for venereal diseases.

Chipata cha chipula (chipula, a knife): A man who is going away from home obtains medicine and doctors his knife with it. As he leaves his house to go on his journey, he pretends just to remember his knife and calls for it. His wife brings it to him and it is put into its sheath; he then goes out and sticks it in the grass of the roof of the house. The medicine is made from the tail of a dog, an animal in which coitus is prolonged and the two animals cannot separate. Should the wife commit adultery, it is supposed that just as the knife was unsheathed and doctored with dog medicine, so the adulterous pair will remain fixed in coitu and be found out. This may be called chipata cha kutapa (kutapa — to set a trap).

The Anyanja make medicine with the same idea, chipata cha kuchera (ku-chera, to set a trap, Chin.); medicine is put round the house and any man crossing the medicine and committing adultery with the wife will be trapped. In all cases, the man will become ill.

Chipata cha miasi, miasi, blood (mwazi, Chin.); disease caused by intercourse with a menstruating woman. Blood is passed in the urine.

Chipata cha usou, usou, pus (mafinga, Chin.): practically means gonorrhoea.

Chipata cha kitanji, kitanji, cotton (tanje, Chin.): the discharge from the urethra resembles a thread of cotton; it is supposed that this thread can be pulled out endlessly.

Chipata cha uchacha, uchacha, the white-ants (chiuwe, Chin.): so called when a man passes whitish-yellow debris in the urine. It is supposed that when he has finished passing water, [925] white ants rush up the penis and enter the bladder, thus causing the pain which characterises this affection. The origin of the idea lies in the fact that if one sprinkles water or urinates on the ground near white-ant burrows, the ants will come to the surface of the ground in numbers and make a rustling sound.

[1] D. C. Scott, A cyclopædic dictionary of the Mang'anja language, op. cit.

3: Stanaus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

Other hypothetical diseases which are caused by disobedience to custom are mentioned under various other headings. Kosipa: a disease generally characterised by ulceration of the legs but in some cases by pains in the back, or loosely used for a variety of symptoms, is said to be caused by the entry into the body of a worm which lives in water-pools. This worm which I have had identified is a gordian worm and not known to be parasitic in man. Luasi: When a man kills another in battle, he will slit open the belly of his victim; otherwise he believes he will sicken with luasi and his own belly will swell up like that of the corpse when putrefaction sets in. He is supposed also to hunger after more killing and blood. Likango is the name of a supposed disease which kills off one child after another in a family when they are about six months old. Congenital syphilis naturally suggests itself but I have never been able to verify this idea. Likango lya kutula: a supposed disease which causes the death of the first child when the second is born, the second when the third is born and so on, whatever the intervals between the births. Each child is said to push (ku-tula) the previous one out of this world. Under these circumstances the disease is ascribed to something wrong with the mother or father and they are examined by a medicine-woman or medicine-man, and any carunculae or an external pile found will be cut away.

If a snake inflicts two bites, the case will prove fatal. If a crocodile emits a grunting sound when seizing its victim, though he escape he will certainly die.

Treatment of disease. Of surgical treatment there is very little to be noted. Nothing in the way of operation is performed with the exception of circumcision (see Lupanda).

An abscess is allowed to burst, the smallest tumor is left untouched, but accessory digits which are not rare, attached only by a fine pedicle, are snipped off.

The natives cannot extract teeth. They are incapable of rendering any assistance in cases of difficult labor. Dislocations are not recognized as such, but fractures are treated by the application of wooden sticks placed at intervals round the circumference of the limb parallel to it and held in position by twisted pieces of bark string (Pl. XXII, fig. 3). The principle of the tourniquet appears to be unknown.

The only instruments used consist of a small knife for incision, a cupping-horn, and a primitive form of funnel for administering enemata (Pl. XXII, figs. 1, 2, 4). The knife has a triangular blade with a stem which is commonly twisted at one of the corners. The knife is used for wet-cupping, tatooing, and circumcision (Pl. XXII, fig. 2). The cupping-horn is a small horn of a calf. The apex is pierced and after application to the part, suction is made with the mouth and then the hole sealed by working a piece of beeswax over it with the tongue. Six small incisions are made in the skin for the withdrawal of the blood. The cupping-horn is called chawi (tulumika, Chin.). Cupping is used for headache and for pain in the chest and back. The enema funnel, chipolya (ntimbiri, Chin.) is made from the neck of a gourd to which is attached a hollow straw for introduction into the anus. Half a pint of an infusion of mungwia is injected for constipation associated with pain.

622 hut of one of Meya's wives. Meya's sister wrote a letter to tell him 558 of this and he replied that he could do nothing until he returned.
837 In 1946, Meya returned to be demobilized. The third night after his 166 return he questioned his wives about their fidelity during his absence. They at first held out against him but before long he intimidated them into admitting that they had slept with the village headman. Meya now went to complain to Mapata, who was Cikumba's perpetual mother's brother, and he said that he would come to the village the next day.

When Mapata came he confronted Cikumba with the accusation. Cikumba denied it until Mapata called the women. When they confessed Cikumba was forced to admit his guilt. Mapata now decided to call in an arbitrator, Isa, an important but unrelated headman who lived close at hand. Isa said he would come the following day when the matter could be thrashed out. When Isa and Mapata came they asked the women about the affair in public. They admitted the charge and Cikumba did not deny it. Isa then remonstrated with him for being a bad man and said that he was ashamed to hear about it. Cikumba had to pay £6 10s. to the injured man, Meya, who, however, refused to take it. He argued that Cikumba ought to have behaved as a father to him. But Cikumba had not. He, Meya, could not remain living in the village because his wives would be as Cikumba's wives. Isa said that he could not object because Cikumba had caused the trouble and had broken the village himself. How could he complain? Meya took two-thirds of the huts in the village away with him.

The Headman as a Representative of a Corporate Group

622 The headman is not only responsible for keeping the peace
689 between the members of his village, but he is also supposed to control his members in their relationships with other villages. If members take corporate action against other villages, even if they do so without the consent of the headman, the chief will consider the village headman responsible. This was brought out clearly in the relationships between Cikoja, Mapata and Masimbo in Chiwalo's section.

622 Cikoja and Mapata are two of the more important headmen in 689 Chiwalo's section. Masimbo is a minor village headman who lives 423 in Mapata's village area. The quarrel arose over the [illegible] of 226 fishing rights in a small pool lying between the two ma[illegible]s. This pool was excavated by Cikoja and his villagers in 1924 d[illegible]g

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

a severe drought, and he claimed the rights over it. One day in 1930, some boys from Mapata village came down to the pool with fish-poison. At about noon some boys from Cikoja's village arrived with their traps. When they saw the Mapata boys using fish-poison they told them to desist and tried to take away the fish. This led to a fight in which knives were drawn. One of Cikoja's boys ran back to tell him, and in anger he came down to the pool with some adults. The Mapata boys now ran back to Masimbo who immediately assembled some men and came to the assistance of the Mapata boys. The two groups joined battle immediately and there were casualties on both sides. Mapata heard about this and came running down to separate them. 622 689 423 226

The next morning they took the dispute to Chiwalo. He started by asking why Mapata had used fish-poison in someone else's pool without permission. Mapata replied that he did not know that his boys had gone down there. He said that Masimbo had told him about the conflict and that he had gone down to stop it. He was not aware of it before. Chiwalo now turned to Masimbo and said, 'Masimbo, you are in the wrong. You have caused the children to suffer. You went to make war because of your children. The people of Mapata, they are in the wrong because they did not report to the owner of the pool.' 622 689 423

When Cikoja was asked if he had anything to say he only replied that he was ashamed of what had happened because he was the first in the area, and until then they had been friends. The conflict had arisen because the children had done something which they did not know was wrong.

Chiwalo ordered Masimbo to pay 5*s.* and Mapata 6*s.* to Cikoja. He then told Cikoja that he should brew some beer and share it with the other two villages so that friendship might be restored and the children might go from village to village without fear. The chief's instructions were carried out and normal amicable relationships were re-established.

The way in which the villages acted as corporate groups is well illustrated by this incident. The responsibility of the village headmen for the activity of their members also emerges. The chief found Masimbo in the wrong for causing the fight, but he also fined Mapata because his boys had used fish-poison. The fines were paid by the village headmen, Masimbo and Mapata, to the village headman Cikoja, for they are the representatives of the corporate groups under them. 622 689

In no other field of village relationships is the corporate 621 423

The w'mikile then gets off on the left side, his assistant on the right and they stand in the shallow depressions. The w'mikile starts asking riddles; he says, "Ndewi (riddle)!" and is answered by his assistant "Jiiche (let it come)!" Here is one: 881 533 539

"Kanguru, hapile pansi!"
"The little mouse it has defeated, it has gone into the ground!"
Answer: "Michipi! (roots)!"

He then goes round the crowd for the answer — if they cannot guess, they say, "Ali sapena," "it is yourself (to answer)." There are hundreds of such riddles.

The w'mikile points to the tusks depicted in the chisapo and tells the people, "Long ago this used to be an elephant; look at the tusks." The hump at its back he tells them is the same as ching'undung'unda which they will find farther along.

They pass next to mbunda, the zebra; a pair, male and female, is always figured.

"Ajiji apati mbunda ja mbuje Achilemala! Yoseye pakuta!"
"This one is it not the zebra of Mister Mlemala! everything (is) beautiful!"

Sometimes a story is told to show that the zebra used to go to the sea to drink but seeing the whale, he ran away and came to the country of the python.

Then to ato, the python; he sings:

"Anaato kwijinji! pawa, ejo! Yoseye pakuta!"
"You python come and answer! all (is) beautiful!"

At the crocodile, nyama, he sings:

"Chanyama ulumba, pawa! ejo! ahapana mungulupulu mani!"
"Mr Crocodile cleverness, he sleeps at the side of the water!"

At mwezi, the moon:

"Amwezi ulumba, pawa! ejo, amani!"
"You moon cleverness, !"

Next, they come to wakiele ukasa, the people drunk with beer. Two men lie on the ground, feet to feet with nothing on; the pudenda are covered with bark-cloth and the whole of their bodies painted with earth and flour to look like two female figures in earth. The song is:

"Wakiele ukasa: kumbele anamali, wakiele ukasa!"
"Drunk with beer: come and see the women, drunk with beer!"

A moral is pointed: the disgrace to a woman who gets drunk, lies on the ground, and exposes her person. As the w'mikile makes these remarks, the figures breathe stertorously as a drunken woman would. He conducts the wali and all the other people past many of the other images such as chiwi, ngulu, ndumunda, ukula, etc., and only stays at those he considers his own special isapo. The seven specially dealt with by Mlemala were as above together with ukulepi, the sable antelope: [834 689]

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

and the ease of administering groups with centralized authority. 622
If he agrees, the necessary alteration is made in the tax-registers, 643 and the new Administrative headman is paid his annuity and is 554 called up by the District Commissioner whenever he holds a 648 meeting. To the District Commissioner the chiefdom is made up of the villages on the tax-register, and in a situation of political importance he calls on the headmen of those villages for decisions. For example, when a chief was being installed, the District Commissioner called each Administrative headman forward and asked him whether he agreed to the succession. When the District Commissioner wishes to discuss any matter with a villager he calls forward the Administrative headman. The position of village headmen in the political structure becomes more effective after they have been recognized by Government.

I have no accurate measure of the proportion of all village 622 headmen who are recognized by Government. From my 648 records the percentage of Administrative village headmen out 554 of the total of recognized village headmen is:

	No. Admin. Villages	% of Total recognized
Kawinga	160	84
Liwonde	104	71
Mposa	30	48
Chikweo	48	43
Ngokwe	21	40
Chamba	61	39

I have full records for the smaller chiefdoms, Mposa, Chikweo, Ngokwe and Chamba, but I know for certain that the figures for Kawinga and Liwonde are incomplete. My fullest and most reliable records are for Ngokwe and Chikweo, so that we may estimate roughly that less than half of the village headmen are Administrative village headmen.

Naturally the village headman, whose taxable population will 622 be reduced by the granting of a new 'book', opposes this in the 554 same way as his ancestor opposed the emigration of his village 691 members in pre-White days. In 1947, in Jalasi's area for example, there was an argument hinging on this.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

622 554 691 Mlima was a village headman of long standing and had been recognized as an Administrative headman. Ngwaya was a headman who had come to settle under Mlima.[1] After some years Ngwaya felt that because he had his own village he should be given a 'book' and receive money from the Government. Mlima however resisted the claim, saying that his 'book' had been given to him by Jalasi. Both went to Jalasi's court so that the difference could be resolved. Jalasi rejected Ngwaya's claim and upbraided him for being recalcitrant. Ngwaya was fined 9*s.* and ordered to pay £1 to Mlima in compensation.

622 554 643 A rather more complex case brings out the position of the chief, the Administration and the conflict of the prestige-giving principles of historical primacy and White recognition.

691 In 1948, an Administrative village headman, Kalonga, from Nyambi's area, decided to migrate down to the more fertile land along the banks of the Shire River. This land was in Jalasi's area, and it was partially occupied by a minor village headman called Malilo. Kalonga had already selected his site for the village when Malilo came up to him and told him that he was the first in that area and that Kalonga should have asked him to indicate a building site. Kalonga, on the other hand, pointed out that he was an Administrative headman and that Malilo was not, and there the matter rested. In time Kalonga, because of his official position, became better known than Malilo. Malilo was jealous of this prestige and in due course went to Jalasi and complained that Kalonga was 'getting too big for his boots'[2] and that he was only a Newcomer into that area. Jalasi sent for Kalonga.

At the dispute in front of the chief, Malilo reiterated his complaint. Kalonga merely pointed out that Malilo was jealous of his 'book'. Jalasi dismissed the case reminding the two headmen that it was he who was chief of the country. Shortly after this, Kalonga went to Jalasi alone and told him that Malilo had told him that he, Jalasi, was no chief because he should have taken the 'book' and given it to Malilo. Jalasi said, 'It is impossible to change over the "books" which are written by the Whites', and then sent a messenger to bring Malilo to court. When he came he denied the tale and said that as far as he knew the only reason for Kalonga's animosity could be that he had refused to give him the subaye greeting. Jalasi informed both headmen that they were to be independent of each other. Malilo

[1] Kwakulipatika—lit. one who had made himself a slave.

[2] Kulikweryo—reflexive causative of the verb kukwela, to climb, i.e. to cause oneself to climb or to exalt one's status.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

was to report strangers coming into his village area independently of Kalonga. Nowadays, there is much tension between the two headmen and they summon each other to court on the slightest pretext. The peace is kept only by order of Jalasi. On the whole, however, it is Kalonga who has the higher status and superior prestige.

Unfortunately I have no figures to show how large a village becomes before its headman applies for Government recognition. The average number of tax-payers under village headmen who have just been granted 'books' might have provided this information, but I was unable to collect it. Formerly, they could become Administrative headmen only if they had more than 20 tax-payers under them. Nowadays, however, owing to differential fertility and the reduction in size of villages because of internal dissension, many of the Administrative villages (22 per cent) are smaller than the 20 tax-payer limit. They, however, retain their 'books'. I know that often within the Administrative villages of important headmen or chiefs, there are contained some minor villages bigger than some Administrative villages which are farther away. For example, in Chiwalo's own Administrative village, I know that the villages of Selemani, Ali Kasoka and Ntapasia are larger than many Administrative villages. It is not only the size of the village which allows a headman to apply for a 'book'. It is his relative status in the community. Men of higher rank than Selemani, Ali Kasoka and Ntapasia could probably approach Chiwalo and ask him for a 'book'. But these three are Newcomers. Selemani was a refugee from the Portuguese wars and went to live in Mlumbe area in Zomba district. He came to Chiwalo's area in about 1930. Ali Kasoka moved in about 1940. Ntapasia came about 1921. But they dare not approach Chiwalo himself to ask for a 'book'. Here Chiwalo's rôle of chief is compounded with his rôle of Administrative village headman so that they would be asking Chiwalo voluntarily to reduce the size of his Administrative village. It is only when their villages become conspicuously large that headmen may begin to force the chief's hand. They have always one sanction they can bring to bear on the chief—they can threaten to move out of his area into another chiefdom. The chief may not retain any of his subjects by force. If they express a wish to live in another chiefdom he cannot stop them. On the other hand, useful as this weapon

The chief or any important village headman

[601] is usually addressed by a kinship term, either baba (father) or 643 ambuje (master or grandparent). When he is referred to, his 622 name is not used. Village headmen are owners or wardens of 554 villages (aryese misi) but only those headmen of some standing 178 are referred to as muenye.

Important village headmen, like the chief, are in mystical 643 danger from pollution by death. They cannot come to the hut in 622 which a corpse is lying; and they cannot eat the chicken which 554 has been brought to them by relatives of the deceased to announce 761 the death. Like the chief too, an important headman may be buried in a tomb in his village and not in the graveyard.

But an important element in their relationship nowadays is 643 that the Administration will support the chief against a village
622 headman when it comes to a trial of strength, and that a headman
554 these days is precluded by modern conditions from setting up
578 chiefdoms as he did in the old days. Village headmen therefore must struggle for power against their fellows and the chief within 691 the modern Administrative framework. Some attempts are made to resist the power of the chief but these are rarely successful. The dispute between Liwonde and Ndenda illustrates this.

Ndenda was an Nguru headman, who in 1947 had 284 tax-payers under him (Liwonde, the chief, had 186 in his village). Ndenda had come into Liwonde's area before the White invasion and had surrendered with his relative Mlelemba, to Liwonde. The second Liwonde had given him both initiation rights but, unlike his relative, he did not have the right to wear a scarlet headband.

In 1938 or thereabouts, Liwonde decided to move his village site from the Shire River to its present site about half-way up the Great Rift scarp. He sent two of his young men to look for a suitable site, and to plant some mango trees there when they had found one. Ndenda heard of this and sent one of his men to take Liwonde's men into custody. He took their hoes away and then told them to go back to tell the chief they were planting in his (Ndenda's) land. In due course Liwonde moved up to his new site, and asked Ndenda why he had taken the hoes away and whether he owned the country, i.e. was the chief. Ndenda now argued that Mlelemba's ancestors had been given the rights of chieftainship over this area and that the first Mlelemba in the area had given Liwonde some elephant tusks for these rights. Liwonde replied that the chief has a right to tusks and that many had given tusks to him but were not entitled for that reason to rights of chieftainship. Liwonde handled this situation by calling a meeting of the village headmen in the area. They assembled and the claims of Ndenda were debated. The headmen supported Liwonde in his claim that the tusks were part of the chief's rights and that when Mlelemba had come he had come 'to get fire from the chief'. Liwonde then upbraided Ndenda for imagining that because he had so many followers he was a chief, and fined him 10s. for being insolent. 643 622 554 578 691

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

The struggle between Liwonde and Ndenda did not end however. Some years afterwards a man came to Liwonde and said that he wanted to live in his area. This man was a complete stranger and had no relatives there. Liwonde sent him to Ndenda's village. Later while living in the village, this man stole some cloth. He was arrested and Ndenda brought him to the chief saying that the chief was responsible for him. Liwonde told Ndenda that he was being insolent again and that the responsibility must rest with him because the man had married into his village. He ordered Ndenda to pay £1 to compensate the victims of the theft. This Ndenda did but in his view this was tantamount to being chased out of the chief's area. He therefore moved with his children across the boundary northwards into Jalasi's area, and told his unrelated villagers to follow him. They refused to leave Liwonde's area. He was helpless and could do nothing about it. He returned to Liwonde's area a broken man and died shortly afterwards. His eldest son took charge of the village affairs, but so far no successor has been found.

The struggle between Ndenda and Liwonde has some interesting features about it. The strength of the chief in his Government position is not as evident as it has been in other struggles, as, for example, between Jalasi and Kalonga, or between Chiwalo and Ntimbuka, in the cases I cited earlier.[1] It appears only indirectly. Ndenda did not appeal to the District Commissioner against the fine as he might have done if he had felt his position to be more secure. The case history also shows how Liwonde ranged his other important headmen, 47 per cent of whom were kinsmen or co-Invaders, around him against Ndenda who was neither. It shows also that Ndenda's reaction to what he felt to be an injustice, typically enough, was to emigrate and to try to injure the chief by reducing his followers. When this failed he was defeated and it was his downfall, for, like a chief, 'a headman without people is nothing'.[2] 643 622 554 578

[1] Pp. 86 and 96.

[2] Mfumbe nsyo ngumukola Gumbe ngwove mulembe: 'A chief who has no people is not a chief'—a saying frequently quoted to emphasize the dependence of the chief on his subjects.

10: Barnes E-5 (1946-1949) 1959
FR5 Ngoni FR5
Mpezeni
Yao FT7

N Y 648 691

The Yao are mistrusted more than any other tribe, and some of the decisions taken by the courts are harsh on Yao. For example, a Yao man who was married to an Ngoni woman had, it was alleged, caught venereal disease from his wife. His wife then applied to the courts for a divorce, which was granted, together with the custody of the children. No bride-wealth had been paid in the marriage, but the husband now offered to pay in order to retain the children. This bride-wealth was refused by the woman's parents. The Yao appealed, but the judgement was upheld, and in addition he was ordered to go back to Nyasaland at once. He asked for permission to return to the woman's village in order to collect his belongings, and this was granted by the court, after first securing agreement between the couple as to the extent of his possessions, to wit, four plates and two beds. This deportation order was made despite the fact that the Yao had been living with his wife for twenty-one years. If a man of some other tribe had been involved, it is unlikely that he would have been ordered to leave the country, nor would the court have been so suspicious of his trying to take away more than his rightful share of the household possessions.

N Y 648 583

A Yao, who had a good job in Fort Jameson, once offered 90*l.* to the Paramount Chief when he was in the town as the legalization payment for a woman of the royal lineage whom he wished to marry. The Paramount Chief refused the money on the ground that the man was a Yao and he was not going to permit Yao to marry into the royal lineage, despite the protest of one of his lieutenants that the Yao was just a man like anyone else.

N 186 609 N Y 648

The reason that is given for this dislike of Yao is that they are sexually very virile, due to the medicines that they possess for increasing potency. It is perhaps significant that the same is said of Indians, who are also disliked. The Yao are known among the Ngoni for their great knowledge of medicines of all kinds, and the allegation of unnatural sexual vigour may be a rationalization of the fear that the Yao may practise sorcery among the families into which they marry. Another factor that may operate is that the Yao are the only tribe in the region that the Ngoni cannot claim to have conquered.

Political Relations with Other Tribes

N 648 721

Before the European conquest relations between the Ngoni and other tribes were principally those of raiders and raided. The great season for raiding was after the harvest, when the surrounding tribes

1: Tew E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

office tended to become hereditary. Each councillor had his own village which he 631 administered as a headman. A second set of officials were the court assessors, mapungu, who, unlike the councillors, were not in charge of villages of their own in addition to their court duties. Their office was not hereditary and they were chosen for their wisdom and their debating ability. They lived at the court of the chief and their main [692] duty was to sift the evidence in the judicial cases which came before him.

The village headmen were expected to send elephant tusks to the chief (receiving [651] small gifts in return), and to invite him to a yearly beer drink. Like the chief, the village headman governed through a council of the most important men in his village. They 631 constituted a kind of village court over which he presided, and in the old days he 692 could give capital sentence, or award a fine of as many as four slaves. Appeal from his decision lay to the court of the superior headman, or to the chief. Important cases would be reported direct to the chief. Most crimes would be settled by compensation.
In cases of murder, several slaves were paid to the kin of the victim, and a fine for spilling blood to the chief. When compensation was handed over, the recipient always returned some part of it as sign that friendship was restored.[1]

Macdonald's further account of the treatment of crime shows how weak was the 696 political organization, in spite of the apparent orderliness of the system of inferior and superior courts. A murderer caught red-handed might be killed at once. If captured alive he might be ransomed on payment of a fine of from four to twenty slaves, [567] some of whom might be killed to accompany the dead. If the murderer escaped a relative of his would be captured and ransomed. This applied to murders occurring among parties friendly to one another and living in the same village. If the murderer was from another village, the injured village, if strong enough, would fall upon the other and kill and enslave the inhabitants. If not strong enough, the chief might be called in to help to annihilate the guilty village.[2]

Modern Administration

631
In the whole of Nyasaland there must be between thirty and forty Yao chiefs. In 622
the districts of Liwonde, Fort Johnston, and Zomba, where 60 per cent. of the Yao 178 population is concentrated (1931 boundaries), there are at least fifteen such chiefs.
Not all those who have the rank of chief in the old Yao system are recognized as Native Authorities or even as Sub-Native Authorities by the Nyasaland Administration, and many Sub-Native Authorities would be full chiefs in the Yao system, and quite independent of the Native Authorities under whom they are placed.

Nowadays the chief has lost many of his former claims to status. He no longer has monopoly of the trade to the coast, for goods are brought in by Indian traders and bought by African tobacco growers or returned labour migrants. He can no longer use his slaves to increase his wealth by running slaving expeditions. His tribute of food and ivory has ceased, and he can no longer entertain lavishly, but he is still expected to give burial cloths and to make gifts to headmen on their succession to office. Some of his councillors have been made court assessors, and are paid for those duties, but others are expected to work for him unpaid. Some chiefs do reward councillors who retain their traditional status but are not officially recognized as assessors by the

[1] Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, pp. 156–8; Stannus, 4, 1922, p. 279.
[2] Macdonald, op. cit., pp. 170–1.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

631 advocates the more orthodox type of Islamic devotion in which 643 a quiet restrained manner is emphasized. As far as I know the 745 twaliki sect are confined entirely to Jalasi's chiefdom and the sukutu to Kawinga and Liwonde. In this matter, Nyambi's people side with Kawinga's and Liwonde's.

On the other hand, local informal organization is well de-631 veloped so that Chiwalo who is at the point of juxtaposition of 643 Kawinga, Liwonde, Nyambi and Jalasi chiefdoms, may try cases
692 involving headmen from any of these areas, and they usually accept his arbitration. His is the nearest court house. The actual boundaries of the four areas, however, are very clearly recognized and Chiwalo realizes the limits of his jurisdiction. Though he may arbitrate in a difference between headmen, he would not dare to apportion land outside his area. Headmen living on the boundaries of two chiefdoms arbitrate in each other's cases; the villagers under them intermarry. A village in Chiwalo's may 621 procure garden lands in Jalasi's area, and children may be initiated
631 at ceremonies held by headmen in other chiefdoms. There is no
643 clear break in the normal social relationships of people across the boundaries of chiefdoms, and their members interact as freely with each other as members of two villages of the same chiefdom. The cleavage between the villages on different sides of the boundary of a chiefdom becomes apparent only in special situations.

631 The formal relationships of the chiefs, set by the history of their conquests and their kinship, and incorporated in and slightly
643 modified by the Administrative framework, are overlaid by an informal local organization where the interaction of village headmen only conforms to the formal pattern when no agreement can be reached.

The Position of the Modern Chief

643 In ritual situations a chiefdom is clearly differentiated from its neighbours, and many of these situations arise in the cult of 769 tendence on the ancestor spirits. The ancestor cult has fallen
782 away almost completely among village headmen, but among the chiefs it is still strong, and appears particularly in the rain-prayers and the initiation ceremonies. Later, I shall discuss at length the importance of the chief's sanction before headmen may conduct initiation ceremonies. This is because the spirits

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

again. In the past, disputes hinging on murder had this aspect, though they were usually settled by a feud. Nowadays, of course, all murder cases are lifted altogether out of the hands of the chief, but the special fine for bloodshed is still levied in cases of assault. When a man is convicted of assault in the chief's court he will have to pay three separate amounts: one to the victim as compensation, one as a fine to the Native Treasury, and one to the chief 'so that he may see again'.

A similar provision applies to cases of arson. When a case is brought to the chief because a man has burnt another's hut, the chief will say that the guilty man has 'brought a torch into his country'. The man convicted of arson will have to pay a special fine to the chief in the same way as the man who caused bloodshed. The association of the unity of the chiefdom with fire probably has some place in the attitude of the chief here. People who have come to a chiefdom as strangers are said to have come to 'seek the chief's fire',[1] and all the fires in the chiefdom are supposed to have been kindled from one flame. This expresses the unity of the chiefdom: the burning of the hut, therefore, symbolizes the introduction of discordant elements, as well as being a serious crime in itself.

The Chief's Judicial Functions

It is clear from MacDonald's writings that in pre-White days the chief settled most of the serious disputes in his chiefdom. Nowadays, this function of the chief has been given legal sanction under the Native Courts' Ordinance of 1933. 'A' grade courts have the power of imposing fines not exceeding £5, or 6 months' imprisonment and 12 strokes whipping; and 'B' grade courts may impose fines not exceeding £1 and imprisonment including hard labour not exceeding one month, but not corporal punishment. The Native Authorities, Jalasi, Nyambi, Kawinga and Liwonde, all have 'A' courts; the Subordinate Native Authorities, Chikweo, Ngokwe, Chiwalo, Chamba, Mposa, Mlomba, Stora, have 'B' courts. Only a certain proportion of disputes is brought for trial in these Native Authority courts. This is because, firstly, the Administration does not admit the legality of some disputes. Most of these centre on charges of witchcraft,

[1] A similar view of fire in the village context is discussed in Chap. V, p. 112.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

692 but some also on having killed children by ndaka[1] (a disease [673] caused by the mystical influence of sexual intercourse). Secondly, other cases not brought to the court are petty squabbles which do not involve heavy compensation. Examples of these disputes are personal quarrels, disputes over land ownership, petty theft and so on. The Native Authority's court handles mainly cases arising from adultery, which involve compensation varying from £1 10s. to £5; and theft and assault for which similar compensation may be payable. If the case is brought up to the 696 chief's court there is a mechanism whereby the compensation may be enforced. Ordinarily, in those cases which are not tried in the court house, there is no legal sanction behind the payment of the compensation, so that if a man defaults in payment no legal pressure can be brought to bear on him. It is for this reason that such cases are tried in the court house.

695 The cases are heard by the court assessors who call the wit-
693 nesses and cross-examine them. Sometimes a chief or his representative is in the court, as at Kawinga's court, but sometimes as in Chiwalo's court, the chief never comes to the court house at all. After the evidence is sifted, one court assessor takes the case to the chief and tells him about it. On the basis of the court assessor's analysis he awards compensation and imposes fines. The court assessor then takes this information back to the court house, reassembles the protagonists, and announces the chief's decision. The losing party has then the opportunity to appeal, first to the court of the Native Authority, if the case was tried in a Subordinate Native Authority's court, and then to the District Commissioner.

Cases tried by the chief in his extra-Administrative capacity are usually tried outside the court house. The same personalities take part in the trial but they act now with reference to a different set of values. The procedure is exactly the same, except that in Chiwalo's area the chief is present at the hearing. He sits somewhat aside from the main body of people but within hearing distance, weaving a mat or making nets while the case is being tried.

692 In minor cases, if either of the parties is dissatisfied with the 643 decision, he may take the case up to the chief for arbitration and, theoretically, may then take it from him if he is a Subordinate

[1] See Chap. V, p. 112.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

Native Authority, to the Native Authority, and eventually to the District Commissioner if the case is one which he will countenance. In practice, most cases reach the chief and go no further. Most people accept his decision. Thus the chief has important judicial functions. 692 643

The Chief as his People's Representative

In special situations where the welfare of the chiefdom as a whole has been endangered by an infringement of the mores, the chief may take action. For example, a chief prosecutes a village headman who allows a woman in his village to bear her first child before she has been through the litiwo ceremony. Every woman who becomes pregnant for the first time must undergo this ceremony, during which she is instructed in child welfare and child care. If she bears a child without undergoing the ceremony, she is said to have 'spoilt the country' (ajalwice cilambo), in the sense that she has besmirched its reputation.[1] 643 687 843

Chiefs usually call in magicians 'to smell out' those responsible for keeping back the rain.[2] When the rains fail as they did in 1948–9, their failure is held to be due to the magic of some evilly disposed person. It then becomes the chief's duty to call in a magician to indicate who this person is. The fees for this duty are paid by the chief himself on behalf of his people. 643 787 821

The chief also acts as a representative of his people when they are affected as a whole. For example, Nyambi called in a magician after man-eating lions had taken some of his subjects. This magician called for the hearth-stones and domestic utensils from all the villages in the area, and built them up into a pyramid over which he made some anti-lion medicine. This was to clear the whole chiefdom of man-eating lions. 643 789 731

Nowadays, the chief's representation of his people is seen most clearly in his position in the Administrative framework.[3] The chief represents the Administration to his people since they approach it through him. At the same time the Administration clearly treats him as the representative of his people and consults 643

[1] I was told in Mponda's area that the women undergo this ceremony after the birth of the child, but that it is still obligatory.

[2] Kutawa ula—lit. 'to tie or bind the rain', in the sense of to make it a prisoner.

[3] I have dealt with this aspect more fully in 'The Political Organization of the Yao of Southern Nyasaland'.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

554 These headmen who are the centres of local social structure 622 are the higher headmen that MacDonald mentions.[1] Many of them to-day are the descendants of the traditional councillors 692 (nduna) who were sent out to the extremities of the chiefdoms to be the outer governors in these areas.[2] Their villages are social centres in that many disputes are taken to these important headmen before they are taken to the Native Authority's court. For example, the dispute between the women of Nampeya and Cikuwita was taken to Ntibwilibwi.[3] The chief usually orders headmen to assemble at the villages of important headmen when he has directions to issue to them. Very frequently the Administrative officers camp there for the night on their tours and call 554 the headmen in to them for conference. The placing of mosques at the villages of these important headmen also indicates their 622 significance as social centres. Most Moslem villages have small 346 mosques which the more devout use for the morning and evening prayers during Ramadan only. At the villages of important headmen larger mosques have been built and these are used for the midday prayers on Fridays (jumo), when most of the Moslems in each area assemble in their best clothes for communal prayers. Large brick mosques have been built at the court villages of Jalasi, Liwonde and Kawinga. There are other large mosques at the villages of chieftains such as Chiwalo, Chamba, Mposa, and of important headmen such as Kangomba, Nyenje and many others. These chiefs and headmen were all Invaders and are, as I shall show later, almost by definition Moslems. They are also headmen of high rank so that the placing of the mosque, and the other features of local social structure, are largely derivatives of the system of ranking.

554 Rank therefore underlies the structure of local areas as well as the structure of the chiefdoms as wholes. It is, as I show later, 622 closely associated with the historical origin of the headmen. Yet the correlation is not perfect and I shall show that other factors tend to militate against the fixed historical ranking of headmen. Nevertheless, the principle of primacy is the most important single factor.

[1] See Chap. II, p. 36.
[2] See Chap. IV, pp. 92–3.
[3] See Chap. V, p. 130.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

621 his mother was ill and had gone with Lupunje's younger brother to 626 the diviner to find out the cause of the illness. The diviner indicated that Lupunje thought that Kalambo was not showing him the proper 753 respect. Lupunje knew that his sisters had lost their value in the lineage since they had stopped bearing children, whereas Kalambo's sisters were still reproducing. His malice had caused the woman's illness. When Kalambo got home he asked his mother's brother to blow water out of his mouth [1] and help him to prepare some medicine for the sick woman. This Lupunje did and the woman recovered immediately.

Shortly afterwards Kalambo remonstrated with his mother's brother for causing the illness of his sister, but Lupunje said that he had no control over it: the spirits had brought it on her. Kalambo knew that he could do nothing and abandoned the idea of building his own village. He knew that there was bound to be more illness if he carried on with his plan.

182 Clearly the belief in the mystical powers of the ancestors or of sorcery is a force which prevents sections from breaking away 621 from the village. A break follows only when opposition within 626 the village has reached sufficient pitch to force one of the sections to take the risk of illness, rather than to continue living in the village. Sometimes the dissident group comes back because further deaths at their new village site convince them that their action was wrong.[2]

Effects of the Headman's Personality

622 Whether a village maintains its unity or not, depends very largely on the personality of the headman. This is why the officiating headmen and others at the installation ceremonies are so insistent that cases should be settled quickly. The main duty of a headman is to maintain harmonious relationships within his village and to see to the welfare of its members. All severe [787] illnesses are immediately reported to him, and so are the results of all divinations. He usually sends his representative to divina-
[764] tions concerning kinsmen not related to him matrilineally. He is immediately notified of all deaths and he organizes the funeral rites. Squabbles are brought to him for arbitration and even 622 where squabbles are settled by kinsmen in the village, usually the ●692 headman is formally told of them. Frequently marriage diffi-

[1] An act which recants malice. See Chap. VI, p. 139.
[2] See the case history in Chap. VI, p. 153.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

culties are settled by the marriage sureties [1] who only report to him after the affair is settled. In disputes of unusual gravity, the headman may call in unrelated persons [2] to arbitrate, but he himself must be present. 622 692

His own behaviour is expected to be exemplary. Any deviation from the norm is likely to be strictly censured, not only by his own villagers, but also by other village headmen, who may say, 'Important men do not behave in this way.' A man who had an argument with his sister's son was told this. He had taken the dispute to a neighbouring headman who decided against the village headman and rebuked him for behaving in a way not consonant with his position. Village headmen should be above squabbling with their villagers. A village headman who was also a leech had virtually raped a woman whom he was treating. He tried to maintain this was part of the treatment. Her matrilineal relatives reported the matter to the headman of her village and he brought the errant headman in front of the chief who said, 'You are wrong to do this when you are an important man. You are a big man and you act as a commoner does. You ought to be able to show the commoners how to behave.' He was made to pay a compensation of £2 10s. and fined 10s. Had he been a commoner he would have been made to pay a compensation of only 30s. 622 577 558 684

The ultimate sanction to which all headmen are subject, is that their people will leave them if they behave badly. This was the fate of Cikumba. 622 558 837

In 1944 Cikumba had a village of about 30 huts. The son of the first Cikumba, Meya, had two wives who were living virilocally in Cikumba's village. Meya had enlisted in the army. While he was away, Cikumba, the village headman who was Meya's father's sister's son (though he called him 'father' because of positional succession), started taking Meya's two wives to beer drinks. Meya's sister one day asked Cikumba about his behaviour, but he only said that Meya could not do anything as he was far away. Things had gone too far, however, when one morning he was seen coming out of the 166

[1] The representative of a spouse in all affairs arising from conjugal relationships. They are usually senior matrilineal relatives. See Chap. VI, pp. 176–7. Their rôle is discussed fully in Marriage among the Machinga Yao of Southern Nyasaland.

[2] Mundu jusampambali, i.e. a person from outside.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

643 ivory by his own hunting parties or as a kind of tithe on other hunting expeditions. The ground tusk, i.e. the tusk on the side on which the elephant falls when killed, was the chief's share. In the same way, the hind leg on the ground side of any game animal killed was sent to the chief. He took a share of the spoils of war and most of his people yearly gave him either service in building houses, etc., or kind in the form of food-stuffs, but he enforced no service and levied no tax, except for the making of a new burial place.[1] New settlers in his village were expected to invite him to drink beer made with their first crops.

In return, he always provided cloth to invest the body of the dead. He also made presents at the time of Unyago.[2]

A chief's life, therefore, may not be "all beer and skittles," though he consumes a good deal of the former and a kind of skittles[3] was a favorite pastime of one of the Malemyas. A saying embodying this idea was used when pleading for a man who had [538] committed adultery with his chief's wife "one who carries a tortoise (on a string over his back) is likely to get his clothes soiled"; a man has to put up with the troubles his belongings bring him. So a chief must bear with his own people who do wrong.

643 Ample opportunity for exercising such forbearance was provided, since the chief was formerly the adjudicator of all disputes and dispenser of justice in all crimes. The headman 642 did the same in a smaller way but appeal could always be made to the chief. Cases were heard by the chief sitting in council. He and his headmen and elders would assemble in the village open space and here cases were stated, often at great length.

Each party to the case would employ some man well known for his powers of oratory as leading counsel. The speaker for the plaintiff would start proceedings by a recital of all the evidence he could collect. After him would follow innumerable speakers, whether actual witnesses or not, each telling as good a story as he could, and the defendant's case would then be put by his representatives. There was no cross-examination but at the end, a summary was made and judgment given. A chief often took the advice of some one of his old men whom he trusted.[4] The chief received no payment for his services, except in the case of murder; neither did the "counsel" receive anything for their efforts.

674 Crimes. Causing the death of a person by witch medicine, usuwi, was the most heinous [754] crime; a muwi ordeal might be held, but if the offense was proved, burning was the punishment which usually followed.

[684] The offense second in gravity was adultery. This might be expiated by payment or by death, according to the circumstances under which it occurred; mutilation was often [696] performed in the case of a chief's wife. All death sentences with the exception of those

[1] Vide supra, p. 244. [2] Vide supra, pp. 245, 264. [3] Vide infra, p. 360.

[4] The old Malemya (Nahutumbo) has some very fine men among his counselors. Kumtupa and Chiupile, the latter renowned for his oratory, were his chief advisers in legal matters. Ndeleka, a slave, was his mentor in all personal and family affairs, while Chekasongo was in charge of all ceremonies and served with his assistant, Mpanje, as high priest on all occasions of intercession. Others acted as his emissaries, such as Mkopiti who always went on any missions to the Angoni, among whom he was known as Ndonjira.

754
695

One of the group is chosen to go in the morning and summon some one to appear on behalf of the accused man. He and the headman join the party in the bush when the whole of the case from the beginning of the deceased's illness, is again related, ending with the fowl test and dramatic statement of the name of the accused, whereupon the fowl's head on its stick is planted in the ground opposite to the man who has appeared for him as he squats listening to the story. The man who has been called to defend the accused, though the latter may have no particular claim on his kindness, is in honor bound to do his best. As the fowl's head is planted opposite him, he will shift quickly to one side, protesting the innocence of the accused. All then adjourn to the village to put the case before the chief. One of the men acts as prosecutor, again going through the whole case, calling witnesses and others to aid him in speaking. The accused is then defended by the man chosen for the purpose, assisted by others whom he asks to help him. They may speak for a week or more. The chief decides the case, and the result will be communicated to the defendant by his pleader.

If he is found guilty of causing the death of the deceased, he must pay the fine inflicted or if he has been accused actually of usuni, he may have to undergo, or may offer to undergo, the usuni ordeal poison himself or the test may be made with a dog tied to the leg of the accused man. If the ordeal is satisfactory to the defendant, the man claims compensation for wrongful accusation. If he dies with usuni, his relatives have to pay compensation for the crime he is thereby shown to have committed.

[692] If either party is dissatisfied with the chief's decision, recourse may be had to a hearing before another chief, the first being very glad to be rid of the case. The second gives judgment quickly. If the case goes on to a poison-ordeal, a day is fixed and the accused is taken out to some spot two or three miles from the village where a hut is built called ndawo (place of torture). Accompanied by the two pleaders, he remains here for several days. People from the village come out and attempts are made to make him confess any accomplices; beans are fried over a fire and when very hot are put into the accused's hands and his fists closed over them, or they are put in a cloth which is fastened round the perineum, or bamboo sticks are arranged one on either side of the head and tightened by a string.

The third day, natural undyed bark-cloth is obtained and men go out to fetch the usuni poison, two men from each party, the prosecutors and the defendants. One man sent by the prosecutor has actually to take the bark from the tree, while the others look on to see fair play. The bark can only be taken from the east or west side of a tree; it may not be cut with a knife or axe or be pulled off, but must be cut with a stone and allowed to fall; only a piece which falls with the inner surface lying upwards is taken. Any of the party may carry it but they must on no account leave one another. Having returned, they hide the usuni.

On the appointed day, the big drum is sounded and a crier goes round saying that everyone who wants to see so and so drink usuni must go to the appointed place. Every large

5: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1948) 1949 FT7 Yao FT7

Village headmen themselves are graded in importance and there are certain marks of rank which distinguish the more important headmen. We have already examined one of the most obvious ways in which the village headman's importance is judged, that is, by the number of people in his village. In addition there are other ways in which village headmen may be distinguished both from the common people and from less important headmen. Thus, for example, some of the more important village headmen have the right to conduct initiation ceremonies, this right being granted to them by the man who is in a way the most important village headman of all—the Chief. The right to hold a boys' initiation ceremony (lupanda) is of more importance than the right to hold a girls' initiation ceremony (ciputu). Yet another mark of rank is the right to wear a plain crimson band around the forehead (mlangali), this right also being granted by the Chief. 622 554 881

The Administration has recognized the more important village headmen and has entrusted to them certain duties. By no means all the people called 'village headmen' in this paper are recognized as such by the Administration, but I do not know of any person who has the right to wear a red band and is not also an Administrative village headman. 622 554

The status system has apparently been taken over from pre-European days, but it is uncertain to what extent these important village headmen had powers. Some to-day have all the marks of rank that the Chief has, i.e., they hold both boys' and girls' initiation ceremonies, are entitled to the special greeting accorded to important village headmen (subako), wear a red band, have the right to be buried in the village and not in the common cemeteries, and to have their bodies prepared for interment by people of similar rank. It appears that such people exercised a certain amount of power, by reason of their personal qualities, over less powerful neighbours, and some were able in the past to demonstrate their autonomy by moving off to establish petty chiefdoms of their own.

Nowadays the Administrative village headmen have certain statutory duties to perform towards other minor groups actually independent but considered, for the purposes of the Administration, to belong to the village. The relative importance of the headman is still the deciding factor in such questions as determining who is to be called in to arbitrate in a case. Thus, though for Administrative purposes a small village may be considered to be a part of a larger Administrative village under an Administrative village headman, yet when a case for arbitration occurs within that smaller village, some other person than the Administrative village headman may be called in as arbitrator. 622 554 631 692

Laws promulgated by the Administration are conveyed through the Chief to the Administrative village headman and in this way a hierarchy of power is being introduced. The small village headman now sees the Administrative village headman as a representative of the Chief and the Administration. The Administrative village headman in turn sees the Chief in this light. But in matters directly affecting the Administration, the small village headman also sees the Administrative village headman as his own representative vis-à-vis the Chief and the Administration. 622 631

In general the village is by far the most important corporate body in the social organization of the Yao, not only as a significant primary group but also as an element 621 622

622 are composed of the descendants of slave-wives of village headmen in days past. Like the village 643 headmen the chief was considered to be in danger from contact with death. He could not attend 622 the funeral of commoners, he could not eat the 761 chicken which was brought to him at the announcement of the death of a commoner (for a village [753] headmen) or subject (of a chief). Should he do so he would suffer from a disease called ndaka. Also village headmen, like the chief were supposed to be well versed in medicine and were regarded with some awe on this account. The chief and the village headmen were distinguished from the commoners in these ways.

643 But, the chief himself was a village headman. He had to administer the affairs of his family 622 group and slaves as had other village headmen. 692 He was involved in the struggle for power going on around him because he was not lifted above these secular struggles as was, for example, the Zulu King.[1] Duff MacDonald records for example: "In a dispute between the inhabitants of different villages, the respective headmen represent their own subjects, and the chief is appealed to. All his decisions are final. Still the chief may otherwise have less influence than a powerful headman, and we have known cases where he simply contented himself with grumbling when his headman acted contrary to his desire; and in many criminal trials he is eclipsed by the sorcerers and pounders of poison."[2] 643 Again MacDonald records how the chief tried 622 to entice subjects away from a village headman at a trial by pointing out that the village headman had a poor character and was unsuitable to look after people.[3] While there seems to have been some evidence that a number of village headmen under a chief acted jointly in the face of a common danger, but apparently with no powerful military organization. Village headmen seem to have been almost entirely autonomous in their actions, slave-raiding on their own, even raiding villages who paid tribute to the same chief as they did.

643 There is little doubt that village headmen did 622 wax in power and finally break away to form the 578 nucleus of a chiefdom of their own. The chief that a headman had left could do little to regain his lost subject and he had to rule not by tyranny but by tact. Duff MacDonald, for instance, records : "When a quarrel arises between the chief of the country and an important headman the latter may rebel and found a new kingdom, thus depriving the old chief perhaps of one-third of the villages in his dominion". [1] Nkanda is an example. "Nkanda of Cherasulo was at first a headmen of Kumpama's but rebelled and lives on the Southern side of that mountain an easy day's march from Blantyre." [2]

643 The leader was known, and is still known to-day, by the term aryene cilambo. This might be translated as "owner of the country" but the term "owner" in this context would be a mis-translation. I prefer to translate this phrase as : "The person with whom a certain area is identified". [3] Hence when a man says, as the Yao do : "I come from Kawinga's", he does not mean that the land is owned by Kawinga, but that Kawinga is the most important man in that area.

645 Among the village headmen in the area under a 631 particular leader there were a number of trusted
692 village headmen called nduna, which term I
622 have translated as "councillors". These councillors had special duties to perform. They were in the nature of governors in outer areas and each had a number of other villages under his jurisdiction. By this I mean that these villages were supposed to take certain cases for trial to him and to approach the leader through him. The councillors were supposed to visit the village of the chief each morning and to report anything untoward. The councillors also had the important duty of advising the chief, particularly in connexion with raiding of neighbouring tribes. Councillors also arbitrated in the domestic affairs of the chief and in the all too frequent conflicts between the Chief, his sister's sons and his younger brothers.

643 The chiefs are also able more successfully to press their claims to certain gifts from visiting Europeans, particularly in articles which are difficult for Africans to obtain—for example, cartridges. One chief uses his rifle to shoot game and the meat is peddled round the villages by one of his servants. Some are also able to make use of the services of remand prisoners and other villagers in their gardens, thus growing more food and sometimes more of cash crops as tobacco. Other chiefs are able to use their salaries as capital and employ labourers to cultivate tobacco and other cash crops. A few returned labour migrants make small gift payments to the chief.

643 692 The main duty of the chief is the arbitration in disputes. The Native Courts Ordinance established two classes of native courts, called respectively A and B courts, which differ in their powers. Under the same Ordinance court assessors who are remunerated from Native Treasury funds, were appointed.

693 647 The Native Authority's bureaucracy is made up of a large assortment of functionaries and officials, including in the largest court, (Kawinga's), 6 court assessors, 1 court clerk, 1 assistant court clerk, 1 community worker, 1 forest guard, 1 agricultural demonstrator, 1 sanitary inspector, 9 court messengers, 2 caretakers, 4 garetta men, [1] 1 market clerk, 1 market sweeper. Other Native Authorities also have well inspectors. These people are remunerated from the Native Treasury and the most highly paid is usually the court clerk. I do not intend to deal in detail with the duties of each but I shall deal with the more important of them and make some general remarks about their position in the structure.

693 645 The court assessors are supposed to assist in arbitrating cases. Under the old system there were both councillors, ndusa, and court assessors, mapanga, (see p. 144). There is not sufficient provision for the remuneration of both councillors and court assessors in the modern system and there has been a general alteration in their functions. Some of the old councillors are no longer

622 Administrative village. The N.A.'s bureaucracy considers him responsible for the collection of the taxes though, of course, the legal responsibility rests on the tax-payer. The village headman is generally responsible for the various regulations that the villagers must carry out. In practice the Administrative village headman may be in charge of a single kin-group and thus have a certain amount of control over the villagers because of his kinship with them. More frequently, however, the Administrative village headman is also in charge of a number of other hamlets, sometimes completely unrelated to him but who happen to have been assigned to his jurisdiction. He then delegates the responsibilities to the headmen in charge of the hamlets.

622 554 The Yao judge rank among the village headmen largely in terms of historical antecedents and by the number of dependants that a village headman has. While a certain village headman may be ranked fairly highly in the status system because his ancestors were closely associated with the ancestors of the chief, he may not now have many villagers around him. A newcomer to the area however, can only become notable by acquiring sufficient followers to make him a man of considerable power. Associated with rank are the various insignia that I have mentioned, i.e. the right to hold initiation ceremonies, the right to wear a red band round the head, etc. The competition among village headmen therefore, is phrased largely in terms of competition for these particular insignia of rank. They strive to be recognized as Administrative village headmen—"to have a book" as they say, since this at once means that they will receive a remuneration for work which they would have to do anyway, and it also means that they would be recognized as village headmen in the eyes of the White Administration. Village headmen also compete with each other to have the right to hold initiation ceremonies and use the threat to move out of the chief's area to bring pressure to bear on him to force him to grant the right.

692 While domestic quarrels are usually settled by the kin-group leaders and by the husband's and wife's parties conferring together, differences out-

692 side the kin-group are usually settled by the arbitration of a local village headman or the chief. What decides whether a case is tried by a village headman or a chief seems to depend largely on the seriousness of the case and hence the amount of compensation that it involves. A quarrel between a village headman and his heir for example was settled by a local village headman, the compensation in this case being a matter of 2/- and a pot of beer. More serious cases are taken to the chief for arbitration and whether the cases are then tried in the court or not depends on the type of case. Certain cases are known to conflict with the system of values of the Whites. They are tried by the same court assessors and arbitrated in by the same chief who preside in the context of the Native Courts Ordinance, but they are handled by an entirely different procedure. Thus, a case involving the accusation of sorcery or the breach of a taboo leading to death and compensation claims is arbitrated on by the chief acting in terms of the indigenous value system. These cases take place outside the court-house, usually at the chief's hut, and are not recorded as a court case at all. The chief awards compensation in the same way but it is not recorded as in ordinary court cases.

Cases which are known not to conflict with White values are tried in the court-house if compensation of some value is involved. If we exclude from consideration the cases following a breach of the N.A.'s regulations we find that the recorded court cases are almost entirely about compensation for adultery, petty theft and assaults. Here the chief and court assessor function as social personalities acting in reference to a set

[TEXT CONTINUES TOP OF P.158B]

VI. GENERAL
Summary

642 177 I have tried to describe the political structure of the Yao in Liwonde, Kawinga and Nyambi sub-areas in terms of the interaction of social personalities in a structure briefly summarised in the diagram. The aspect of the social personality perceivable in set situations of social interaction

[TEXT CONTINUES BOTTOM OF P.158B]

692 of White values which coincide with their own.

692 Informants say that the position of the village headman in contrast with that of the chief is 643 getting progressively weaker. They maintain that cases once tried by the village headman are 622 now taken to the chief's court. Whether this is true or not is difficult to ascertain. The fact that there is some sanction on the guilty party to settle the compensation if he is tried in the chief's court, probably pays a part. The compensation awarded is recorded in the Court Case book and the chief is empowered to keep a man under remand until it is paid. The chief sometimes supports the village headman against recalcitrant subjects. A man once refused to pay a compensation awarded against him by a village headman. The village headman referred the case to the chief who said to the man: "As you have disobeyed the order of the village headman it means that you have insulted me, the District Commissioner and the Governor". But in general there is a tendency for the central authority to be strengthened and the chief emphasizes his relationships to the White Administration in order to consolidate his position of dominance over his headmen. At a succession ceremony of a village headman the chief who had supported an unpopular candidate said: "This man has been chosen by me and the Governor agrees with me". Clearly in this insecure situation the chief saw himself against his subjects, and as part of the White Administration. He uses his power in this political situation to establish a dominance over the headmen, that he could never have established before the White men came (see p. 144).

VI. General SUMMARY

642 depends on the field of values in which the inter-177 action is taking place. To illustrate this with a simple example, when the court messenger exacted a levy of 1d. from each garden-owner in the area where the sacrificial cloth had been stolen from the tree-shrine, they saw in him a

1: Tew E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

Administration, but many cannot afford to do this. The people regard the taxes they pay to the Administration as a substitute for the chief's tribute. As the Native Authority the chief appears to be responsible for tax-collection, as the tax-clerk lives at the court.

The chief is responsible to the Administration, among other things, for latrine construction and for punishing the infringement of various regulations. His main duties are judicial, as judge of the Native Authority Court. The bureaucracy attached to the Native Authority includes a number of functionaries, e.g. Kawinga's, in 1947 one of the larger courts, had 1 court clerk, 1 assistant court clerk, 1 community worker, 1 forest guard, 1 agricultural demonstrator, 1 sanitary inspector, 9 court messengers, 2 caretakers, 4 gaoltta men, 1 market clerk, 1 market sweeper, 6 court assessors. These are paid by the Native Treasury. Court assessors help in the arbitration of cases. The key position at court is held by the court clerk, and usually he is not a Yao, but an Nguru, who, because he is literate, is the medium of all written communications to and from the chief. The court sergeant is the correct channel of approach to the chief, and the court messengers represent the chief to the villages.

The territory of a Native Authority is divided into 'administrative villages', under officially recognized and paid headmen. Within these areas there are clusters of huts, which do not form officially recognized administrative units, but which are none the less villages under their own hereditary headmen. The administrative village headman is responsible for the payment of taxes in his area, and for the observance of various regulations. He is usually a man with some standing in the Yao social system: one who has the right to conduct a boys' initiation ceremony, or to wear the head-band signifying rank. His authority is derived partly from his status as a senior kinsman, partly from his status as a village headman. If the administrative village under him includes a number of hamlets unrelated to the administrative village headman, he will delegate his responsibilities in these hamlets to their own headmen. Consequently, since village headmen perform administrative duties, whether they are officially recognized or not, there is competition among them for the official posts. In order to bring pressure to bear on the chief to make him concede marks of rank, they may threaten to move out of his area, and so to deplete his following. In spite of this bargaining tool, the position of the village headman vis-à-vis the chief is said to be getting progressively weaker. Cases once tried by them are now being taken to the chief's court, and the latter is able to draw on the power of the Administration to establish his dominance over the headmen.

The chief in the modern system stands as the representative of the people to the white Administration, and as the representative of the white Administration to the people. One reason for the lack of direct contact between the Administration and the people is the fact that Yao is not the official language of the district, and therefore Yao interpreters are necessary.

There are some occasions when the chief and his officials perform the functions proper to their office under the old social system. The white Administration is not concerned with their ritual functions, nor with initiation rites, nor does it take cognisance of witchcraft offences. Accusations of witchcraft are judged by the same personnel as accusations of theft or adultery, but they are not dealt with in the court house, nor recorded in the book.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

692 but some also on having killed children by ndaka[1] (a disease caused by the mystical influence of sexual intercourse). Secondly, [673] other cases not brought to the court are petty squabbles which do not involve heavy compensation. Examples of these disputes are personal quarrels, disputes over land ownership, petty theft and so on. The Native Authority's court handles mainly cases arising from adultery, which involve compensation varying from £1 10s. to £5; and theft and assault for which similar compensation may be payable. If the case is brought up to the 696 chief's court there is a mechanism whereby the compensation may be enforced. Ordinarily, in those cases which are not tried in the court house, there is no legal sanction behind the payment of the compensation, so that if a man defaults in payment no legal pressure can be brought to bear on him. It is for this reason that such cases are tried in the court house.

695 The cases are heard by the court assessors who call the wit- 693 nesses and cross-examine them. Sometimes a chief or his representative is in the court, as at Kawinga's court, but sometimes as in Chiwalo's court, the chief never comes to the court house at all. After the evidence is sifted, one court assessor takes the case to the chief and tells him about it. On the basis of the court assessor's analysis he awards compensation and imposes fines. The court assessor then takes this information back to the court house, reassembles the protagonists, and announces the chief's decision. The losing party has then the opportunity to appeal, first to the court of the Native Authority, if the case was tried in a Subordinate Native Authority's court, and then to the District Commissioner.

Cases tried by the chief in his extra-Administrative capacity are usually tried outside the court house. The same personalities take part in the trial but they act now with reference to a different set of values. The procedure is exactly the same, except that in Chiwalo's area the chief is present at the hearing. He sits somewhat aside from the main body of people but within hearing distance, weaving a mat or making nets while the case is being tried.

692 In minor cases, if either of the parties is dissatisfied with the 693 decision, he may take the case up to the chief for arbitration and, theoretically, may then take it from him if he is a Subordinate

[1] See Chap. V, p. 112.

008 chief, his sister's sons and his younger brothers.

693 Besides the councillors, there were a number of officials known as mapungu (sing. lipungu), which term I translate as court assessor. These officials have often been confused with the councillors, though they were a completely different set of officials. They were not necessarily village headmen though councillors were always so. Also the position of the court assessors, unlike that of the councillors, was not hereditary. Court assessors were chosen because of their wisdom and debating ability and often slaves were appointed. Councillors were chosen because of their general status in the community and once chosen tended to be succeeded by the heir, who for all intents and purposes, socially replaced his predecessor. The court assessors lived at the court of the chief and they were the correct channel of approach to him. No one could approach the chief without at first approaching a court assessor and reporting his business. The assessor's more important duty, however, was the sifting of evidence in cases in which the chief was arbitrating. The court assessor then recounted this evidence to the chief who delivered his opinion and awarded compensation.

643 554 In general the picture that we have of the political organization of the Yao before the Whites came, is that of a number of leaders of kinship groups, who by acquiring sufficient dependants and slaves were able to maintain a certain level of power. Certain groups of them were under the power of more influential leaders (the chiefs) who usually had sufficient resources to send trading caravans down to the coast, which in turn maintained his power over his neighbours. In this loose political organization the importance of being able to control dependants was cardinal and the adage "a chief without people is nothing" (mulimbo nago ngwanakola ilumba, ngwanawe mulimbo!) sums up the situation pithily.

643 The chiefs are also able more successfully to press their claims to certain gifts from visiting Europeans, particularly in articles which are difficult for Africans to obtain—for example, cartridges. One chief uses his rifle to shoot game and the meat is peddled round the villages by one of his servants. Some are also able to make use of the services of remand prisoners and other villagers in their gardens, thus growing more food and sometimes more of cash crops as tobacco. Other chiefs are able to use their salaries as capital and employ labourers to cultivate tobacco and other cash crops. A few returned labour migrants make small gift payments to the chief.

643 692 The main duty of the chief is the arbitration in disputes. The Native Courts Ordinance established two classes of native courts, called respectively A and B courts, which differ in their powers. Under the same Ordinance court assessors who are remunerated from Native Treasury funds, were appointed.

693 647 The Native Authority's bureaucracy is made up of a large assortment of functionaries and officials, including in the largest court, (Kawinga's), 6 court assessors, 1 court clerk, 1 assistant court clerk, 1 community worker, 1 forest guard, 1 agricultural demonstrator, 1 sanitary inspector, 9 court messengers, 2 caretakers, 4 garetta men,[1] 1 market clerk, 1 market sweeper. Other Native Authorities also have well inspectors. These people are remunerated from the Native Treasury and the most highly paid is usually the court clerk. I do not intend to deal in detail with the duties of each but I shall deal with the more important of them and make some general remarks about their position in the structure.

693 645 The court assessors are supposed to assist in arbitrating cases. Under the old system there were both councillors, ndunu, and court assessors, mapungu, (see p. 144). There is not sufficient provision for the remuneration of both councillors and court assessors in the modern system and there has been a general alteration in their functions. Some of the old councillors are no longer

693 paid by the chief but still advise him, and retain 645 much of the prestige due to their rank, which is inherited. Others have been incorporated as court assessors though they may not actually take part in the duties. Some now combine both sets of duties and function both as councillors and court assessors. Some of the duties of both sets of officials, however, have been taken over by the court clerk and other court functionaries. Although the position of court assessor was part of the old tribal structure, modern court assessors see themselves as occupying a position in a structure largely of White fashioning. I once heard a court assessor when conducting an enquiry into a case of adultery, cut short the prolixity of a witness saying: "None of these long stories. We are conducting this case according to the custom of the Whites."

More illuminating still is the position that the court clerks occupy in the modern structure.
[212] They are differentiated from the vast majority of the population because they are literate. All of them have been educated, usually in a mission [563] school. A high proportion of them are Nguru because more Nguru are Christian (hence educated) than Yao (see p. 151). Because he can read and write, the chief court clerk is the medium through which the chief expresses himself in writing and the medium through which he gets written information from the Administrators and others. The court clerk is therefore in a unique position of knowing all the business that comes into the chief's hand by letter. He, of course, must also write the replies so that he has a very good knowledge of what is going on in the territory. In addition, because of his education and knowledge of the ways of the White people the court clerk often makes a better councillor than the uneducated and naive traditional councillor does. Therefore in certain matters the court clerk, rather than the councillor, is the chief's most important adviser.

693 The various other officials have different 647 functions to perform, frequently of a semi-technical nature. There are sanitary inspectors, well inspectors, etc. The court sergeant who is present at the cases now performs many of the

693
647 duties which the court assessor used to in past days. The correct channel of approach to the chief now is through the court sergeant.

In most situations where the chief's orders are to be carried out, the various members of his bureaucracy execute them. For example, when the chief wants some duty to be performed by the villagers, it is the court sergeant or messenger who sees to it. The messengers carry out the instructions and wishes of the chief to all parts of his territory. To the villagers, therefore, the N.A.'s bureaucracy represent the chief when acting as his agent but they also represent the White Administration because much of their interaction with the villagers is in terms of some regulations based upon White values. The court clerk who apprehends a villager and charges him with being in possession of an unlicensed dog is acting, in the eyes of the villager, not so much as an agent of the chief, but rather as an agent of the chief representing the Administration. The sanitary inspector may explain to the man who has been charged with having no latrine, "It is the law that you should have one", and by this he means the White law.

3. The Position of the Subordinate Native Authorities

643 I have not yet considered the position of the 648 S.N.A.'s in the structure. In the diagram they are represented as a separate interactional system. The reason why they have been represented thus, is because the S.N.A.'s regard themselves as autonomous units and in no way an integral part of the main interactional system under a chief. Each S.N.A. has his own sub-court and a small bureaucracy of his own. He sets up a replica of the situation under the chief. Each S.N.A. has the insignia of rank that the chief has: he is given the same greeting; wears the red band around his head; holds initiation ceremonies, etc. Each S.N.A. has the duty of making a sacrifice to the ancestors before and after the rains. A recent theft of a sacrificial cloth hung on a tree-shrine in a S.N.A.'s area was held to endanger the rainfall in that area alone. The chief in the area makes use of his position in the structure in relation to the Administration to bring pressure

[See p. 152 — Analyst]

6: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1947) 1949 FT7 Yao FT7

ndembo, a woman who is pregnant for the first time;[1] kacembere, a woman who has one or two children; mjembere, a woman who has three or four children, and lastly, ndolwa, a woman who is past child-bearing age. 554 584

The information which I have been able to collect on abortifacients and contraceptives suggests that they are not used by married people merely to prevent their having more children, but that they are used by people who wish to avoid pregnancies which would be embarrassing, for example, by a woman whose husband is a labour migrant. To what extent the abortifacients and contraceptives are efficacious I cannot say; some, I know for certain, rely on a magical principle, for example, the medicated cord worn by a man during intercourse. On the other hand, the abortifacients taken orally may have some active ingredient. 842

A barren woman or an impotent man is regarded with some embarrassment and the marriage sureties (acinamangosuw) of a childless couple will go to considerable trouble and expense consulting diviners and leeches in an attempt to make their wards productive. Childless couples are regarded as not fully adult and are treated in a patronizing way by those who have borne children. Since a man may marry other wives, barrenness in a woman is a cause of sorrow to her husband, but is not in itself a ground for divorce. Where the man is impotent, however, the woman may divorce him on this ground, though she usually takes a paramour and forces her husband to an action for damages which automatically leads to a divorce because it is the usual practice in these cases for the court to ask the woman if she wants to be divorced from her husband. [885] [554] [586] [837] [694]

In contrast to the satisfaction shown at the birth of a child is the sense of awe evinced when a child is still-born or the woman miscarries. The Yao do not distinguish between still-births and abortions, both events being known by the word kwasanga. This is a verb and refers to the process of abortion; there is no term for the dead foetus itself. I made no attempt to enumerate miscarriages and still-births because they are supposed to be due to breaches of sexual taboos on the part of the husband and wife, and interviewees were naturally reluctant to mention them. Miscarriages and still-births are greatly feared, and the woman is considered to be in a very dangerous condition until she and her husband have carried out a ritual purification. Should a man have intercourse with a woman who has miscarried and not yet been purified he will contract a disease called lwaso which is believed to be invariably fatal. Still-born children or aborted foetuses are buried in a hole dug with sharpened sticks in the bush by the women, whereas children who are born alive and die afterwards are buried in the graveyard in graves dug by men with hoes. The burial spots of still-born babies or aborted foetuses are marked with a stone or broken pottery, since it is believed that to step on them will induce an illness. 845 [783] [753] [766]

The concern of the interested kin-groups is shown in the child-birth procedure. Birth normally takes place in a hut in the presence of the older female relatives of the woman and the female representatives of the man. The husband's representatives are necessary because the Yao, like many other Central African peoples, believe that an adulterine child will not be born to the woman unless she confesses (kupaca) the name of the genitor. If she persists in concealing the identity of the genitor, they 844

[1] ndembo = elephant, hence ivory. The terms lilibo and ndembo here both refer to the ivory beads traditionally worn by the woman in the pregnancy initiation ceremony. [192] [361]

1: Tew . E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

775 782 Kangomba, used to persuade Nyanja to help in the sacrificial rite. When Kapeni in turn fled to Mount Soche from the Ngoni, and died there, the Yao addressed their offerings to him, not to Kangomba.[1] The word Mulungu has sometimes been interpreted to mean Supreme Being, God, Creator, but among the Yao it seems not to have [776] a personal connotation. It was used to describe the agent in any mysterious event,[2] or the place where the ancestor spirits (masoka) were supposed to dwell. Daily life was [769] full of acts of respect towards the ancestors, who were regarded as jealous of the living, and requiring constant propitiation.[3]

Sorcery

754 Accusations of witchcraft and measures for dealing with it play a dominant role in Yao social life. With certain exceptions nearly all diseases and deaths are thought to be caused by sorcery. The exceptional causes are: the hand of God, old age, the transgression of certain taboos, and battle wounds. If sorcery is suspected the relatives of the sick or dead man consult the diviner to identify the offender.

Yao (in common with the Maravi and many peoples of Central Africa) believe that sorcerers have a craving for human flesh, which they satisfy by killing with magic the victims of their malice and hatred. They acquire their magical powers by an apprentice- [835] ship, which might include incestuous relations with mother, sister, or mother-in-law, or sleeping on the grave of the mother for one night. The sorcerer then learns the medicines and finally demonstrates his power by killing a young relative by magic; [266] he waits till the victim is buried, and then magically exhumes him for the secret feast with his fellow sorcerers. Each sorcerer who shares the flesh owes a debt to the one who secured the victim.

[75] Charms are used as preventive measures against sorcery. When a diviner has 754 diagnosed the cause of death as sorcery, retaliatory measures are taken. The headmen 683 of the village could either call in the witchfinder to identify the offender or he could call in the diviner to take action against all the sorcerers in the village. After the [695] diviner, Mabisalila, had revealed the guilty ones, they were challenged to take the poison ordeal to prove their innocence. If they died, the proof and the punishment were simultaneously accomplished. If they survived, the diviner was held to have been at fault and they were acquitted. The witch doctor was supposed to entice sorcerers to the graveside, and slay them with magic more powerful than their own.

[695] The diviner's findings are to-day checked by the poison ordeal administered to a chicken. A sorcerer detected in this way might be asked to provide medicine for the man whose sickness he had caused, or after a death he might be compelled to pay compensation. If the accused is a village headman, he will not be summoned before a chief, but his brother will take the villagers away from the sphere of his influence, or he may be chased away from the district. Accusations of sorcery follow certain regular lines. Nearly all accusations fall on relatives. Diviners are consulted by matrilineal relatives of the sick or dead person, and the man most usually accused is the brother of the accuser, or the husband of his sister. Witchcraft is therefore a manner of expressing the hostilities latent in these relations, which are, in the Yao social system, full of tension.

[1] Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, p. 70.
[2] Hetherwick, 3, 1902.
[3] Heckel, 1935, pp. 14–15; Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, pp. 58–75, 204–13.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

695
342
516

PLATE IV

A dispute in settlement at Chiwalo's hut. The assessor is sitting under the veranda behind the pole. A village headman can just be discerned in the shade under the veranda. The commoners sit in the sun.

(October 1948)

[facing p.56]

692 but some also on having killed children by ndaka[1] (a disease caused by the mystical influence of sexual intercourse). Secondly, [673] other cases not brought to the court are petty squabbles which do not involve heavy compensation. Examples of these disputes are personal quarrels, disputes over land ownership, petty theft and so on. The Native Authority's court handles mainly cases arising from adultery, which involve compensation varying from £1 10s. to £5; and theft and assault for which similar compensation may be payable. If the case is brought up to the chief's court there is a mechanism whereby the compensation 696 may be enforced. Ordinarily, in those cases which are not tried in the court house, there is no legal sanction behind the payment of the compensation, so that if a man defaults in payment no legal pressure can be brought to bear on him. It is for this reason that such cases are tried in the court house.

695 The cases are heard by the court assessors who call the witnesses and cross-examine them. Sometimes a chief or his repre- 693 sentative is in the court, as at Kawinga's court, but sometimes as in Chiwalo's court, the chief never comes to the court house at all. After the evidence is sifted, one court assessor takes the case to the chief and tells him about it. On the basis of the court assessor's analysis he awards compensation and imposes fines. The court assessor then takes this information back to the court house, reassembles the protagonists, and announces the chief's decision. The losing party has then the opportunity to appeal, first to the court of the Native Authority, if the case was tried in a Subordinate Native Authority's court, and then to the District Commissioner.

Cases tried by the chief in his extra-Administrative capacity are usually tried outside the court house. The same personalities take part in the trial but they act now with reference to a different set of values. The procedure is exactly the same, except that in Chiwalo's area the chief is present at the hearing. He sits somewhat aside from the main body of people but within hearing distance, weaving a mat or making nets while the case is being tried.

692 In minor cases, if either of the parties is dissatisfied with the 643 decision, he may take the case up to the chief for arbitration and, theoretically, may then take it from him if he is a Subordinate

[1] See Chap. V, p. 112.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

 622 compounds, especially in areas where there are man-eating lions,[1] 554 so that it is no longer an infallible indicator of the hut-owner's 351 rank.

Minor village headmen always allow their superiors to sit on 622 a chair. If village headmen of commensurate status are present, 554 chairs may be sought for them all. But a minor village headman 576 never occupies a chair, even if one is available, in the presence of his superior. At a meeting, for example, a chief occupies a chair and so may his most important nduna or councillor. The more important headmen sit alone on separate mats, for a man only shares a mat with his equals, and then only rarely. Junior headmen, however many there are, have to try to squeeze themselves on to one mat or squat on the ground.

Important headmen also have the right of walking in front of their juniors. If there are three or four headmen returning from, say, a court case, they arrange themselves in the pathway in an order which reflects their rank. As they file down the narrow field paths the leader is the most senior among the group. After him come the other headmen and last of all the commoners. This order of precedence is also followed when initiands pass through the tribal initiation ceremonies. The sisters' sons and other matrilineal descendants of important headmen precede those of the less important headmen. At Chiwalo's hut also, I [695] have noticed that the more important headmen sit under the verandah while listening to private cases. The less important headmen sit with the commoners under a shelter or out in the sun.

I have been discussing the visible marks of prestige. But high 622 rank also tends to carry with it some other privileges which are 554 not immediately observable. The most obvious is Government 648 recognition. I have already mentioned that under the 1912 Ordinance, village headmen were recognized by the Administration. These Administrative village headmen, who had certain duties to perform, were paid a small annuity and were in earlier days given a 'book' in which the tax payments could be recorded. To-day, the Yao still describe Government recognition as 'having a book'. Administrative village headmen derived more benefit from Government recognition than merely an

[1] The huts in Plate IX (a) and (b) are in Namwera area where there are man-eating lions. Most huts have compounds. A large proportion of huts in areas where there are no lions also have compounds.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

that Asubiya in her jealousy had gone to grumble to Bt. Ntalika about this. Rajabu (F20) who had heard about this called Cikoja and they assembled Bt. Amisa, Bt. Bwana Isa and Asubiya in Bt. Amisa's hut, and spoke to them about the dangers of backbiting. Cikoja remonstrated with the women saying, 'I don't want to hear about this again. When you love people do not love people who are strangers. Do not talk behind people's backs and bring war in the knots of your body-cloths.' 613 578 754

A few weeks after this, in June 1948, Aluwinda (F47), a 3½-year-old daughter of Asubiya, died. When her mother saw that the child was seriously ill she took her to her patrilateral relatives in Liwonde area. She had barely got there when the child died. The headman of the village sent a message back to Cikoja to tell him of the death. He in turn sent a message to Amidu and Rajabu and they went to the village to attend the funeral. After the first mourning feast three days after the funeral, Kaifa, the child's mother's elder sister's son, and Malawago, representing the village in which the child had died, went to a diviner who indicated that the cause lay in the backbiting of Asubiya about Bt. Amisa, but that the sorcerer was Bt. Ntalika. The tension now had reached almost breaking point and after about six months Bt. Ntalika moved out into Liwonde area without announcing that she was going.

At the end of December, Asubiya's son Selemu (F46), aged 4½, suddenly became ill one night. In the morning Amidu and Rajabu and Nkatawila (D20), who was the husband's marriage surety, went to a diviner. He indicated that the cause was a girls' initiation basket which Ayesi kept. This basket, the diviner said, kept losing its strength and it was only on the death of a close relative that it would regain power. They returned and when they got near the village they could hear the women keening. They agreed that the diviner was a liar and returned and got their money back. The body was buried on January 3rd, 1949. Asubiya now left the village without announcing her intention and went to complain to chief Kawinga. Cikoja in the meantime, noticing that Asubiya was not present at the funeral, sent out men to search for her. After two days Kawinga's chief court assessor, Masunda, brought Asubiya back to the village. He told Cikoja that he had cross-examined her and found that she said her elder sister was causing death because of her jealousy over the food. Masunda returned and some days later Kawinga wrote a letter to Cikoja telling him to come to the court village. This he did and was told to hold the mourning feast, but to take the people to the court village to hold the funeral meeting. There a divining party would be arranged and the cause of the death determined. 613 578 754 695

After the first funeral feast the people of Cikoja assembled at

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

613 Kawinga's court village. Masunda reviewed the events leading up 578 to the calling of the meeting and asked Cikoja to give his statement.
754 Cikoja replied, 'You say I am finishing the people. I do not deny it. If the people are being finished by my sister, then I am finishing 695 them.[1] You may speak what is in your hearts.' Asubiya now made her statement. After this, Bt. Amisa was called out. She denied knowing anything about the case. Masunda at this point was about to send the case back to Cikoja when Matosa, a second arbitrator, asked who the marriage sureties were. Amidu came forth as the woman's surety. Matosa asked him to tell the court about Asubiya's marriage relationships. Amidu then reviewed the history of Asubiya's pregnancies. He pointed out that the first child had died.[2] The second one also died. The diviner had indicated that she had broken a sexual taboo and the child had died from ndaka as a result. The third child was still alive. The fourth had died recently. The fifth was the one about whom there was a case that day. He recounted how they had gone to a diviner and how he had indicated that the cause of the death lay in the backbiting which the person herself had done. Masunda cross-questioned Amidu about the ndaka medicine that was given and assured himself the complainant was satisfied that the second child had died of ndaka and not sorcery. Masunda then called Salimu since the woman was living at the old village site under Salimu's charge. Salimu, who works as a tailor in an Indian store some miles away, said that he did not have a great knowledge of the case. Cikoja said he had nothing to say. Eventually, after some hours of cross-questioning, Masunda decided that a divining party must be made up and the results of the divination reported to the court. Bt. Amisa now stood up and said she was prepared to undergo the poison ordeal to prove that she was not a sorceress. She said that she would go with them to the diviner to find out the cause of the death of the child. Masunda said that they would leave the matter at that. At the village they would have to decide on a divining party and they would have to give poison to a chicken to make sure that the divination was correct. After that Cikoja would have to report the matter to Kawinga and the case would be re-opened. Nyenje was at the inquest and said to Cikoja that if they were not relatives he would have other words to say to him about this business. As it was he did not see what he had to rejoice about. Cikoja said that he did not know, but that Nyenje should ask the owner of the village.
Surprised, Nyenje said, 'Who is that?' Cikoja indicated Salimu.

[1] Cikoja is talking as a representative of his lineage here.

[2] The first death in a family is never divined for, because the Yao say that if this is done, it 'would chase the father away'.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

Salimu said that Cikoja ought not to speak like that because it only made things difficult.

Two days after this Cikoja called a meeting at Salimu's hut in order to choose a divining party. Eventually they chose Kanyenga, Asimama, Raisi and Musa. Musa was the witness for Kanyenga who represented the woman's party. Raisi represented the father's party, and Asimama went to be his witness. Cikoja gave them 5*s.* and they went to look for a diviner. Eventually they found one and Kanyenga opened the consultation. The diviner indicated that the cause of the death of the child was litukula.[1] The party paid him and looked for a place to sleep. The following day they sought another diviner. Kanyenga again consulted and was told that Bt. Ntalika and her son were sorcerers but that the mother herself was ill with litukula. Kanyenga rejected the litukula explanation and insisted on the sorcery of Bt. Ntalika and Cilimba. The diviner consulted again and said that the main cause of the death was the litukula and that the sorcery of Bt. Ntalika was added to the other. Asimama here insisted that the sorceress in reality was Bt. Amisa. The diviner rejected this. He said the best way to test the divination was to give poison to a chicken. The party was at a loss to know what to do. In two divinations, a likango was indicated twice, while sorcery was said to cloud the issue. They decided to give a chicken poison. They returned to Rajabu's hut in the village where he had married. Here they sent Rajabu to tell Salimu that they were about to test a chicken at the poison ordeal, but that he must not tell Cikoja. They gave two chickens poison, one for litikula of the mother and one for the sorcery of Bt. Amisa. The litukula chicken died, indicating that Bt. Amisa was innocent. When Cikoja was told this he refused to believe it and sent them to poison another two chickens. The result was the same. He now decided that he would take the divination to a distant place and chose to go to Ngokwe chiefdom. Kanyenga led the divination party again. They consulted the diviner and after much testing and retesting the diviner decided that the sorcerers were Bt. Ntalika and Cilimba and that the litukula had nothing to do with it. He also specifically excluded Bt. Amisa. The diviner now told the father's two representatives to stay behind while the woman's representatives fetched Cikoja. When he came, the diviner revealed the result to him personally. Cikoja was at a loss what to do in this situation. Two divinations including poison tests had indicated that likango was the cause, a third and very exhaustive one had revealed Bt. Ntalika and her son. Neither had indicated Bt. Amisa.

[1] Litukula is a type of pimple (the generic term for which is likango) which, when it comes to a head and bursts, causes the death of the last-born child.

613 578 754 695

613 Eventually, in March, he decided to take the case up to Kawinga's 578 court. Cikoja was not willing to accuse Bt. Ntalika and Cilimba 754 publicly. Accordingly he went to Kawinga but he did not send for 695 Bt. Ntalika. When Masunda, the court assessor, heard this he refused to handle the case and told Cikoja that Bt. Ntalika had to be brought to court so that they could hear her statement. Cikoja and his people came back to the village and nothing more was done about it. In April, Rajabu wrote a letter to Cikoja telling him that he wanted to report him to Kawinga and to bring a charge for compensation against him because he had falsely accused his mother of sorcery.

I left the field in June and do not know what the result was.

The series of events are extremely complex. I have given only a summary of them. Nevertheless, the main themes in the history are clear enough. We see Cikoja as the representative of the lineage of any order whatsoever. We find in particular the opposition of the two collateral brothers, Kanyenga and Cilimba. They are the representatives of the two lineage segments in this situation. There is seldom any doubt about the affiliation of these two personalities. Consistently in the accounts of the divinations each rejects the diviner's finding if it accuses a member of his lineage segment. Note that the divination seance itself becomes a field in which the opposition of the segments is expressed. Kanyenga continued consulting diviners until finally he got the answer he wanted. His opponents rejected these findings and eventually even discounted the chicken ordeal. The diviners' findings and the results of the poison ordeals, therefore, are bandied about between the opposed groups, and though the whole procedure of divination and accusations of sorcery is directed towards the extirpation of discordant elements in the community, in fact, it is only a facet of the underlying cause of the tension—the opposition of segments in an ever-segmenting lineage.

613 In addition to the structural opposition of Kanyenga and 578 Cilimba there is a certain amount of tension among Cikoja's uterine sisters. Bt. Amisa, Asimama, Ayesi and Asubiya have all had children. Bt. Amisa is the senior and the relationships between her and any of the other sisters are difficult. In addition to this there is the tension between the generations seen in the attempts of the sons of Amisa to bring a compensation claim

3:Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

751 757 825

Again, charm medicine may be contained in various articles which are also generally worn round the neck. The teeth and claws of the beasts of prey are so employed, generally arranged in pairs bound together so as to form a crescent and suspended from a string. The teeth of crocodiles, lions, leopards, and the claws of the same beasts and of some large birds of prey are thus employed. The teeth etc., are in themselves charms against injury, probably against what one might call homologous injury. The idea of stuffing them with medicine is probably a secondary consideration, a process of fortification of the charm so that its use comes to have a more powerful influence. It is interesting to see of late years that the native, recognizing the decorative value of these crescent-shaped amulets, has begun to copy them in lead and ivory. A series of these of graduated size is worn as a necklace by women.

756

When a medicine-man is consulted, part payment is made in advance, "payment to go and dig medicine (roots)." The rest of the payment is made when the cure is effected. Should a patient not be satisfied with his treatment and wish to consult some other medicine-man, he pays to the first a quarter of the fee he would have paid if his cure had been effected; this is called "paying him to get his medicine away." Unless this is done, should he recover later, he will be liable to claims for full fees from all of the medicine-men he has consulted; each will say his own medicine has gone on acting and has effected the cure. A medicine-man may take a case he is treating into his own house.

In prescribing medicine, very particular instructions are given with an embargo on certain things which may or may not have some use and significance. A medicine-man in 1891 at Malenya's, who inoculated every one in the forehead with bullet proof medicine, said that no one must step across a wusi (pestle for pounding grain), and no one must eat the leaves of the sweet potato.

A medicine-man always partakes of part of the decoction he is giving to a patient to show that it is harmless; I think these preparations are mostly inactive. I should hate to sample all the castor oil I have prescribed, though many natives have had suspicions about me when I have not done so.

137 298

Poisons. Though there are a large number of species in this country, both vegetable and animal, from which poison might be extracted, those that have gained any reputation among natives and have come under my observation are but few in number. Mwai (Mwabi Chin.) "the ordeal poison," is the bark of Erythrophleum guineensis. The natives distinguish two varieties of mwai, the two trees differing slightly in leaf, flower and bark; mwai is the Erythrophleum guineensis, the second variety known as mperanjilu is doubtless an allied species. Mwai is the poison employed in the poison ordeal.[1] It is administered in a poisonous dose as a decoction of the bark, recovery or otherwise depending on whether or not the poison is voided by vomiting. Natives give as the symptoms headache, giddiness, disturbances of vision, vomiting and purging, with slowing of heart beat. Mper-

[695]

[1] Vide infra, p. [illegible].

3:Stanzus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

754 A wusui may be met with under different circumstances. An educated native told me of his experience one night when riding a bicycle back to a township where he was employed. Coming along a smooth-hoed path with his lamp alight, he become aware of the presence of something in the bush in front and at the side of him. Suddenly his lamp was smashed and he was left in darkness, while something pushed him over so hard that he fell off his cycle. Picking himself up, he started to wheel his cycle on, when there appeared on the path in front, figures who, rubbing their hands together to produce a phosphorescent glow, held them up in front of the boy's face. He was, however, not molested further, and coming to a group of huts he knew, he went in and made inquiries as to the cause of his experience and was promptly told that there was a man living in a hut near the spot on the path where they had occurred who was supposed to be wusui. Such a story is given for what it is worth. The boy was about twenty-two years old, a highly educated native with an intelligent appreciation of the worth of superstition.

Some wusui demonstrations can have no object but to strike terror and keep up the prestige of the wusui class. Mr. Moggridge wrote me, "A boy of mine was certainly attacked and squeezed about the neck by a man whom he described as naked, huge, and slightly luminous, on the road at the back of my house in Blantyre. The boy was strolling up and down in the dusk and had nothing about him to provoke robbery; he was almost choked before he managed to let out a yell which determined his assailant to let him go. He was not a local boy and no theory of personal spite was supportable. I thought and still think that the motive was to show that even the Resident's servant twenty yards from the Resident's house was not safe from wusui." It seems possible that some natives with intent to rob had pretended to be wusui but recognizing that their victim was likely to cause trouble, they went no further.

[824] It is said that the phosphorescence is produced by rubbing in the hands two vegetable substances from local trees and that this is the method the wusui adopt to announce their presence.

754 Poison Ordeal. As I have said above, when anyone sickens or dies, the illness or death is likely to be considered the work of some one who is wusui, and action will be taken by the ● 695 relatives to find him out. The proceedings in such a case where witchcraft is suspected will now be briefly sketched; though I give an account of a case from beginning to end as if it occurred at the present time, it must be understood that the giving of wusui, the ordeal poison, is now much less common than formerly. A man becomes ill in some village and does not get better, so the caster-of-lots is consulted. The sick man's relatives or friends go to the [787] lot-caster and approach the subject indirectly by asking him his advice about a number of imaginary cases; they may say, "Things have been stolen from our house." The lots are cast and the caster replies, "No, you have not come to see me about that." This may go on for hours before the facts of the case proper are mentioned to him. Finally, they tell him that one of their relatives is ill in the village, the lots are consulted and advice is given as to procuring medicine for him from a medicine-man. If the caster of lots is suspicious that 754 some one has caused the illness, he will at the same time add, "Let us and so pray," mentioning the name of the man whom he suspects. Following the advice given, the medicine- 695 man is consulted. He promises to get medicine for the sick man and goes into the forest to search for it. Having returned, he prepares his decoctions and having first partaken of a little himself, he gives it to his patient with further instructions. The friends of the sick man having returned to the village, indirectly ask the man on whom suspicion has been cast to pray for the sick man saying, "He is covered by some spirit." The man prays, [782] sometimes using ndapani and beginning chonde! chonde! "please! please!" and goes on to ask Mlungu to take away the spirit which has covered the sick man, adding that he himself is innocent of any ill doing against the man and that any grudge he may have had against him is now forgotten.

3:Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT? Yao FT?

If the sick man recovers, well and good, but should he die, there is more to be done. 754
The morning following the burial, the relatives go to the chief and in answer to his inquiry 695
of what they are going to do, they say they must again consult the caster-of-lots. They 791
will choose some one who lives a long way off and is not cognizant of the death of their relative: those who go to him have not been shaved after the funeral. Much the same business is gone through as on the first occasion but, in the end, the caster-of-lots is told that they suspect some one unknown to have brought about the death of their relative. The names of all the possible persons are given, the lots cast in each case and, eventually, one is picked out as the guilty man; the caster-of-lots saying, "If I am not telling the truth, you can test my words by giving mwai (ordeal poison) to a fowl; if it does not die, come back and break up all my properties."

He may have gained information from his lots that the suspect is a man of power gained by some special rite, e.g. the midnight bath on the ant hill, in which case he will insist that the fowl poison-ordeal must take place on an ant hill or he will give other specific instructions. On the way back, the relatives will buy two fowls; mwai will be prepared by a boy who has not passed through his initiation ceremonies, and two of the party will be chosen as pleaders, one for the deceased, the other for the accused. One fowl is then selected to represent the accused and the poison administered according to the conditions laid down by the lot-thrower, while the two pleaders give injunctions to it, one saying, "You are guilty; you shall die"; the other, "You are innocent and you shall show your innocence by vomiting the poison and recovering." If the fowl dies, a third man cuts off its head, saying, "I am the butler of the dead." Mwai is then administered to the second fowl to ascertain whether any other persons are involved. The head of the first fowl is singed, stuck on a stick and carried back with the party towards their village. A little way outside, they halt in the bush, and send word to the headman that they are returning. He then comes out privately to see them, asking what has happened, and is told all the events in sequence.

759
595

One of the group is chosen to go in the morning and summon some one to appear on behalf of the accused man. He and the headmen join the party in the bush when the whole of the case from the beginning of the deceased's illness, is again related, ending with the fowl test and dramatic statement of the name of the accused, whereupon the fowl's head on its stick is planted in the ground opposite to the man who has appeared for him as he squats listening to the story. The man who has been called to defend the accused, though the latter may have no particular claim on his kinsmen, is in honor bound to do his best. As the fowl's head is planted opposite him, he will shift quickly to one side, protecting the innocence of the accused. All then adjourn to the village to put the case before the chief. One of the men acts as prosecutor, again going through the whole case, calling witnesses and others to aid him in speaking. The accused is then defended by the man chosen for the purpose, assisted by others whom he asks to help him. They may speak for a week or more. The chief decides the case, and the result will be communicated to the defendant by his pleader.

If he is found guilty of causing the death of the deceased, he must pay the fine inflicted or if he has been accused actually of witchcraft, he may have to undergo, or may offer to undergo, the mwavi ordeal poison himself or the test may be made with a dog tied to the leg of the accused man. If the ordeal is satisfactory to the defendant, the man claims compensation for wrongful accusation. If he dies with mwavi, his relatives have to pay compensation for the crime he is thereby shown to have committed.

[292] If either party is dissatisfied with the chief's decision, recourse may be had to a hearing before another chief, the first being very glad to be rid of the case. The second gives judgment quickly. If the case goes on to a poison-ordeal, a day is fixed and the accused is taken out to some spot two or three miles from the village where a hut is built called ndowe (place of torture). Accompanied by the two pleaders, he remains here for several days. People from the village come out and attempts are made to make him confess any accomplices; beans are fried over coals and when very hot are put into the accused's hands and his fists closed over them, or they are put in a cloth which is fastened round the protracts, or bamboo sticks are arranged one on either side of the head and tightened by a string.

The third day, natural undyed bark-cloth is obtained and men go out to fetch the mwavi poison, two men from each party, the prosecutor and the defendants. One man sent by the prosecutor has actually to take the bark from the tree, while the others look on to see fair play. The bark can only be taken from the east or west side of a tree; it may not be cut with a knife or axe or be pulled off, but must be cut with a stone and allowed to fall; only a piece which falls with the inner surface lying upwards is taken. Any of the party may carry it but they must on no account leave one another. Having returned, they hide the mwavi.

On the appointed day, the big drum is sounded and a crier goes round saying that everyone who wants to see or and no drink mwavi must go to the appointed place. Every large village had its regular place of torture and mwai drinking, two or three miles from the village. Those used by Malemya, the old Zomba chief, may still be seen. 754

3:Stanzaa D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

A clear way is made two feet broad and fourteen feet long in the bush and here the accused takes up his position attended on either side by the two pleaders, the defending pleader on the right, the prosecuting on the left. Facing east or west or following the directions originally given by the master-of-kita, that is, taking up the position in which the accused is supposed to take a midnight bath, or practice some rite under a tree or an ant hill, etc., he is given a decoction of mwai to drink from a gourd. This decoction is made on the spot, the bark being pounded up on a stone by one of the prosecutors. The accused must have had no food that day. He then starts to walk up and down the short cleared path with the two men, one on either side of him, the one saying, "Now you have drunk mwai, you shall die as you deserve; you did in fo-and-fo," the other denying the accusations, saying, "He shall vomit the poison." He is watched by the assembled crowd who note the various symptoms of which vomiting is the first and said to be the most characteristic. After this has gone on for some time, they watch for what is called the mpungo which is said to be "a ball of bile formed in the mouth and expelled by vomiting so that it bounds on reaching the ground but not before", followed often by a second ball, twenty minutes later. Should this be expelled, recovery may be expected, foreshadowed by clearing of the vision. If he recovers, he is indeed a wonderful man and is hailed on all sides. The women trill with their tongues and shout, and he is carried back in triumph; the defending pleader will swagger about and demand anything he wants for his client. 695

A fatal termination is characterized by little and non-forcible vomiting. Purging is common but said to be painless. Vision is affected and as time goes on, the spectators ask what he can see, "Do you see that over there?" indicating a hill. If he makes mistakes, then they say, "Ah, he is going to die!"

The poison may not take full effect for three or four hours. The end is ushered in by a last stage when the legs become weak; he staggers, then unable to stand any longer, falls to the ground dead, succeeded by the onlookers who rush in and hurl stones upon the body, crushing it. The relatives take the mangled corpse and lay it on logs covered with grass in the bush. No other covering is permitted. It may be placed in a tree by people acting as uncle. Burial is forbidden. [766]

In some cases mwai used to be burned, not being given the chance of the poison trial. This took place at a recognized spot like ndaso. The last man to be burned by Malemya was Mtubula in 1902. Burning was also a punishment in some bad cases of murder. Such was the fate of Chingale. The man was put in a sharo-stick, a pile of logs was built round him and then set on fire. [683]

Witch-finder. In addition to ordeal poison, another method of discovering a wizard is by "smelling out." If a number of people have died in a certain village, the inhabitants may begin to think that there is a wizard among them, and procure the services of a mbindo. 754 695 791

3: Stanton D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

754
695
741

M'ninkile is a Chinyanja word from ku-bisa, "to hide," referring to his custom of hiding in the village; the practice is originally Mang'anja, since adopted by the Yao. M'ninkile is often a woman and may be young.[1] She comes to stay in the village unknown to the people, lives in a watch house in the gardens and is said to go about at night when she is able to summon masoi persons from their houses. The fee for her services is paid beforehand. Later, the villagers are assembled and going round the company holding out flour in her hand, she calls upon Ee-and-Ee as the guilty man saying, "This is his 'night-name.'" The villagers all answer, "There is no one of that name in the village." She then goes round again and throwing the flour over the accused, utters his ordinary name and runs off into the bush, not to appear again. The accused may then offer to take masoi (ordeal poison) to prove his innocence or if it is a case of illness only and not death, he may be treated by a medicine man, the process being called ku-lapisile, "to take evil things out of."

A masoi man is sometimes said to renounce his old practices and may then be received into the company of mbinkile. A famous mbinkile near Zomba affirms that he used to be masoi. The mode of action of mbinkile varies greatly with different men; for some the ceremony is quite a minor matter; in other cases, it is an important affair.

Witch-destroyer. Where death is suspected to have resulted from masoi, steps may be taken immediately to catch and kill the masoi. For this purpose, the help of the mundu jasankhale is sought. Ku-ankhala means "to break off the end of a stick"; it appears to be both a Chinyanja and a Chiyao word. The word refers to the practice of the professional witch-killer who is supposed to run a stick through the anus up the bowel of his victim and then break it off, leaving part inside. The jasankhale having been informed of the approaching funeral hides in the bush near the graveyard and watches the interment. After everyone has gone, he is free to put in operation that for which he has been called. The following modus operandi is related of a celebrated mundu jasankhale called Angwi of Zomba. The water in which the corpse had been first washed was obtained and put in an earthenware dish. He also provided himself with a gourd containing medicines and some stones, and another gourd filled with poison made from crocodile gall to anoint the mbinkile sticks. He also had a small antelope's horn containing medicine which when smeared on the head rendered him invisible, together with the stalks of a species of millet called mbabwe which shoots its grains at a touch, and a whistle made from the horn of a small antelope, the ulibi.

So provided, he proceeded to the grave, around which he drew a ring with medicine contained in still another horn. Within this circle, all was safe. This was followed by a square immediately around the grave with a stone from the gourd placed at each side, north, south, east and west. The plate of water was placed on top of the grave. The mundu jasankhale then anointed himself with the medicine which made him invisible to the masoi and sitting within the circle, he blew his whistle which was audible to the sunsi man who was then induced to come out of his house. When he had reached the grave, the water was sprinkled over him by the jumakutala with the millet stalk from the dish on the grave, or he was struck with the gun's tail; in either case, he fell to the ground senseless. He was then ready to be dealt with. The whistle sticks, small bamboos filled with crocodile poison, were pushed up the anus and broken off to liberate the poison. Sticks might also be inserted behind the ear or in various other spots. The sunsi was then beaten to wake him up; he ran off to his own village and there, a little later, he sickened and died, telling no one the cause. After death, the ancle when preparing the corpse of the hitherto unsuspected sunsi, might find the end of the stick projecting from the anus or see the puncture elsewhere with the medicine adhering to them, and the man was revealed in his true colors.

[1] Cf. Sapir, op. cit., p. 200.

3:Stanton D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Tao FT7

754
695
791

At Mwichie's village, there was a man called Lisuga who professed to be able to extract the poison injected by the jumakutala by causing his patients to undergo a vapor bath and to drink certain decoctions. This man would never reveal the name of anyone who came to him for treatment but would brag that "trade was brisk." The symptoms of the mortal malady caused by the whistle are said to be intestinal obstruction with tremendous distention of the abdomen (peritonitis).

[161]

Of this same village, a story is told which, if not true, at all events illustrates the sort of thing that is believed. As has been mentioned above, whenever the jumakutala blows his little horn, any sunsi will hear it and thinking it is one of their hand calling, will go to meet him. A woman of this village told how she and her husband were sitting over the fire while the evening meal was cooking, when he suddenly jumped up and said he must go outside for a bit. She remonstrated and asked him to wait for his food, but he hurried off. Later he returned, complaining of feeling very ill; his belly swelled up and he died soon after. It was said that this man was very friendly with a woman named Abihi and that when he went out into the bush, he was heard calling in a low voice, "Is that you, Abihi?" When his body was examined, two punctures were found on the left side of the chest. It was supposed that it was Abihi he expected to meet and with her enjoy a cannibalistic repast, whereas it was a jumakutala who had called and killed him.

This brief outline of a case of sickness, suspicion of witchcraft, death, and the consultation with the water-of-lots, the witch-finder, ordeal poison, death, and the catching of the cannibal witch, has been given as a more or less connective story in order that it may be most easily understood. Some further details concerning the lot-caster, witchcraft, etc., must be added.

Lot-casting. Medicine men who cast lots were at one time fairly plentiful and were consulted on many matters, often of small importance from a European point of view. Chief of all were questions of witchcraft. The modus operandi varied in different cases. In sunsi and other important matters, the medicine man always used the chimuyo (divining in-

787

3: Stanzas D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

787 spoke is invariably nasal in character and Chinyanja is the language always used. It is doubtless a case of what we should call ventriloquism. The custom is evidently of Mang'anja origin but is great favor with the Yao.

787 Divination also plays an important part in tracing thieves or stolen property or in picking out from a number of people anyone guilty of some crime. Several modes of procedure
● 695 may be adopted. The chisanga called ndumbo may be used as the chisanga cha chipeta (chipeta, a kind of basket). Medicine in the form of certain roots is placed on the ground and covered by the inverted basket on which is placed the ndumbo. Each person in turn is requested to lift the basket and the guilty one is at once revealed by his inability to budge the basket off the ground. This method may even be used to reveal a man guilty of sexual.

787 Other methods of divination include a kind of trial by ordeal somewhat similar to a boiling water ordeal. Kaundula (from ku-undula, to tramp round, referring to the peregrinations made in search of what is lost, or nundundu, the Chinyanja word from ku-lunda, to follow on the footsteps of) is the name of the witch-doctor who searches for stolen property or traces the thief. The same man may be called mulowndula in Chinyanja (from ku-ounduln, to reveal) when he uses his instrument to detect in a crowd the person guilty of some crime. The kaundula uses the horn of a kudu stuffed with appropriate medicine, the actual mizo or ulwa and methods adopted varying somewhat with different practitioners. The practice I believe to be a Mang'anja one and I think most of the operators were Anyanja men and not Yao, though the Yao, as with other customs, adopted the system fully. In my district, the kaundula was usually armed with a rattle; when the horn indicated the guilty individual, he intimated the fact to the assembled crowd by throwing flour over him.

When a search is to be made for stolen property, the horn is put into the hands of four men, alternate men pressing down and pulling up on the long horn, while the medicine man stands by, operating his rattle and exhorting the horn to do its work of revelation. I know a man who has on several occasions assisted in holding the horn; he said it simply seemed to drag him on in a series of jerky movements, sometimes going very fast, at other times moving slowly, dragging the holders "along the footsteps of the thief with the stolen goods" in and out of the house, through the bush, and across streams, until suddenly the horn dropped from their hands to the ground, where on digging, the stolen goods were found buried. (Cf. table turning, planchette, etc.)

[114] A good description of kaundula under the headings mulowndula and nundundu is given by Garbutt,[1] who describes the Mang'anja operators. In this same article, he makes the mistake of describing as nundundu, the fumbatula. As I have stated above, the fumbatula is an order of medicine men who trap the man who is an mumvi while in the mumvi state, but the nundundu points him out while he appears as an ordinary man of the village.

[1] H. W. Garbutt, "Native customs in Nyasa," (Man, London, 1912, vol. 12, p. 30-42).

192

The dog.....uwe uwe! (as in bed).
The cat.....ngwa!
The cock.....kokokoko!
The lion.....ho ho ho!
The duck.....bwa bwa bwa!
The cow.....mwa!
The sheep.....bee! (as in letter).
The goat.....mbe!
The dove.....coo coo!
The lion.....ng'wanang'a!

195 578 Among the Yao, abuse and obscene language are rare; expressions which appear in other languages all the world over are only used on great provocation and commonly with dire results. This, too, is opposed to the ways of neighboring tribes, the Anyanja and Angoni, who freely make use of such expressions as "Ngini pa mukal" and "Nkwapa wa mukal" "The pudenda of your mother! Clitoris of your mother!"

The following exclamations of abuse and expressions of obscenity will be seen to follow very closely upon those in other countries.

1. Mwinikwa! (to a girl or woman), mbulula! (to a boy or man) means you are a person who has not been to your Unyago, and therefore "you are without manners!"

2. Mwana mkwapa! an expression to a child meaning "you little wretch," "you nasty little thing!"

3. Akubile kwal kpusa! he cuts with the back of his hand, he is uncircumcised, i.e. "he is a dirty person!"

4. A man with big ears is hailed "look at your ears like a lemur!" (Likwaka, a lemur).

A Yao woman seldom or never swears at or uses bad language to a man nor the contrary; the woman, however, is not behindhand in the art of bitter complaining and nagging.

[209] Pulling down the lower eyelid with the finger accompanying some exclamation has exactly the same significance as in European countries, "I am not so green as I look!"

Ku-mwa is to make a sound like "pish" with the mouth, and is a great insult, for which a man will fight.

Showing of the lips to one side as in the action to get rid of the sour skin of a fruit, ku-mwa 'g'wapa is an expression of contemptuous disgust.

● 695 539 The similarity to European ways is again seen in swearing or taking oath. A Yao swears by the spirits of his ancestors or by a chief:

"Chiwi cha Mukwapa!"
"(By) the grave of Mukwapa!"

or he may indirectly name some ancestor:

"Ngakwikile kpungu!" or "Ngakwikile kulaka!"
"I swear by the spear!" "I swear by the lion!"

3:Stanner D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

695
539

meaning I swear by the spirits of him who was killed with a spear (or by a lion), referring to some one well known to have in such wise met his end, or again:

"Kyakumbila kumala kwa wanda!"
"I swear by the faith of (all) men!"

an equivalent to swearing by the day of judgment; or again a man may swear by his own death:

"Libako lingingila ni'mapikwanda!"
"Earth may it enter (my) mouth!"

or he will intimate that his throat should be cut by drawing his finger across the neck, if he does not speak the truth.

There is a gibe around Zomba in swearing. A man saying, "I swear so and so," is asked, "By whose grave-house? Mwali wa chawi?" The man who is in reality only bluffing will say, "Chakoma! By Chakoma's grave!" Chakoma a small headman near Zomba of whom much fun is made.

Native stories. The fables or stories found among the Zomba Yao are many of them variations of well known tales, and have been collected to some extent by others. I only propose to add here five translations of a few I do not remember to have read elsewhere. 539

The Hare and the Elephant

The elephant made a big garden and planted sugar-cane. When it had grown, he asked all the other animals to come and partake of it with him. When they had all assembled, the buffalo, the eland, and all the other antelopes, the zebra and all the smaller animals, the elephant invited them to eat. He made one condition, however, anyone who, having chewed the sugar-cane, made a sucking sound as he swallowed the juice before spitting out the fibrous part would be killed (lu-jenga, Chin. lu-gunda, to suck, making the sound "ashkoh").

So the animals all sat in a long line and the buffalo started chewing his piece of sugar-cane, but when he tried to get all the juice out of his piece, he went "ashkoh!" so the elephant twisted his head till he was dead, and then picking him up, threw the carcass aside. The same fate followed for the eland, for all the antelopes and the lion, so that the other animals became afraid and would not volunteer to eat the sugar-cane but went away and the carcasses of the dead animals were buried. The elephant then appointed another day and invited the animals to come again and try.

That day, the hare came and made salutation by clapping to the elephant who demanded what he wanted, so the hare replied, "I have come to eat sugar-cane." "You know my rule," said the elephant. "Yes," said the hare, "I know your rule but I want some sugar-cane." So he was given some while all the other animals looked on to see what would happen. "Please," said the hare to the elephant, "may I have the outside part stripped office tended to become hereditary. Each councillor had his own village which he 631 administered as a headman. A second set of officials were the court assessors, mapungu, who, unlike the councillors, were not in charge of villages of their own in addition to their court duties. Their office was not hereditary and they were chosen for their wisdom and their debating ability. They lived at the court of the chief and their main [692] duty was to sift the evidence in the judicial cases which came before him.

1: Tew E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

The village headmen were expected to send elephant tusks to the chief (receiving [651] small gifts in return), and to invite him to a yearly beer drink. Like the chief, the village headman governed through a council of the most important men in his village. They 631 constituted a kind of village court over which he presided, and in the old days he 692
could give capital sentence, or award a fine of as many as four slaves. Appeal from his decision lay to the court of the superior headman, or to the chief. Important cases would be reported direct to the chief. Most crimes would be settled by compensation. In cases of murder, several slaves were paid to the kin of the victim, and a fine for spilling blood to the chief. When compensation was handed over, the recipient always returned some part of it as sign that friendship was restored.[1]

Macdonald's further account of the treatment of crime shows how weak was the 696
political organization, in spite of the apparent orderliness of the system of inferior and superior courts. A murderer caught red-handed might be killed at once. If captured alive he might be ransomed on payment of a fine of from four to twenty slaves, [567] some of whom might be killed to accompany the dead. If the murderer escaped a relative of his would be captured and ransomed. This applied to murders occurring among parties friendly to one another and living in the same village. If the murderer was from another village, the injured village, if strong enough, would fall upon the other and kill and enslave the inhabitants. If not strong enough, the chief might be called in to help to annihilate the guilty village.[2]

Modern Administration

631
In the whole of Nyasaland there must be between thirty and forty Yao chiefs. In 622
the districts of Liwonde, Fort Johnston, and Zomba, where 60 per cent. of the Yao 178
population is concentrated (1931 boundaries), there are at least fifteen such chiefs. Not all those who have the rank of chief in the old Yao system are recognized as Native Authorities or even as Sub-Native Authorities by the Nyasaland Administration, and many Sub-Native Authorities would be full chiefs in the Yao system, and quite independent of the Native Authorities under whom they are placed.

Nowadays the chief has lost many of his former claims to status. He no longer has monopoly of the trade to the coast, for goods are brought in by Indian traders and bought by African tobacco growers or returned labour migrants. He can no longer use his slaves to increase his wealth by running slaving expeditions. His tribute of food and ivory has ceased, and he can no longer entertain lavishly, but he is still expected to give burial cloths and to make gifts to headmen on their succession to office. Some of his councillors have been made court assessors, and are paid for those duties, but others are expected to work for him unpaid. Some chiefs do reward councillors who retain their traditional status but are not officially recognized as assessors by the

[1] Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, pp. 136–8; Stannus, 4, 1922, p. 279.
[2] Macdonald, op. cit., pp. 170–1.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

175 622 is his relatives that are the village gods. Everyone that lives in the village recognizes these gods but if anyone removes to another village he changes his gods. He now recognizes the gods of his new chief. One wishing to pray to the god (or gods) of any village naturally desires to have his prayers presented through the village chief, because the latter is nearly related to the village god, and may be expected to be better listened to than a stranger.[1]

In this quotation the word 'chief' is used for village headman. In Yao the same term is used for both the chief of the country and the chief of the village (mwenye).

175 672 681 696 It is clear from MacDonald's description that foreign villages were looked upon as undifferentiated wholes. When discussing punishment in general he writes:

We find that almost every offence may be punished by death, but when an offender is not redeemed, the particular punishment is left to the headman of the injured party. For instance, if a headman of Kumpama's go and say, 'Chenyono has killed a subject of mine; I have caught a subject of his and want to kill him,' the chief's answer will be, 'He has done you wrong, do according to your heart (poli mtima wenu).' The punishment is thus inflicted not by the criminal's own chief, but by the injured party, and it may fall, not on the guilty person, but on one connected with him.[2]

For example, he describes how some children had been carried off from Che Lomoni's village one night in 1880.

Towards the end of 1880 [he recounts], Che Lomoni, a Blantyre headman, captured two men from Mpingwi, and put them in slave-sticks. They belonged to the village that had kidnapped the children a few months before, and native law did not require proof that the men were personally guilty. They were undoubtedly innocent. Still they were kept in close confinement till their friends returned the captives in February.[3]

175 622 The village headman—called the 'owner of the village' (asyene musi)—was the representative of the village in all public transactions, and also the representative of such higher authority as existed, to the village members. Duff MacDonald writes: 'A chief represents and is responsible for all his people. If anyone wish to treat with a native village it is with the village

[1] MacDonald, Africana, i, 65.
[2] MacDonald, Africana, i, 186. [3] MacDonald, Africana, ii, 234.

692 but some also on having killed children by ndaka[1] (a disease caused by the mystical influence of sexual intercourse). Secondly, [673] other cases not brought to the court are petty squabbles which do not involve heavy compensation. Examples of these disputes are personal quarrels, disputes over land ownership, petty theft and so on. The Native Authority's court handles mainly cases arising from adultery, which involve compensation varying from £1 10s. to £5; and theft and assault for which similar compensation may be payable. If the case is brought up to the chief's court there is a mechanism whereby the compensation 696 may be enforced. Ordinarily, in those cases which are not tried in the court house, there is no legal sanction behind the payment of the compensation, so that if a man defaults in payment no legal pressure can be brought to bear on him. It is for this reason that such cases are tried in the court house.

695 The cases are heard by the court assessors who call the wit-693 nesses and cross-examine them. Sometimes a chief or his representative is in the court, as at Kawinga's court, but sometimes as in Chiwalo's court, the chief never comes to the court house at all. After the evidence is sifted, one court assessor takes the case to the chief and tells him about it. On the basis of the court assessor's analysis he awards compensation and imposes fines. The court assessor then takes this information back to the court house, reassembles the protagonists, and announces the chief's decision. The losing party has then the opportunity to appeal, first to the court of the Native Authority, if the case was tried in a Subordinate Native Authority's court, and then to the District Commissioner.

Cases tried by the chief in his extra-Administrative capacity are usually tried outside the court house. The same personalities take part in the trial but they act now with reference to a different set of values. The procedure is exactly the same, except that in Chiwalo's area the chief is present at the hearing. He sits somewhat aside from the main body of people but within hearing distance, weaving a mat or making nets while the case is being tried.

692 In minor cases, if either of the parties is dissatisfied with the 643 decision, he may take the case up to the chief for arbitration and, theoretically, may then take it from him if he is a Subordinate

[1] See Chap. V, p. 112.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

643 ivory by his own hunting parties or as a kind of tithe on other hunting expeditions. The ground tusk, i.e. the tusk on the side on which the elephant falls when killed, was the chief's share. In the same way, the hind leg on the ground side of any game animal killed was sent to the chief. He took a share of the spoils of war and most of his people yearly gave him either service in building houses, etc., or kind in the form of food-stuffs, but he enforced no service and levied no tax, except for the making of a new burial place.[1] New settlers in his village were expected to invite him to drink beer made with their first crops.

In return, he always provided cloth to invest the body of the dead. He also made presents at the time of Unpaga.[2]

A chief's life, therefore, may not be "all beer and skittles," though he consumes a good deal of the former and a kind of skittles[3] was a favorite pastime of one of the Malemyas. A saying embodying this idea was used when pleading for a man who had [538] committed adultery with his chief's wife "one who carries a tortoise (on a string over his back) is likely to get his clothes soiled"; a man has to put up with the troubles his belongings bring him. So a chief must bear with his own people who do wrong.

643 Ample opportunity for exercising such forbearance was provided, since the chief was formerly the adjudicator of all disputes and dispenser of justice in all crimes. The headman 692 did the same in a smaller way but appeal could always be made to the chief. Cases were heard by the chief sitting in council. He and his headmen and elders would assemble in the village open space and here cases were stated, often at great length.

Each party to the case would employ some man well known for his powers of oratory as leading counsel. The speaker for the plaintiff would start proceedings by a recital of all the evidence he could collect. After him would follow innumerable speakers, whether actual witnesses or not, each telling as good a story as he could, and the defendant's case would then be put by his representatives. There was no cross-examination but at the end, a summary was made and judgment given. A chief often took the advice of some one of his old men whom he trusted.[4] The chief received no payment for his services, except in the case of murder; neither did the "counsel" receive anything for their efforts.

674 Crimes. Causing the death of a person by witch medicine, usuni, was the most heinous [754] crime; a usuni ordeal might be held, but if the offense was proved, burning was the punishment which usually followed.

[684] The offense second in gravity was adultery. This might be expiated by payment or by death, according to the circumstances under which it occurred; mutilation was often [696] performed in the case of a chief's wife. All death sentences with the exception of those

[1] Vide supra, p. 264. [2] Vide supra, pp. 262, 264. [3] Vide infra, p. 282.

[4] The old Malemya (Nakatumbu) has some very fine men among his counselors. Kamtepa and Chingale, the latter renowned for his oratory, were his chief advisers in legal matters. Nkhokha, a slave, was his mentor in all personal and family affairs, while Chokumenge was in charge of all ceremonies and served with his assistant, Mpenjale, as high priest on all occasions of intervention. Others acted as his counselors, such as Mkapiti who always went on any missions to the Angoni, among whom he was known as Ndanjiro.

3:Stanaus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

674 [696]

for witchcraft were carried out by strangling with a piece of calico at a place appointed for the purpose some miles from the chief's village.

There was no case against a man who seduced an unbetrothed girl, the latter being considered entirely at fault. [684]

After divorce, the children always remained with the mother. The man left his wife after the case, saying, "I will take my spear and some of the goats and chickens, but the children will always know their father." [586]

Murder was a question of compensation to the deceased's relatives and was not punished by death. [682]

Stealing was a serious offence but many who were found guilty were rather despised than punished. The thief with the stolen goods tied about his body but otherwise stripped naked would be driven through the village and prodded with sticks to the sound of drums and hoots of derision. Most crimes, however, might be punished by exacting compensation. Payment took the form of goods or slaves. In the case of murder, the accused might have to pay several slaves to the deceased's relatives, and in addition, a fine to the chief for spilling blood, consisting perhaps of one slave. The amount of compensation expected was mentioned by the plaintiff in the case. One of the expressions used was, "My compensation must cover an ant hill," meaning enough slaves, standing hand in hand, to surround an ant hill; ant hills in this country are sometimes very big. If a man had no slaves, he would send his relatives or he himself might be forced to become the slave of the plaintiff. There is a saying anent this practice: [685] 681

> Chitumbili wachitwile wichila wakwe!
> The monkey they tied (with) tail his (own).

[539]

Slaves passed over to a man in payment for crime became free men; they were an addition to the village and might even be adopted in place of a murdered individual. [567]

When compensation was made by the defendant to the plaintiff, the latter always returned some part of it as a sign that friendship was again established.

Goods or money received in compensation for murder, i.e. blood money, might not go for the purchase of food or clothing. Detection of a guilty party by means of magic and proof of guilt or otherwise by ordeal poison are dealt with elsewhere.

Bluffing anyone into giving something for nothing, obtaining goods by false pretence, was not considered a crime, as anyone was "fair game." For instance, a party of youths would waylay a man with a load of fish, saying they had been ordered by their headman to commandeer it. If the man parted with his fish, so much the worse for him; if he showed fight, he was respected and friendship made with a give-and-take of fish and snuff. Such bluffing is called kulpa nawa, "to eat with them." To add to their appearance of bona fides, the party might have secretly borrowed some well-known article belonging to their headman. 674

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

175 2. Free men are under their elder brother in the first instance, but they may carry their cases to the headman of their village or even to the chief of the country.
565
622 3. Slaves were entirely under their own master.[1]
643

The headmen's subservience to the chief is described in the following passage:

In all public transactions the headman represents his village. He receives the chief's orders and sees them carried out. When he kills an elephant he sends one of the tusks to the chief. Should he kill [651] twenty elephants he is not expected to give up twenty tusks—two or three would be sufficient. If he shoots a large buck he gives one haunch of venison. For all such tributes he expects to receive in return a present (generally a little powder). . . . He is expected to [646 attend the chief's parliament unless he is under an elder brother in 593] which case he is not allowed to speak, except when especially commissioned. Headmen are expected to report all cases of war, but they often attack enemies without telling their chief beforehand, saying, [721] 'Let him hear of the enterprise when it succeeds.' Yet this is dangerous unless they are sure of success, and well acquainted with the chief's private sentiments. On reporting an attack they present the chief with part of the booty. In times of war each headman when summoned, must follow his chief's flag, otherwise his village is burned [687] down, and all that fail to escape are killed or enslaved.[2]

175 Yet within the framework of this organization villages were markedly autonomous. MacDonald's description, which I have 578 just quoted, brings this out very well. Elsewhere he writes: 622 'The chief may often have less influence than powerful headmen, 643 and we have known cases where he simply contented himself with grumbling when his headmen acted contrary to his desire.'[3] The chief did not differ greatly from his more powerful headmen. A certain amount of ritual in terms of ancestor worship embellished his position, and he had some ascendancy over village headmen to whom he had given land. Yet, in the last analysis, the chief had to rely on his personal following and military power to subjugate headmen who were becoming too powerful. The chief was therefore in direct competition with his subject village headmen, and involved in a constant struggle with them for followers. MacDonald describes how the chief himself was a

[1] MacDonald, Africana, i, 155.
[2] MacDonald, Africana, i, 157. [3] MacDonald, Africana, i, 155.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

that she is tattooed more profusely on the buttocks and legs. The circlet of beads was formerly made like mapunde with a bark-cloth core, called mhumbo or mbule (ku-oula, to slip off), referring to the mbule being slipped off over the legs. The fashion now is to wear single strings of beads; each string is of one color but all the strings are different and perhaps number a dozen or more.

Lipamba: a bead belt three-inches wide, worn by Yao women near Lake Nyasa. A bead apron, Nanjova, is also worn by them but not near Zomba (Pl. VI, fig. 2).

A woman removes her beads when she is "unclean," that is: (a) during the menstrual period, (b) during the period of mourning for a near relative when coitus is forbidden, (c) before the birth of a child and afterwards until such time as she may resume intercourse with her husband.

A large variety of beads has long been used by the Yao. There are some rarely seen now which were much prized in years gone by, while others are of quite recent introduction. There is no evidence that they themselves made beads and there are few which are probably not of European manufacture.

Clothing. The Yao used bark-cloth before the introduction of woven materials. The older people may still be seen in it and it is used in most of the ceremonies. At one time, they also used to weave a cloth called likwambo from a native cotton plant. This has been given up since the introduction of imported materials.

For the method of wearing cloth, see Pl. II, fig. 2. The very poorest people wear only a strip of calico round the pudenda, held in position by a string round the waist hanging long behind and in front; this is called mthetha. Yao women, when menstruating, wear under this a little piece of cloth called likumbi; it is only worn at this time and not always as in certain other tribes.

Warfare. Fighting has naturally played a large part in the life of the Yao as among other African tribes, but at no time were these people a trained fighting race. Warfare was of a desultory character consisting mostly of raids by one feudal chief upon another. A party of men belonging to a chief at enmity with another, meeting some of his followers would challenge them, "Alumbe, who are you for?" The name of the rival chief in answer was the sign for battle to begin. A fake answer would never be given to gain an advantage. When about to throw a spear, the thrower calls to his adversary.

The Yao have possessed guns for a long time. Going out to fight, the Yao used to leap from one foot to the other, and spin their guns around in their hands. They made their own stocks for the rifles. They also used to make a small, cast-iron cannon about three feet long, called kambula, "a little nose." It was carried in the arms and was touched off by a torch. Drums called sanje were taken into battle. There is an old war drum at Malenya's village, taken in 1885 by the old Malenya from a Mang'anja chief called Mkuhumbo who lived near Lake Chiuta. Since then, this drum has always gone into battle with Malenya. Around it his men would dance and anyone who had killed a man in battle would run up to it and spit upon it in salutation.

3: Stanner D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

175 167 648 River at Mpimbi where they intended to settle. Here, an old chief, knowing that their presence would cause trouble, persuaded them by tales of many cattle far away on the other side of the river, to cross over, and there they remained.

Kawinga and Malemya, then, to avoid further raids from the north went down to the Upper Shiré River near Lake Pamalombe, Kawinga going to Mvera, while Malemya stayed on the east side of the river among the Anyanja, claiming friendship with them because they bore many of the same clan names. Later, Malemya moved up to the highlands about fifteen miles north of what is now Zomba, and Kawinga went to Chikala. Malemya was friendly with the Anyanja chief, Chenyani, who was of his clan, and was therefore able to buy from him for a red blanket all the country from the Likwenu stream to the Namadzi River, a district thirty to forty miles long. There his people settled. [131]

Kawinga was once again attacked by the Makwangwala from the north, but beat them back, after which they returned to the country whence they came — German East Africa near Lake Nyasa. The Angoni chief was killed in this battle, and the story goes that two Yao captives were told off to carry the eviscerated body back to the Angoni country for burial. As they were not provided with food for the journey, the two men began to eat the corpse. After several days, this was discovered; one of the men was killed but the other escaped to tell the tale. These were barbarous days, and the Yao relate that after raiding a village, the Angoni would leave a pot cooking on the fire with the body of a child in it, well covered with beans, so that when they had gone away with their booty and the villagers who had taken refuge in the forest returned hungry, they would start eating the beans and then come upon the body of the child, and having eaten of the juices of a human body, they would have committed a terrible sin. [726] 266

The immigration of the Amachinga into the country around Mangoche mountain caused the Amagoche Yao settled there to move. They passed into the Blantyre and Mlanje districts, and invaded the country of the Anyanja. The chief, Malemya, known as Nalutumbo died about 1880, and was succeeded by his nephew, a sister's son, according to the Yao custom. This nephew, Wandalama, then took the name of Malemya.

In consequence of this succession, there was considerable bad feeling between Wandalama and the other aspirant to the chieftainry, his cousin, Kumtaja. The latter moved down to the plain below Zomba mountain to the south, where he gathered about him a band of friends and malcontents. Malemya decided to attack him and with this purpose, sent two messengers, Nkopili and Mapondela, asking Chikusi and his Angoni to come and do the job for him. Led by Nyamuka, Njewmoli, and Kabayi, the Angoni came from the Shiré River opposite Blantyre, via Matope. They attacked and routed Kumtaja who, owing to the thick country, managed to fall back with most of his people toward Lake Chilwa. Here he was received by his cousin, Chimombo, a son of Nalutumbo, and father of my interpreter, Chenga, who ruled among the Anyasa. Afterwards, he moved to Mpimbi on the Shiré where he built a stockaded village.

* Died July 14, 1914.

30 [548] that she is tattooed more profusely on the buttocks and legs. The circlet of beads was formerly made like cupande with a bark-cloth core, called mbende or mbede (ku-ende, to slip off), referring to the mbede being slipped off over the legs. The fashion now is to wear single strings of beads; each string is of one color but all the strings are different and perhaps number a dozen or more.

Lipamba: a bead belt three-inches wide, worn by Yao women near Lake Nyasa. A bead apron, kinjera, is also worn by them but not near Zomba (Pl. VI, fig. 2).

A woman removes her beads when she is "unclean," that is: (a) during the menstrual [783] period, (b) during the period of mourning for a near relative when coitus is forbidden, (c) before the birth of a child and afterwards until such time as she may resume intercourse with her husband.

A large variety of beads has long been used by the Yao. There are some rarely seen [177] now which were much prized in years gone by, while others are of quite recent introduction. There is no evidence that they themselves made beads and there are few which are probably not of European manufacture.

291 Clothing. The Yao used bark-cloth before the introduction of woven materials. The older people may still be seen in it and it is used in most of the ceremonies. At one time, they also used to weave a cloth called likamombe from a native cotton plant. This has been given up since the introduction of imported materials.

For the method of wearing cloth, see Pl. II, fig. 2. The very poorest people wear only a strip of calico round the pudenda, held in position by a string round the waist hanging long behind and in front; this is called mbetbe. Yao women, when menstruating, wear [841] under this a little piece of cloth called likumbi; it is only worn at this time and not always as in certain other tribes.

721 Warfare. Fighting has naturally played a large part in the life of the Yao as among other African tribes, but at no time were these people a trained fighting race. Warfare was of a desultory character consisting mostly of raids by one feudal chief upon another. A party of men belonging to a chief at enmity with another, meeting some of his followers would challenge them, "Alumbe, who are you for?" The name of the rival chief in answer was the sign for battle to begin. A false answer would never be given to gain an advantage. ● 726 When about to throw a spear, the thrower calls to his adversary.

The Yao have possessed guns for a long time. Going out to fight, the Yao used to leap from one foot to the other, and spin their guns around in their hands. They made [771] their own stocks for the rifles. They also used to make a small, cast-iron cannon about three feet long, called kambuja, "a little nose." It was carried in the arms and was touched off by a torch. Drums called ngoje were taken into battle. There is an old war drum [534] at Malunya's village, taken in 1895 by the old Malunya from a Mang'anja chief called Mkukumbo who lived near Lake Chiuta. Since then, this drum has always gone into battle with Malunya. Around it his men would dance and anyone who had killed a man in battle would run up to it and spit upon it in salutation.

3:Simmons D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

Other hypothetical diseases which are caused by disobedience to custom are mentioned under various other headings. Kwipe: a disease generally characterized by ulceration of the legs but in some cases by pains in the back, or loosely used for a variety of symptoms, is said to be caused by the entry into the body of a worm which lives in water-pools. This worm which I have had identified is a guinea worm and not known to be parasitic in man. Lusui: When a man kills another in battle, he will slit open the belly of his victim; otherwise he believes he will sicken with lusui and his own belly will swell up like that of the corpse when putrefaction sets in. He is supposed also to hunger after more killing and blood. Likenge is the name of a supposed disease which kills off one child after another in a family when they are about six months old. Congenital syphilis naturally suggests itself but I have never been able to verify this idea. Likenge lya kutuin: a supposed disease which causes the death of the first child when the second is born, the second when the third is born and so on, whatever the intervals between the births. Each child is said to push (ku-tuin) the previous one out of this world. Under these circumstances the disease is ascribed to something wrong with the mother or father and they are examined by a medicine-woman or medicine-man, and any carunculae or an external pile found will be cut away.

164 192 753 688 [725] [727]

If a snake inflicts two bites, the case will prove fatal. If a crocodile emits a grunting sound when seizing its victim, though he escape he will certainly die. [725]

Treatment of disease. Of surgical treatment there is very little to be noted. Nothing in the way of operation is performed with the exception of circumcision (see Lupanda). 757 [752]

An abscess is allowed to burst, the smallest tumor is left untouched, but accessory digits which are not rare, attached only by a fine pedicle, are snipped off. [752]

The natives cannot extract teeth. They are incapable of rendering any assistance in cases of difficult labor. Dislocations are not recognized as such, but fractures are treated by the application of wooden sticks placed at intervals round the circumference of the limb parallel to it and held in position by twisted pieces of bark string (Pl. XXII, fig. 3). The principle of the tourniquet appears to be unknown. 752.

The only instruments used consist of a small knife for incision, a cupping-horn, and a primitive form of funnel for administering enemata (Pl. XXII, figs. 1, 2, 4). The knife has a triangular blade with a stem which is commonly twisted at one of the corners. The knife is used for wet-cupping, tatooing, and circumcision (Pl. XXII, fig. 3). The cupping-horn is a small horn of a calf. The apex is pierced and after application to the part, suction is made with the mouth and then the hole sealed by working a piece of beeswax over it with the tongue. Six small incisions are made in the skin for the withdrawal of the blood. The cupping-horn is called chawi (tshwiko, Chin.). Cupping is used for headache and for pain in the chest and back. The enema funnel, chipelpe (ntwibiri, Chin.) is made from the neck of a gourd to which is attached a hollow straw for introduction into the anus. Half a pint of an infusion of mapaio is injected for constipation associated with pain. 413 752. 757

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

Native Authority, to the Native Authority, and eventually to the District Commissioner if the case is one which he will countenance. In practice, most cases reach the chief and go no further. Most people accept his decision. Thus the chief has important judicial functions. 692 643

The Chief as his People's Representative

In special situations where the welfare of the chiefdom as a whole has been endangered by an infringement of the mores, the chief may take action. For example, a chief prosecutes a village headman who allows a woman in his village to bear her first child before she has been through the litiwo ceremony. Every woman who becomes pregnant for the first time must undergo this ceremony, during which she is instructed in child welfare and child care. If she bears a child without undergoing the ceremony, she is said to have 'spoilt the country' (ajalwice cilambo), in the sense that she has besmirched its reputation.[1] 643 687 843

Chiefs usually call in magicians 'to smell out' those responsible for keeping back the rain.[2] When the rains fail as they did in 1948–9, their failure is held to be due to the magic of some evilly disposed person. It then becomes the chief's duty to call in a magician to indicate who this person is. The fees for this duty are paid by the chief himself on behalf of his people. 643 787 821

The chief also acts as a representative of his people when they are affected as a whole. For example, Nyambi called in a magician after man-eating lions had taken some of his subjects. This magician called for the hearth-stones and domestic utensils from all the villages in the area, and built them up into a pyramid over which he made some anti-lion medicine. This was to clear the whole chiefdom of man-eating lions. 643 789 731

Nowadays, the chief's representation of his people is seen most clearly in his position in the Administrative framework.[3] The chief represents the Administration to his people since they approach it through him. At the same time the Administration clearly treats him as the representative of his people and consults 643

[1] I was told in Mponda's area that the women undergo this ceremony after the birth of the child, but that it is still obligatory.

[2] Kutowa ula—lit. 'to tie or bind the rain', in the sense of to make it a prisoner.

[3] I have dealt with this aspect more fully in 'The Political Organization of the Yao of Southern Nyasaland'.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

593 brother, is called anyone mbumba, or 'the warden of the sorority-group'. As one would expect among a matrilineal people, the link between a man and his mother and sisters is strong. But it is the link with his sister that is strongest. She relies on him for protection, particularly when she becomes ill, but also in her [582] relationships with her husband. Her brother will be her junior marriage surety, and he will give the consent which will allow a man to marry her. Also a woman's brother will have to consult the diviner and find the medicines when she or her children [731] sicken. In times of distress, as, for example, if her crops have failed, she will appeal to her brother for help. Similarly the man is dependent on his sister in a number of subtle ways. He can always rely on her for hospitality, and is able to get a meal from her if he needs it. But his dependence on his sisters for prestige is much more important. The significance of this will emerge when we see the mbumba organization in the light of the segmentation and fusion of the lineage. A man can only found a new village if he has the full support of his sisters. A sister also plays a most important rôle at the birth of his children. She represents him both at the first foetal-quickening ceremony and at the birth of his child, when she listens to the birth-pang confessions of his wife.[1]

At the same time the relations of sister and brother are restricted by custom. A man must never appear too familiar with his sister, especially in sexual matters. He may not, for example, [513] sleep in the same hut as she does; if she is away and he sleeps in her empty hut he must not make his bed in the place where she usually sleeps. He may not even sit on her sleeping mat. [835] Authentic cases of incest with a sister are extremely rare, whereas I recorded three or four cases of father-daughter incest while I was in the field. Supposed cases of brother-sister incest are recounted and discussed widely. This is understandable because [754] a man who is suspiciously familiar with his sister is suspected of being a sorcerer, since it is widely believed that a sorcerer usually obtains the power that he needs for the performance of his dire deeds by sleeping with his sister. The riddle of the initiands—'What is the sweetest fruit which may not be tasted?' Answer, 'Your sister'—neatly reflects the attitude of the Yao.

The close link of brother and sister is also reflected in the

[1] The significance of this is explained in Chap. VII, p. 183.

769 A man leaving his village on some expedition and wishing to be assured of safe conduct
489 will procure some millet flour. Going quietly into his house, he squats down in one corner 787 and gently sifts the flour through his hand so that it falls on the floor in the form of a little cone, repeating as he does so, his prayer for safe conduct beginning and ending with the word chondo! phoma!

[539] "Chondo! chondo! [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]
"Phoma, phoma! [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] that I may see [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], chondo! chondo! chondo!" the path, may I arrive well where I go, phoma, phoma, phoma!"

He then covers the cone of flour with a basket. On the morrow, he will uncover it to see what has happened. According as the cone has remained intact or has fallen to one side or the other, the cone indicates whether or not the journey should be undertaken, the question being vetoed by the spirits to whom his supplication was addressed.

769 Again, there may have occurred much sickness in a village and the people conclude that the past has come to remind them that they have not been attentive to their deceased chief. "His grave-house in the village has been allowed to fall into decay," and so on. They will decide that his spirit must be propitiated. The grave-house is rebuilt, a pot is sunk in the ground, and beer is poured in, and round about heaps of flour are placed. Prayer is made to the chief at whose grave they are worshipping, supplicating him in person and "all others who are with you at Milanga," asking that he will no longer cause ill to befall the village.

When a village is moved, the beer-pot from the grave of the old chief is taken to the new village and a ceremony similar to that just described takes place, with the prayer that he will come to the new village and continue to exercise his beneficient care over his people.

731 In 1900 when there was a threatened famine on account of long drought in Sonka district, Malenya decided that supplication for rain must be made to the spirits of his illustrious predecessors. Kanenga, one of Malenya's wise men, acted as high priest. A large amount of beer was brewed and the night before the ceremony, twenty sheep and fifty goats were slaughtered. Plates of the meat, of rice and porridge were then placed on the ground round the grave-house of the old Malenya, and pots of beer set into the ground at intervals. At the head of the grave, little heaps of adepoi flour were arranged. This flour had been prepared by each of Malenya's wives as were not near a menstrual period. The following morning, a fence was built round the grave, outside which all the people collected, while beyond there again was a second fence. Kanenga, accompanied by an assistant then appeared, and amid absolute silence entered the inner enclosure. He addressed to the old Malenya, at whose grave they were all assembled, a prayer for rain. He then repeated the prayer, invoking the aid of all the past line of chiefs down to the reigning Malenya, repeating their names. Returning to the outer enclosure, he again uttered the prayers, all the assembled multitude repeating them after him while lying face down, resting on their knees and elbows, at intervals swaying their bodies from side to side and clapping their hands. Kamanga then ordered all to go and bathe, men and women separately. As they returned from the stream, rain began to fall.

[514]

3:Stanner D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 F77 Yao F77

516 758 769

755 769

Intercession on behalf of the sick may be made, especially by anyone who is likely to be accused of causing the illness by witchcraft.[1] The man standing with arms outstretched, downwards and a little in front of his body, the hands supine, takes some water in his mouth and discharges it in a stream on the ground, (probably as a sign of purification of his tongue), and then invoking "all the spirits above," asks that they will intercede to restore health to the sick man and bear witness to his own innocence of any wish to do the sick man injury. Ku-pempa is the word meaning to offer sacrifice and prayer.

769

Harvesting and hunting are occasions when sacrifices may be offered. It was formerly the custom for the chief to determine the day on which harvesting of millet should begin. On the day appointed, a big drum was beaten in the village and word passed round; then everyone would go down to his garden, gather a load of millet, and bring it back to the village where it was all handed over to the chief's headwife. After drying and threshing, a little of the grain was laid at the grave of an old chief by one of the reigning chief's advisers, the remainder being again distributed to all the people gathered together in the village meeting-place, who ate it raw. After this ceremony, harvesting began.

241 782

In passing through a millet garden, if a child asks his mother to give him some to eat, she plucks a branch or two and reverently laying one at the foot of a mwere tree for the spirits or at the base of some other tree, if she cannot see a mwere, she gives the rest to the child.

782 224

When a hunting expedition makes its first killing, part of the flesh of the animal is laid at the base of a tree as a thank offering to the spirits and in anticipation of further favors to be conferred. All such offerings are supposed by the natives to be partaken of by the spirits, though they are well aware that they do not actually diminish in quantity. There is an interesting point in this connection: any man who has acted as mbile (undertaker) to some well-known man may appropriate these offerings. In the case of the hunting offering, he will run round the tree, saying, "I am a hyaena, the spirits will not mind me," and will then take part of the flesh-offering and eat it.

In the same way, a mbile may drink from a grave beer-pot after three days, when the spirits are supposed to have taken what they want.

824 778

With the exception of the mwere tree above mentioned (mbiwa, Chin.), and possibly another called mchi-mpanu (Chin.), which is never used as firewood and which is supposed to be used by mwami, I do not think there are any sacred trees properly so-called. Miss Werner supposes that many of the big trees (often a species of Ficus) in villages are sacred.[2] The truth is, I believe, simply that a village is made naturally round a big tree which conveniently offers its shade for the village meeting place. The spirits of deceased chiefs may [1] Kuk-mpera, p. 187.

[2] The native of British Central Africa, op. cit., p. 46.

3:Stanner D-5 (ca. 1912) 1932 FT7 Too FT7

Other hypothetical diseases which are caused by disbelieve to customs are mentioned under various other headings. Kwiye: a disease generally characterized by ulceration of the legs but in some cases by pains in the back, or loosely used for a variety of symptoms. It is said to be caused by the entry into the body of a worm which lives in water-pools. This worm which I have had identified is a gordian worm and not known to be parasitic in man. Lumi: When a man kills another in battle, he will slit open the belly of his victim; otherwise he believes he will sicken with lumi and his own belly will swell up like that of the corpse when putrefaction sets in. He is supposed also to hunger after more killing and blood. Lilungu is the name of a supposed disease which kills off one child after another in a family when they are about six months old. Congenital syphilis naturally suggests itself but I have never been able to verify this idea. Lilungu lya bulale: a supposed disease which causes the death of the first child when the second is born, the second when the third is born and so on, whatever the intervals between the births. Each child is said to push (bu-tula) the previous one out of this world. Under these circumstances the disease is ascribed to something wrong with the mother or father and they are examined by a medicine-woman or medicine-man, and any carunculae or an external pile found will be cut away.

If a snake inflicts two bites, the man will prove fatal. If a crocodile emits a grunting sound when seizing its victim, though he escape he will certainly die.

Treatment of diseases. Of surgical treatment there is very little to be noted. Nothing in the way of operation is performed with the exception of circumcision (see Legends).

An abscess is allowed to burst, the smallest tumor is left untouched, but necessary digits which are not sore, attacked only by a fine pedicle, are snipped off.

The natives cannot extract teeth. They are incapable of rendering any assistance in cases of difficult labor. Dislocations are not recognized as such, but fractures are treated by the application of wooden sticks placed at intervals round the circumference of the limb parallel to it and held in position by twisted pieces of bark string (Pl. XXII, fig. 3). The principle of the tourniquet appears to be unknown.

The only instruments used consist of a small knife for incision, a cupping-horn, and a primitive form of funnel for administering enemata (Pl. XXII, figs. 1, 2, 4). The knife has a triangular blade with a stem which is commonly twisted at one of the corners. The knife is used for wet-cupping, tattooing, and circumcision (Pl. XXII, fig. 2). The cupping-horn is a small horn of a calf. The spout is pierced and after application to the part, suction is made with the mouth and then the hole sealed by working a piece of beeswax over it with the tongue. Six small incisions are made in the skin for the withdrawal of the blood. The cupping-horn is called chumi (ichumbu, Chin.). Cupping is used for headache and for pain in the chest and back. The enema funnel, chipulpu (ichitulu, Chin.) is made from the neck of a gourd to which is attached a hollow straw for introduction into the anus. Half a pint of an infusion of mangoes is injected for constipation associated with pain.

3:Stanner D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

Thagulugu was another well-known performer; he used to do the same tricks as Kambanje. He also was possessed of an elastic skin and is said to have been able "to tie his ears together behind the back of his head." 789 791

Mpachetula, a Yao of Mikanda, is a man with considerable renown. He is said to be able to produce a lion at will from a lion's tail and claw. He would offer to show this if there were any knew enough to go through with it. On a moonlight night, he would expose on the ground in a cleared space near a village the tail of a lion held cross-wise in a piece of split bamboo. At the split end of the bamboo, he would place a lion's claw and round this, a woman's hair held in position by three bamboo pegs, around which he would draw a circle of wheaten flour. Everyone would then withdraw to a hut in which the seance was to take place. After an hour or so, Mpachetula would send some one out to inspect the lion's tail where probably all would be found intact. He might then pretend to be uninterested and sleepy and suggest that some one should go out again in half an hour. Sooner or later, a man would come back, having found the tail gone; then everyone would go out to see what had happened. The pegs would be found in place but the tail and claw gone. A little way off, the split piece of bamboo would be found and further still a bead or two from the woman's hair. Then, Mpachetula would pick up, and leaving a little trail of flour on their way, all returned to the hut, while he whistled as if calling some one. Suddenly they would be aroused by the sound as of a lion brushing against the hut walls, as the beasts are known to do, and next, a loud roar. Mpachetula would immediately open the door half-way so that the people could look out into the moonlight and there, a little way off, would be the lion. It would immediately advance towards the house and then, as it prepared to spring for the door, Mpachetula would offer it some of the flour in his left hand, armed with a stirring-stick, entire, in his right hand. As the lion landed, he would strike it on the head with the stick and lo and behold! the lion would vanish and the tail and claw would be found in his hand.

Superstitions. Scattered throughout these notes, particularly under Usual and Disease, 771 mention is made of practices which show a strong belief in superstition. Below are given 784 a number of minor beliefs, and it is interesting to compare them with many well-known superstitions in other parts of the world.

1. A child who cuts the upper incisor teeth first will be unlucky. Such children used [777] to be killed by the Yao. (Other tribes make medicine against the threatened ill-luck.)

2. A woman with polydactylism may not take food out of a corn-store. Otherwise the [732] stock of corn will not last long. (Rudimentary sixth fingers are not uncommon.)

3. An insect called chiqaw maui which lives in the mud at the bottom of pools, if killed [823] causes the water to dry up.

4. If a boy puts a water-spider in the armpit when learning to swim, he will learn quickly.

5. A man wishing to prevent rain falling on a day he is making a journey, will wrap [824] some of the leaves of the mimomel tree in his kilo cloth and go without drinking.

1: Tew . E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

775 Kangomba, used to persuade Nyanja to help in the sacrificial rite. When Kaponi in 782 turn fled to Mount Soche from the Ngoni, and died there, the Yao addressed their offerings to him, not to Kangomba.[1] The word Mulungu has sometimes been interpreted to mean Supreme Being, God, Creator, but among the Yao it seems not to have [774] a personal connotation. It was used to describe the agent in any mysterious event,[2] or the place where the ancestor spirits (mazuka) were supposed to dwell. Daily life was [769] full of acts of respect towards the ancestors, who were regarded as jealous of the living, and requiring constant propitiation.[3]

Sorcery

754 Accusations of witchcraft and measures for dealing with it play a dominant role in Yao social life. With certain exceptions nearly all diseases and deaths are thought to be caused by sorcery. The exceptional causes are: the hand of God, old age, the transgression of certain taboos, and battle wounds. If sorcery is suspected the relatives of the sick or dead man consult the diviner to identify the offender.

Yao (in common with the Maravi and many peoples of Central Africa) believe that sorcerers have a craving for human flesh, which they satisfy by killing with magic the victims of their malice and hatred. They acquire their magical powers by an apprentice-[735] ship, which might include incestuous relations with mother, sister, or mother-in-law, or sleeping on the grave of the mother for one night. The sorcerer then learns the medicines and finally demonstrates his power by killing a young relative by magic;
[766] he waits till the victim is buried, and then magically exhumes him for the secret feast with his fellow sorcerers. Each sorcerer who shares the flesh owes a debt to the one who secured the victim.

[759] Charms are used as preventive measures against sorcery. When a diviner has 754 diagnosed the cause of death as sorcery, retaliatory measures are taken. The headmen
683 of the village could either call in the witchfinder to identify the offender or he could call in the diviner to take action against all the sorcerers in the village. After the [695] diviner, Mabinabin, had revealed the guilty ones, they were challenged to take the poison ordeal to prove their innocence. If they died, the proof and the punishment were simultaneously accomplished. If they survived, the diviner was held to have been at fault and they were acquitted. The witch doctor was supposed to entice sorcerers to the graveside, and slay them with magic more powerful than their own.

[695] The diviner's findings are to-day checked by the poison ordeal administered to a chicken. A sorcerer detected in this way might be asked to provide medicine for the man whose sickness he had caused, or after a death he might be compelled to pay compensation. If the accused is a village headman, he will not be summoned before a chief, but his brother will take the villagers away from the sphere of his influence, or he may be chased away from the district. Accusations of sorcery follow certain regular lines. Nearly all accusations fall on relatives. Diviners are consulted by matrilineal relatives of the sick or dead person, and the man most usually accused is the brother of the accuser, or the husband of his sister. Witchcraft is therefore a manner of expressing the hostilities latent in these relations, which are, in the Yao social system, full of tension.

[1] Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, p. 70.
[2] Hodoul, 1933, pp. 14-15; Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, pp. 58-59, 214-15.
[3] Hetherwick, p. 1902.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

142
291
301
751
643

PLATE I

CHIEF KAWINGA THE SIXTH

He wears the traditional necklace of lions' claws which are medicated to protect him from the bullets of his enemies.

[facing p. iii]

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

Further enquiries may reveal that this is only a section of a larger village, possibly a hundred or more yards away. 622

The boundaries of a village may not always be clear. Clusters of huts which are part of one village may be physically nearer another, but in the minds of the Yao, who see not only the huts but also the social relationships of the people occupying them, there is no confusion at all. As a general rule the villages are fairly compact and clearly demarcated from others, and even strangers have no difficulty in recognizing the autonomy of the group which is expressed in many different ways. MacDonald recorded that formerly a headman performed a certain amount of ritual which symbolized the unity of the village.[1] Much of this has fallen away, but the unity remains. 621

The ritual surrounding the foundation of a new village bears testimony to its persisting political significance. In this ritual the unity of the group, against other similar groups, including the village from which it has sprung, is expressed. On first arrival at a new village site the men build grass sheds, beginning with that of the headman. That night the headman pours a cone of sacred flour at the root of a tree on the site, and asks the spirits of his ancestors whether the site is propitious. Early next morning he examines the cone to see the answer. If a side of the cone has collapsed it does not augur well and another site is selected. If the cone is still whole it is taken that the spirits acquiesce, and permanent huts can be started. The headman then goes into the bush to find medicines[2] which he mixes with groundbeans. That night, with the medicated groundbeans in the hut, the headman has intercourse with his wife. In the morning those who are not sexually active come to the headman's grass shed to drink some water in which the medicine has been steeped and eat some of the medicated beans with a little porridge, which the headman's wife has prepared from the sacred flour. This medicine is called 'the medicine to strengthen the village' (mtera wakulimbika mzi). Until then all members of the village should have been continent but after this sexual relationships may be resumed. The object of the medicine is to prevent those 622 621 787 622 621 751 834 370

[1] See pp. 32-2.

[2] Nkhungwe and ulunu, two plants commonly used for protection against witchcraft. See l.c., p. 112. 627

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

who are sexually inactive from contracting ndaka.[1] At the same time the headman gives each household a piece of the fire which has been newly kindled in the traditional way by rubbing two sticks together.

The mystical danger inherent in the act of setting up a new village is well brought out in the propitiatory prayer and the abstinence from sexual intercourse. Once again it is the village headman who must make the offering to his ancestors; and it is the village headman who has intercourse with his wife so that the effluvium from his sexual activity may permeate the medicine in the hut and so protect the villagers from ndaka. Lastly, it is very important that the whole village cooks and is warmed by one fire. 'We are of one fire' expresses the common origin of two villages; though in fact every time a new village is founded a new fire should be kindled. To bring fire from the village of origin is to bring sorcery, since the Yao believe that sorcery can operate between persons closely linked by kinship only. To have one's own fire is to be autonomous from other groups.

The Burdens and Rewards of Headmanship

MacDonald had the perspicuity to see not only that the village headman was the representative of a corporate group and that he represented this group to outsiders, but also that he represented external authority to his villagers. The village headman who in his person stood for the unity of the group, performed certain ritual acts which emphasized this, such as praying to the village ancestors. In spite of the decline of the ritual his position is still regarded as exceptional. Much, however, depends on the rank of the village headman. There may not be much difference in ritual observances and mystical dangers between a headman who has in his charge a meagre three or four huts, and a commoner. In the larger and more important

[1] This is one of the most important mystical concepts of the Yao. I have described this condition and its implications more fully in Marriage among the Machinga Yao of Southern Nyasaland (R.-L.I. Paper), forthcoming. Briefly it is a disease characterized by oedema which affects those who are sexually inactive when they are suddenly brought into contact with a person, or an object which he has touched, after having intercourse. The people most affected are the young and the old, i.e. those who cannot have sexual intercourse. Those who are capable of intercourse are expected to have ritual intercourse with a stranger, and so fortify themselves against this dread disease.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

622 neglect neither his sorority-group nor the husbands in his village,[1] that his sorority-group and his village were his garden and he must take care of the young plants in it. The husbands were the watchmen who look after the women in the village. A headman dare not take sides or be unfair, nor must he talk behind people's backs. He must take care to settle differences amicably by discussion at meetings. They advised him not to pay too much attention to his wives who may have quarrelled with his sisters and tell him that they have been insulting him. When he hears a report like that he may be unfair to his sisters and people will say that he has broken his village through listening to nonsense. This sort of instruction went on through the night.

On Friday when the beer was brewed, Mlamba and Mbalwe, both headmen and perpetual sons of Nyambi, came to the village [344] and told the men to build a small grass shed for the successor to sit in. This the men did, and the women were told to plaster it and clean the huts out for the strangers who would be coming to the ceremony. On Saturday morning before cockcrow, Makoka and Ncimba got up and told the women to cook a big pot of porridge because they were taking Cimombo to bathe and when they returned they would want to find porridge ready. [415] Makoka took some medicine called mkulumo in a bark container (likungwa) into the toilet enclosure. He put the medicine into • [751] two jars of water and told Cimombo to wash himself in it daily as he was an important headman, and it would strengthen his body.[2] After Cimombo had washed he went back into the hut 622 where a mat was spread on the floor and on it were a dish of 266 porridge and three dishes of relish. Makoka and Ncimbo told him to take a little porridge, dip it into one of the relishes—whichever he chose—and eat it. Cimombo did so. They did not tell him that one of the dishes contained human flesh.[3] When he tried the dish of human flesh he vomited and all the villagers cried with joy, saying that he was a good chief because he had

[1] Mbumba jao ni akamwini wao—the meaning and significance of this in the village context is explained on p. 183.

[2] This is a euphemism for protective medicine against sorcery.

[3] The immediate question is: Where did the human flesh come from? No informant could tell me and I am inclined to believe that one of the dishes is 'ritually' made into human flesh for this ceremony. This special ceremony was always spoken about as if it were secret, especially from White people.

881 in turn. After drinking, they sit down while the n'michila gives instructions that here they [533 sleep tonight. He takes his basket and starts to run back to Lupanda, singing:

"Ku	tunjile	pilolinje	nikumbuje	kutunjiro	ku Mundi!"
"Where	we went to		masters		to Mundi!"

534 Then going to the back of his hut, he enters and takes a piece of bark left there bent up into a dish containing medicine which has been put in by an assistant. This assistant holds in his hand the neck of one of the fowls which was killed at Lupanda. The n'michila washes his face and chest with medicine to cleanse his eyes and then leans forward to the assistant and bites a piece off the neck of the fowl which the assistant holds out, and eats it. This is ku-lumiza, "to taste a small piece," often the liver, before starting to eat the flesh; this is generally done by the most important person. The n'michila has been followed by his assistants who do as he has done. They all follow him next round the cooking place for the boys at Lupanda, each standing for a moment on the stones which have supported the cooking pots, while the women sit looking on sadly. He begins to dance and the women join in, singing likwata. He then calls the parents of the wali and leads them to where the bonfire was. There assembled, he tells them they must not bathe, and that tomorrow morning early, porridge is to be sent to the wali which must be prepared by a woman who has had connection with her husband and who has not washed her hands; this is supposed to make the boys strong. Early in the morning, the husband, who likewise has not washed his hands, carries the food to the wali and personally gives portions to each boy to eat.

881 When they have partaken of the food, the circumcision is performed by the n'michila
304 who has returned the same morning early. The wali one by one, commencing with the leader, go forward a little to the place where the n'michila awaits them. Each wali is accompanied by his nkamwai who commonly says, "Come along and you shall eat of the honey made by the bumblebee." Such honey is very sweet and called mawa. This refers in sarcastic terms to the pain the boy is about to undergo. The boy squats down, leaning back on his nkamwai who supports him, while the medicine-man, having warned the lad not to cry out, performs the circumcision with a small knife called chinwale. It is a triangu-
[412] lar knife with one cutting edge and a handle produced from the opposite corner. Properly the Yao method is, I believe, only to nick the free margin of the prepuce just to the right of the middle line near the frenum, but complete circumcision is now commonly practised, possibly as the result of Swahili influence. In this case, the prepuce is seized and held by the fingers, and division made by a circular incision without using a clamp or forked stick.
[785] A dressing of charcoal and oil may be applied or medicine is chewed in the mouth and the saliva spat on the wound and the boy sent on to rest under some convenient tree.

882 When all the wali have been circumcised, they are gathered together in one place and
● [785] the n'michila dividing them into groups, puts on the neck of the leader of each group a necklace made of plaited bark from the mjunda tree;[1] these necklaces contain medicine against all evils – witchcraft, attack by lions, etc.

3:Stanzus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

843 538 when in child-birth there is delay in delivery it is said of the woman "Akulukwa," "she is stuck," from ku-kulukwa "to be suspended, to be caught by a thorn"; wujuji, well dressed, is a slang exclamation meaning "everything, everything is out!" The verse refers, of course, as all obstetricians will recognize, to the moment of crowning of the emerging head during parturition when it appears to be stuck; then suddenly it slips over the perineum and "everything, everything is out."

843 533 The nakanga now gives way to the songs of the other women. In different districts different versions of the songs are sung, but the other women will quickly pick up the refrain of the song sung by a woman who has come in from some distance.

843 After these songs, the nakanga instructs the woman and her husband in the care they must take until after the child is born. Macdonald says, speaking of the instructions "but of the quality, we prefer to be silent."[1] What a pity he allows no one else to judge!

The woman is especially cautioned against sitting with her legs crossed; they must be kept apart lest the child in her womb be suffocated. She is also told many useful things concerning her pregnancy and confinement. The husband is cautioned to cease intercourse with his wife or if he has intercourse, his wife may not lie on her back, lest the child be injured.

While this instruction is going on, all the assembled women cook and eat the feast which has been made for them. When all has been said, the nakanga anoints the man with castor oil, which has in the meantime been warmed, and ties round the neck of the woman the litiwo, a cord made of plaited bark-cloth with a tassel in front; at the base of the tassel white beads are strung for good luck, and at the end of the tassel, red beads are affixed, having symbolic reference to the haemorrhage at the time of childbirth. The woman wears only a strip of calico of two hands breadth called ulala. She is anointed on the head, body, and limbs.

[751] The tying of the litiwo is the sign for dancing to begin. It is a dance in which women try to excel one another. They come with all their tattoo marks on buttocks, thighs, and abdomen renovated; they wear diaper-fashion a narrow strip of cloth, always black in color, and round their bodies numerous strings of beads. With the beginning of the dancing, their other clothes are thrown off and practically naked, they vie with one other in exhibiting their charms and skill in dancing, which afterwards becomes the subject of much discussion among the women onlookers. "So and so is really too old and skinny for such exhibition," and "So and so has buttocks as flat as a wall," while "Such and such a one is fat and beautiful and dances wonderfully, with such shoulders," etc. In front of the woman

[431] is set a wooden plate, in front of the man a mat, and on these are thrown donations by the dancers and onlookers, consisting of beads etc., or nowadays pennies and small silver coins to help to pay the expenses of the entertainment and, in the woman's case, to buy medicine which may be necessary should the baby fall ill. When the wedded couple are

[1] Africana, op. cit., vol. I, p. 139.

3:Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

757 Simple incision is practised for relief of pain or again "medicine" may be introduced into the wound. Such medicine usually consists of charcoal prepared from various vegetable substances. There is no evidence that any active medicinal principles are involved and the most that is attained is probably a certain amount of counter-irritation. For pain, a string is tied tightly round the part; thus for headache one sees a string tied round the head and doubtless some relief is felt when pressure is made on the temples. A man with an abscess of the hand or foot will tie a string round the arm or leg, but I have never seen it so applied as to produce any effect comparable to that of Bier's hyperaemic treatment. By analogy a string may be worn round the chest for pleuritic pain and by limiting movement may be effective. In many cases a charm is attached to the string as an adjuvant.

The use of drugs as such is widespread but I have very little evidence of their efficacy. The methods of administration are various. The vapor bath is often used. Over a pot of water in which have been dropped herbs and stones heated in a fire, the patient squats enveloped in a blanket and is thereby subjected to the action of the medicated steam. This method is also adopted for enemas. A case which came recently to my notice was the wife of a native hospital dresser who, suffering pain in the abdomen, avoided my ministrations and consulted a female medicine-maker. She was given a vapor bath as above described and after a few moments, the medicine-woman slapped her on the back and told her to rise. The old woman plunged her hands into the pot and brought forth some human hair tied in a piece of calico and a human metacarpal bone. "These are what troubled you," she said — fee £1! This is called ku-kapisia, to take evil things out for.

[758] Various powdered barks and leaves are applied to ulcers and appear to have an astringent effect in some cases but the majority seem to go from bad to worse. No other external applications have been observed except one for scabies. Incision of the skin and insertion of "medicine" have been mentioned above.

Large numbers of vegetable products are administered by mouth, always in the form of an infusion or suspension. It is probable that a number of these are really beneficial but I am not able to speak in detail of their effects. Many astringents are undoubtedly used for diarrhoea. Herbs containing oil are used for gonorrhoea.

757 Apart from magic medicine dealt with elsewhere and commonly employed for purposes outside disease, charms are used for the prevention and treatment of ordinary diseases and injuries. There are only a few varieties of charms. A vegetable substance, root or stem, may be worn on a string round the part of the body concerned. Thus one sees a couple of little pieces of stick, mbiji, on a string tied round the head, round the arm or round the chest for headache, a whitlow or diarrhoea as the case may be. The medicine may be in the form of a preparation, generally charred vegetable substances, and is made into a little packet in leaves and cloth worn most commonly round the neck; it is called kalamwa. Such a charm is supposed to be effective against all ills.

3:Stanner D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

Again, charm medicine may be contained in various articles which are also generally worn round the neck. The teeth and claws of the beasts of prey are so employed, generally arranged in pairs bound together so as to form a crescent and suspended from a string. The teeth of crocodiles, lions, leopards, and the claws of the same beasts and of some large birds of prey are thus employed. The teeth etc., are in themselves charms against injury, probably against what one might call homologous injury. The idea of stuffing them with medicine is probably a secondary consideration, a process of fortification of the charm so that its use comes to have a more powerful influence. It is interesting to see of late years that the native, recognising the decorative value of these crescent-shaped amulets, has begun to copy them in lead and ivory. A series of these of graduated size is worn as a necklace by women. 751 757 825

When a medicine-man is consulted, part payment is made in advance, "payment to go and dig medicine (roots)." The rest of the payment is made when the cure is effected. Should a patient not be satisfied with his treatment and wish to consult some other medicine-man, he pays to the first a quarter of the fee he would have paid if his cure had been effected; this is called "paying him to get his medicine away." Unless this is done, should he recover later, he will be liable to claims for full fees from all of the medicine-men he has consulted; each will say his own medicine has gone on acting and has effected the cure. A medicine-man may take a case he is treating into his own house. 756

In prescribing medicine, very particular instructions are given with an embargo on certain things which may or may not have some use and significance. A medicine-man in 1901 at Malemya's, who inoculated every one in the forehead with bullet proof medicine, said that no one must step across a mutai (pestle for pounding grain), and no one must eat the leaves of the sweet potato.

A medicine-man always partakes of part of the decoction he is giving to a patient to show that it is harmless; I think these preparations are mostly inactive. I should hate to sample all the castor oil I have prescribed, though many natives have had suspicions about me when I have not done so.

Poisons. Though there are a large number of species in this country, both vegetable and animal, from which poison might be extracted, those that have gained any reputation among natives and have come under my observation are but few in number. Mwai (Mwabai Chin.) "the ordeal poison," is the bark of Erythrophleum guineense. The natives distinguish two varieties of mwai, the two trees differing slightly in leaf, flower and bark; mwai in the Erythrophleum guineense, the second variety known as mpanyajile is doubtless an allied species. Mwai is the poison employed in the poison ordeal.[1] It is administered in a poisonous dose as a decoction of the bark, recovery or otherwise depending on whether or not the poison is vomited by vomiting. Natives give as the symptoms headache, giddiness, disturbances of vision, vomiting and purging, with slowing of heart beat. Alpo- 137 238 [695]

[1] See index, p. 296.

3:Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

539

60. Gonwe lende ndakuti!
Lying on the rock, heat!

This is a slang expression which in full would read, "It is nice and warm lying on a rock in the sun, but it is not so comfortable as being in bed in company with your wife; you can go on waiting but you won't get anything." This might even be said to a dog, watching as a dog will, every morsel of food lifted to its master's mouth.

61. Kulupilile mwai pa nkina!
To have hopes of water for maggots!

It is a custom before lying down to sleep on the floor mat, to take it up and pour boiling water on the earth floor to kill any blood-sucking maggots (Congo flour-maggot, Anthomyopsis). If you see a pot cooking on the fire, you naturally think there is food being prepared but you may be disappointed; it may only be the pot for heating the water to kill the maggots. The saying is thus used to a man who has made an assignation and is disappointed but goes on waiting. [513] [751]

62. Kuluma ngwe!
To bite cockroach-like!

The cockroach is described by natives as going up to what it will eat, remaining quiet for some moments, and then suddenly taking a bite. This is said of a man who comes up to you smiling and then hits you a hard blow. [625]

Among the Yao as among other tribes that I have previously mentioned,[1] signs of salutation to a superior are made by clapping the hands or patting the breast or buttock with one hand, at the same time crouching down. A woman will go off the path and kneel, looking away from a superior passing along the roadway. 576

A person going by the door of a hut where others are sitting, will say "Kwalanga bana! At the door here." Passing behind anyone, he will say "Ku-ego 'nsa! At the back!" Meeting anyone on a path, a man will simply say, "Ishe, bwe," adding perhaps, "Ku-shale! all is well!" A chief or headman on returning to his village after a journey, is greeted by the women with trilling of the tongue (Ku-lulula). [201]

Man and wife do not greet each other in the morning. The wife rises first and draws water and places it in the hut for the husband's use but nothing may be said.

When a visitor is entertained and a chicken cooked for a repast, the "pope's nose" is always for the visitor. The right hand only is used in dipping into the common pot. A man of small importance, though replete, will go on making pretence of eating at a common meal by taking very small amounts so that his superior shall finish first, and rise and go away before him.

I may here add the words used by the Yao for the sounds made by various animals; they are interesting to compare with those of other languages: 192.

[1] "Notes on some tribes of British Central Africa," op. cit., p. [illegible]

7: Hetherwick M-S (ca. 1900) 1902 FT7 Yao FT7

evidence. On the appointed day she dances, lupina mwandu, to dance the spirits, or lisawanda, to rave or prophesy, and in the ravings of the dance she calls out the name of some party who is afterwards accused of being the mwavi or witch. Followed by a crowd of excited spectators she dances through the village spear in hand, stopping here and there to dig up charms or medicines which the supposed witch has buried in the ground as the instruments of his occult practices. It is only in cases of supposed special difficulty, or when the magnitude of the supposed crimes demands that special measures be adopted for their detection, that the services of such a witch detective are called in. In ordinary cases these appeals are made to the divining oracle who consults his "lota" as a means of discovering crimes of this nature.

Among the Yaos the human being is believed to be the sole possessor of a linda. I have been unable to discover any trace of a theory that the linda may pass into any animal or inanimate object and thus confer upon it the nature or power of a fetish. Such belief is cherished among the Angoni and Achewa tribes to the westward by Nyasa and the upper Shire River, and the intelligent Yao is aware of this, but he states that among his people no such belief exists. Even charms which have the effect of healing or warding off disease, or of protecting the wearer from war or wild beasts or other danger by land or water, are supposed to possess this power without any idea of their being possessed by a linda or other spirit influence. The nearest approach to such a theory is in the case of certain powerful "doctors" who have obtained special medicine by means of which, at death, they can transform themselves into lions, leopards, crocodiles, etc. Lepers also are sometimes supposed to become hippopotami. But both of these cases must be regarded rather as transmutations of body than transmigrations of soul.

It will be thus seen that the nature of the human linda is closely allied to that of the mandu, which are the inspiring spirits in madness and in the century of prophecy or incantation. What the origin of these inspiring mandu is, or to whom they belonged when in bodily life, the Yao holds no theory. He is content to accept them as they are, mandu (pop. "Just mandu and nothing more," as he says.

It is, however, when we follow the disembodied linda after death and consider its position and power in the other world that we find ourselves in a region of higher spiritual activities.

In dreams or in fainting fits the linda leaves the body but only to return to it with the awakening consciousness. At death, however, it leaves its earthly abode never to return. It is now spoken of as having gone to malenga or mlenga. This word, which lies at the basis of all Yao theories of the place of the soul after death, will be dealt with later on as regards its derivation and connections in the Bantu family of languages. In its actual use it bears two significations.

1. The word malenga is in the first instance applied to the human soul or linda after death when it is considered as an inhabitant of the spirit world. Even in life a man, when he meets with any piece of good luck, will be heard to say, "It's my malenga," as if his soul had an influence in determining the character of his

10: Sanderson D-5 (ca. 1920)1922 FT7 Yao FT7

A Note on Ceremonial Purification among the WaYao, Nyasaland. 55

By Meredith Sanderson, M.R.C.S., F.R.G.S.

One of the effects of European influence in Africa is the breaking up of tribal organization and discipline. The rights of the individual being no longer subordinated to the common good, customs formerly observed by the village community as a whole die out, while those affecting the individual are still practised.

This tendency is well seen in the ancient ceremonies of purification among the WaYao which are now rarely performed collectively, though the natives, however highly "educated," still goes to the doctor to obtain the necessary medicines for removing, for instance, the contamination caused by contact with a corpse.

These collective ceremonies have already been described by various writers in respect of both Nyasaland and elsewhere;‡ but the Yao tribe have not, I think, been given in detail, and the following notes may not, therefore, be altogether valueless.

The Pepile ceremony (Ceppipile, "he sweep") is common to most Bantu tribes. In its simplest form it used to be performed annually by the WaYao, at the beginning of the twelfth month, count of the months (lunar) being kept by means of a "calendar."§ The whole village is thoroughly "spring-cleaned," all rubbish

* At Ku, where the game is played on All Souls' night in the mornings, Father Hermelen Nyoni tells me, the song in Kiswahili runs:—

Yaoo, yaoo, quando to voogo,
Yaoo, yaoo, Kay mate
Yaoo, yaoo where you come;
Yaoo, yaoo, I shall not be there any more.

Words repeated, pensively, to the hidden ball.

† See Sanderson, M. C., "The Yao Tribes," pp. [illegible], 1919. Annual Report, Bureau American Ethnology, 1919.

‡ Frazer, "Golden Bough," II., 179, 180.

§ A "calendar" consists of a string tied to two pegs in the wall of the house, or between two poles, on which are threaded twelve pieces of reed, bamboo or cornstalk. One of these is moved to the other end of the string each time a new month is seen.

[illegible]

[364] is swept up, the ground round the house is hard clean, and the latrines demolished. Ceremonial beer is brewed by the head wife of the chief, and after this has been drunk the ashes of the fire used in the brewing are carefully collected and taken to a meikhour ("ceremonial," or "divinging of paths") where they are deposited.

[365] The chief, as representative of his people, bathes in special medicated water, a decoction made from the bark of m'bengo and ashes, and the rest of mpingo.

[366] This completes the ordinary annual ceremony, at which new fire is not made.

[367] On certain special occasions a more elaborate ritual is carried out; such occasions are the death of a chief, a threatened epidemic of infectious disease, a murder (especially by shooting) and the frequent occurrence of quarrels in the village.

In such circumstances, in addition to the ordinary purgatio ceremony described above, the porridge sticks of the whole village are removed and all fires extinguished. The discarded sticks and all ashes of the old fires are carried to the meeting of paths, where the former are stuck upright in the ground and the ashes piled together; this is done in procession, all the people taking part. On their return to the village [372] new fire is made by friction by either the chief or his younger brother—usually the latter; fire procured in any other way would nullify the proceedings. Finally

[373] all the people bathe in the medicated water used only by the chief at the ordinary ceremony.

● 957 976 In addition to this special form of the purgatio ceremony, another rite is sometimes performed after the occurrence of a murder or as prophylactic against the spread of epidemic disease. The doctor first makes a kind of trough (ndengwe) from the bark of m'mbembe or m'mpin, and procures a chokhilo (or chipangali) basket—used as a strainer in sub-making. Having collected his medicines he proceeds to the bank of the stream near the usual bathing-place of the village and digs a shallow hole, in which he places the basket; in this he puts the leaves of a certain thorny shrub and covers the whole with the trough, which is banked up with earth so as to be perfectly firm. He then puts his "medicines" into the trough; these are, first, the head of an iron hammer and a piece of dog, both from a smelting furnace. On top of these he puts pieces of the root of a certain tree which has many and particularly sharp thorns, and bits of bark from two trees peculiar for having very straight stems. Having distributed these evenly along the floor of the trough, he fills it with water and then proceeds to construct an arch over the end of the trough farthest from the stream. Two long poles, cut from a kind of tree particularly rich in sap, are planted in the ground, one on each side of the trough and close to it; these are bent over towards each other, and fastened together by means of a strip of their own bark. A bamboo is now planted alongside each, and similarly tied to the fellow. During all these preparations and throughout the ceremony it is essential that the doctor has no knots in any part of his clothing.

The preparations are now complete, and when all the fires in the village have been extinguished the people go in procession to the spot where the doctor awaits them. All must be purely clad and must have no metal about them.

[368] The chief opens the ceremony. He steps into the trough and taking some of

[369] the medicated water therefrom in his hands he rinses his mouth with it. He then offers a prayer to the spirits of his ancestors, first stating the emergency and

[370] calling the measures which are to be taken to deal with it (new fire, sweeping, discard of porridge sticks and shooting). The prayer over, he splashes the water in the trough over his body and passes through the arch, first throwing some gifts (beads or, in more modern times, money) into the trough. These gifts, presumably [371] intended as an offering to the spirits, are the perquisite of the doctor, and everybody is supposed to contribute in turn.

10: Sanderson D-5 (ca. 1928)1922 FT7 Yao FT7

The men and boys now pass through the arch in order of seniority; each splashes himself with the water in the trough, but neither speaks nor rinses the mouth. The women come next, led by the head-wife of the chief; the latter rinses her mouth and, instructed by the doctor, repeats a prayer similar to that offered by her husband. The remainder of the women merely splash themselves, like the men, before passing through the arch. All then return to the village, where the pyejile is continued. 751 796

Finally the doctor takes the hammer-head from the trough and hands it to the chief, who robs the bolt into it, and, a bar having been placed on the ground, goes through the form of forging the latter by beating it with the hammer. He then scrapes the ground with the bar as if clearing a place overgrown with grass; he does not dig with it as in hoeing up the ground for planting seed. After this rite the chief again bathes in medicated water similar to that in the trough, and the ceremony is complete.

Whereas the pyejile ceremony and its adjunct, the rite of the arch, are now but rarely performed, no Yao will omit the rite of purification after a death in his family. This ceremony consists of two essential parts, both protective against the whole, a disease characterised by dropsy and supposed to be contracted by contact with a corpse, or by association, especially by sharing a meal, with those who have been in such contact. The first of these parts is bathing in certain medicines, which protects the bather from whole, and the second consists of a sort of communion meal, shared by all friends and especially relatives with those who have been contaminated, and designed to protect those friends and relatives. [178] 751 764 796 783

The decoction for bathing is made by soaking the roots of Lagenaria and Sandoricum in water, together with the bark of mbonwa, one piece each from the east and west aspects of the tree; the water assumes a reddish tint, and the whole body is bathed. 751 783 824 765

The communion meal consists of porridge made from any kind of flour or of rice, and some spinach leaves. In the latter case scorched and powdered root of mwandongolile is mixed, with a little salt. All near relatives of the deceased must partake of this meal, as well as their wives and their near relatives; part is carefully put aside for the use of any relative unable to be present at the ceremony. [263]

Lastly, since the spread of Islam among the WaYao, this rite has become confused with the distribution of food to the poor at the funeral of a Muslim, and the Arabic word sadaqa ("charity") is now generally used for it, to the exclusion of its wider, correct meaning. [177] [177]

It may be mentioned here that after the death of a child the father is desired to sow to his wife for a period of about three weeks, and the first act must be one of coitus interruptus. 765 789

MEREDITH SANDERSON.

765 supposed to be the abode of spirits. Except in the case of chiefs, the Wayao never make any sacrifices over their graves, like the Anyanja grass shelters, and the present-day Mahenenkhe earth imitations of Swahili tombs.

766 Chiefs, and the more important headmen, are usually buried in their own villages. Over the grave, a grass hut with a veranda is erected; the hut is covered with calico, and guns were formerly set in an veranda posts. Guns and ivory used to be buried with the corpse [767] but these Yao, I am told, never practised the barbarous custom of burying slaves with their chiefs. Information of the death of a chief was always conveyed to other chiefs by slaves who were kept by the recipient of the message.

Since the time of the old Mahenyo, the corpse of a chief always lies with its head in the direction of the old chief's grave. The grave is swept around, and the house pulled down as in the case of an ordinary man, but the grave-hut is rebuilt every year and never forgotten.

Since the burial of the dead is more or less correlated with the idea of planting seed from which progeny will spring, the natives will not bury a leper, believing that if they did so, leprosy would spring up all around them. Persons dying of an epidemic disease such as small-pox are dealt with in the same way. In these cases and in that of a man dying of ordeal poison, the body is enclosed in a mat and put up in a tree, a manner of disposing of the dead common among the Angoni and some Anyanja. Concerning death from dropsy, similar precautions are taken to those in the instance of a woman dying in childbirth,[1] and a tube is put down to the body from the surface of the ground.

A leper feeling that the end is near, will ask to be put in a hut built outside the limits of the burial ground. Here, provided with water and food for a few days, he will wait to die near the graveyard wherein he knows he cannot be buried.

Anyone who is wounded with a spear or any other weapon is not taken into the village, [768] but is kept in a hut in the bush. If death results, the mourning ceremonies differ somewhat from the ordinary rites and are much curtailed.

Initiation Ceremonies. Under this heading I propose to deal with the three ceremonies, Lapondo, Chipale and Liliwo. They are ceremonies of great importance in the life of the native and their educative effect for the good of the tribe is far reaching.

At Lapondo (Nkapala) the young boys attend; at Chipale the young girls go through their initiation and a side ceremony for young married men takes place, while Liliwo celebrates the first quickening with child. All the ceremonies are included in the word Unyago. Macdonald in Africana while referring to "the mysteries"[2] gives scant information about the ceremonies and has, presumably, without much knowledge of what goes on, condemned these customs like many others as furthering "absurd superstitions." He has failed to recognize that they are ceremonies when a large amount of useful advice is imparted, good manners are inculcated, and tribal matters in vogue known. Sexual questions are dealt with in these mysteries, and, though mixed up with a large amount of superstition, a

[1] See supra, p. 306. [2] Op. cit., vol. 2, ch. 2.

[55] to turn. After drinking, they sit down while the n'nimbin gives instructions that have they sleep tonight. He takes his basket and starts to run back to Lepondo, singing:

[53] [53]

"Ee	begin	pabinge	ndumbuje	Ndumpire	Ee Wundi"
"Where	we want to		mentors		to Wundi?"

Then going to the back of his hut, he enters and takes a piece of bark left there heat up into a dish containing medicine which has been put in by an assistant. This assistant holds in his hand the neck of one of the fowls which was killed at Lepondo. The n'nimbin washes his face and chest with medicine to cleanse his eyes and then bends forward to the assistant and bites a piece off the neck of the fowl which the assistant holds out, and eats it. This is bo-bamire, "to taste a small piece," after the fowl, before starting to eat the flesh; this is generally done by the most important person. The n'nimbin has been followed by his assistants who do as he has done. They all follow him next round the cooking place for the boys at Lepondo, each standing for a moment on the stones which have supported the cooking pots, while the women sit looking on sadly. He begins to dance and the women join in, singing Mwanda. He then calls the parents of the soil and leads them to where the leader was. There assembled, he tells them they must not bathe, and that tomorrow morning early, porridge is to be sent to the soil which must be prepared by a woman who has had connection with her husband and who has not washed her hands; this is supposed to make the boys strong. Early in the morning, the husband, who likewise has not washed his hands, carries the food to the soil and personally gives portions to each boy to eat.

[54] When they have partaken of the food, the circumcision is performed by the n'nimbin who has returned the same morning early. The soil one by one, commencing with the leader, go forward a little to the place where the n'nimbin awaits them. Each would be accompanied by his sponsor who commonly says, "Come along and you shall eat of the honey made by the bumblebee." Such honey is very sweet and called mamu. This refers in metaphor terms to the pain the boy is about to undergo. The boy squats down, leaning back on his sponsor who supports him, while the medicine-man, having shaved the hair out to my cut, performs the circumcision with a small knife called ntumbi. It is a triangular knife with one cutting edge and a handle produced from the opposite corner. Properly the Yao method is, I believe, only to nick the free margin of the prepuce just to the right of the middle line near the frenum, but complete circumcision is now commonly practised, possibly as the result of Swahili influence. In this case, the prepuce is seized and held by the fingers, and division made by a circular incision without using a sheep or forked stick. A dressing of charcoal and oil may be applied or medicine is chewed in the mouth and the saliva spat on the wound and the boy sent on to rest under more convenient trees.

[55] When all the soil have been circumcised, they are gathered together in one place and the n'nimbin dividing them into groups, puts on the neck of the leader of each group a medicine made of plaited bark from the mpindo tree.[1] These medicines contain medicine

[56] [56]

[1] [illegible]

Other hypothetical diseases which are caused by disbelieves to women are mentioned under various other headings. Kanipo: a disease generally characterized by alienation of the legs but in some cases by pains in the back, or heavily used for a variety of symptoms, is said to be caused by the entry into the body of a worm which lives in water-pools. This worm which I have had identified is a gordian worm and not known to be parasitic in man. Lamei: When a man kills another in battle, he will sit upon the belly of his victim; otherwise he believes he will shiver, with heat and his own belly will swell up like that of the corpse when putrefaction sets in. He is supposed also to hunger after more killing and blood. Lilongo is the name of a supposed disease which kills off one child after another in a family when they are about six months old. Congenital syphilis naturally suggests itself but I have never been able to verify this idea. Lilongo lya bainin: a supposed disease which causes the death of the first child when the second is born, the second when the third is born and so on, whatever the intervals between the births. Each child is said to push (lu-tsin) the previous one out of this world. Under these circumstances the disease is ascribed to something wrong with the mother or father and they are examined by a medicine-woman or medicine-man, and any menstrular or an external pile found will be cut away.

If a snake bifurcates two times, the case will prove fatal. If a crocodile emits a growling sound when seizing its victim, though he escapes he will certainly die.

Treatment of diseases. Of surgical treatment there is very little to be noted. Nothing in the way of operation is performed with the exception of circumcision (see Legends).

An abscess is allowed to burst, the smallest tumor is left untouched, but necessary digits which are not sore, attached only by a few pedicle, are snipped off.

The native cannot extract teeth. They are incapable of rendering any assistance in cases of difficult labor. Dislocations are not recognized as such, but fractures are treated by the application of wooden sticks placed at intervals round the circumference of the limb parallel to it and held in position by twisted pieces of bark string (Pl. XXIII, fig. 3). The principle of the tourniquet appears to be unknown.

The only instruments used consist of a small knife for incision, a cupping-horn, and a primitive form of funnel for administering enemata (Pl. XXIII, figs. 1, 2, 4). The knife has a triangular blade with a stone which is commonly twisted at one of the corners. The knife is used for wet-cupping, tattooing, and circumcision (Pl. XXIII, fig. 3). The cupping-horn is a small horn of a calf. The spike is pierced and after application to the part, suction is made with the mouth and then the hole sealed by rocking a piece of beeswax over it with the tongue. Six small incisions are made in the skin for the withdrawal of the blood. The cupping-horn is called ebeni (Johnston, Chin.). Cupping is used for headache and for pain in the chest and back. The enema funnel, ekpelpe (Johnston, Chin.) is made from the neck of a gourd to which is attached a hollow straw for introduction into the anus. Half a pint of an infusion of cowpeas is injected for constipation associated with pain.

[End Plate 22]

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

who are sexually inactive from contracting ndaka.[1] At the same time the headman gives each household a piece of the fire which has been newly kindled in the traditional way by rubbing two sticks together.

The mystical danger inherent in the act of setting up a new village is well brought out in the propitiatory prayer and the abstinence from sexual intercourse. Once again it is the village headman who must make the offering to his ancestors; and it is the village headman who has intercourse with his wife so that the effluvium from his sexual activity may permeate the medicine in the hut and so protect the villagers from ndaka. Lastly, it is very important that the whole village cooks and is warmed by one fire. 'We are of one fire' expresses the common origin of two villages; though in fact every time a new village is founded a new fire should be kindled. To bring fire from the village of origin is to bring sorcery, since the Yao believe that sorcery can operate between persons closely linked by kinship only. To have one's own fire is to be autonomous from other groups.

The Burdens and Rewards of Headmanship

MacDonald had the perspicuity to see not only that the village headman was the representative of a corporate group and that he represented this group to outsiders, but also that he represented external authority to his villagers. The village headman who in his person stood for the unity of the group, performed certain ritual acts which emphasized this, such as praying to the village ancestors. In spite of the decline of the ritual his position is still regarded as exceptional. Much, however, depends on the rank of the village headman. There may not be much difference in ritual observances and mystical dangers between a headman who has in his charge a meagre three or four huts, and a commoner. In the larger and more important strike out with his adherents to found a new village. A sum of £6 or £7 is a considerable amount in everyday Yao life where the annual cash income of the average individual is not much more. The leader of a dissident group is prepared to forgo this wealth to get one foot on to the lowest rung of the political ladder—that is by becoming a village headman.

[1] This is one of the most important mystical concepts of the Yao. I have described this condition and its implications more fully in Marriage among the Machinga Yao of Southern Nyasaland (R.-L.I. Paper), forthcoming. Briefly it is a disease characterized by edema which affects those who are sexually inactive when they are suddenly brought into contact with a person, or an object which he has touched, after having intercourse. The people most affected are the young and the old, i.e. those who cannot have sexual intercourse. Those who are capable of intercourse are expected to have sexual intercourse with a stranger, and so fortify themselves against this dread disease.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

Obversely there is a great deal of sentiment attached to the idea of a united village. To the Yao way of thinking a village is broken by fighting or death, and these evils are linked by witchcraft beliefs. The association of death and the break-up of the village is brought out clearly by the funeral ablutions of villagers after the burial of one of their number. An important ingredient in the medicine with which the mourners wash themselves after the funeral, is ciwele. It is the earth from a particular type of terminary which is usually about 12 to 18 inches high, upright and almost cylindrical. The crust is very brittle and it is comparatively easy to chip off a piece. When this is done a mass of internal chambers and passages is revealed. The soldier ants, unlike those of other species that retreat into the darkness of their passages as soon as they are exposed, come into the open daylight and swarm in confusion over the fractured terminary. When I questioned my informant about ciwele, he kicked the crust off the top of one of the hills and said, 'See all the houses in the village of the ants? I have broken their village. So it is with death. It breaks the village.'

The Yao believe that death 'breaks the village' and that conflicts through sorcery lead to death. Therefore, conflicts are the real cause of village splits. Hence differences must be settled immediately if the village is to persist, because if they last too long one of the aggrieved parties is sure to start using sorcery against its opponents. Those who do move away, go to a distant place because they believe that sorcery operates only where there is social interaction. But the fear of sorcery on the other hand is just as strong a force in maintaining the physical unity of the village. It is while the migration is being planned that sorcery is most likely to be used. This is particularly so if the village break is taking the form of a lineage split. This happened, for example, in Lupanje village.

Kalambo, the sister's son of Lupanje, wanted to leave the village and had gone to seek a suitable site. When he returned he found that

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

621 his mother was ill and had gone with Lopunje's younger brother to 626 the diviner to find out the cause of the illness. The diviner indicated 753 that Lopunje thought that Kalombo was not showing him the proper respect. Lopunje knew that his sisters had lost their value in the lineage since they had stopped bearing children, whereas Kalombo's sisters were still reproducing. His malice had caused the woman's illness. When Kalombo got home he asked his mother's brother to blow water out of his mouth [1] and help him to prepare some medicine for the sick woman. This Lopunje did and the woman recovered immediately.

Shortly afterwards Kalombo remonstrated with his mother's brother for causing the illness of his sister, but Lopunje said that he had no control over it: the spirits had brought it on her. Kalombo knew that he could do nothing and abandoned the idea of building his own village. He knew that there was bound to be more illness if he carried on with his plan.

182 Clearly the belief in the mystical powers of the ancestors or of
621 sorcery is a force which prevents sections from breaking away
626 from the village. A break follows only when opposition within the village has reached sufficient pitch to force one of the sections to take the risk of illness, rather than to continue living in the village. Sometimes the dissident group comes back because further deaths at their new village are convince them that their action was wrong.[2]

Effects of the Headman's Personality

632 Whether a village maintains its unity or not, depends very largely on the personality of the headman. This is why the officiating headmen and others at the installation ceremonies are so insistent that cases should be settled quickly. The main duty of a headman is to maintain harmonious relationships within his village and to see to the welfare of its members. All severe
[717] illnesses are immediately reported to him, and so are the results of all divinations. He usually sends his representative to divina-
[769] tions concerning kinsmen not related to him matrilineally. He is immediately notified of all deaths and he organizes the funeral 622 rites. Squabbles are brought to him for arbitration and even 692 where squabbles are settled by kinsmen in the village, usually the headman is formally told of them. Frequently marriage diffi-

[1] An act which occurs twice. See Chap. VI, p. 130.
[2] See the case history in Chap. VI, p. 133.

'sisters' and 'mothers' because alternate generations are merged in kinship terminology and in behaviour. A man's sister's daughter, for example, is called 'mother', and her daughter (his granddaughter) in turn becomes 'sister'. A woman calls her male matrilineal descendants 'children' (mwanangu), or 'grandchildren' (yikulu); her matrilineal male progenitors 'mother's brother' (akwelume), or 'brother' (akombwangu).[1] By extension, therefore, another way of expressing common matrilineal descent is to say that two people are the children of one person, amakhalume, even though that person may be their great-grandmother. A term which is almost synonymous with this is mutiwabo cimo, 'in one womb', used as 'we were conceived in one womb', though once again the reference may be to a common grandmother. But the inclusiveness of these terms varies in different contexts. Any may refer to the matrilineage of maximal span within the village, or to a section of the matrilineage seen as a segmented organization of parts. It is only by reference to the particular occasions that the range of the term may be determined.

The Unity of the Matrilineage

613 A person identifies himself most closely with the members of his matrilineage from whom he expects most help and whom he, in turn, is expected to help. If he is called upon to pay a heavy fine it will be the members of his own matrilineage who will club together to find sufficient money. They, more than others, [755] support him in his quarrels. They come to his aid when he is ill or injured, by consulting the diviner and trying to find the sorcerer who is causing his illness, and by finding medicines which will bring him back to good health. They send him money if he has left the country and needs it to return. The goods he brings home from the labour centres will be shared mostly [754] among his matrilineal relatives. They will find the food to be used at his funeral and also see that his burial is properly carried [756] out. He owes these duties in turn to them. His property will stay almost entirely within the matrilineage after his death.

613 Relationship, unless qualified, is looked upon as being entirely 763 matrilineal. This is well illustrated by the beliefs about the disease ndaba.[1] This disease, as we have seen, affects the sexually inactive when they are brought into contact with those who are sexually active. But the disease will only affect the members of the matrilineage of the errant person. For example, suppose a labour migrant is coming home from Southern Rhodesia and has, among other things, a few pounds of salt in his baggage for a gift to his relatives. Suppose also that while he is returning he has promiscuous intercourse. The salt becomes charged with sexual heat and if he gives it to any of his matrilineal relatives to cook with, they will contract this disease. He must therefore give the salt to members of another matrilineage, even if they live in the same village. 613 753

[1] The more commonly addresses these as ninamai. See p. 140.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

It is when the unity of the matrilineage is threatened, by either death or division, that its mystical value appears most clearly. When a member of the matrilineage dies the whole matrilineage is thrown into mourning and remains continent for three days. On the fourth day they perform a ritual purification and some members resume sexual relations, but the closest matrilineal relatives, such as the mother and uterine siblings, remain continent for the remainder of the mourning period, which is about 36 days. 613 765 834

It is tension within the lineage which is most closely attended by dire results. The most important reflex of this tension is accusations of sorcery. Good relationships among members of a matrilineage are adjusted, mainly because friction opens the way to sorcerers. The Yao believe that sorcerers kill their matrilineal relatives so that they may share the flesh with other sorcerers. The sorcerer is fundamentally a wicked person and may kill any relative but is more likely to kill those whom he hates. Hence it is most important that relationships are kept amicable within a matrilineage for fear that sorcery ensues. 613 626 754

An interesting variation of the dangers of sorcery is the belief that sorcerers take the opportunity of squabbles within a matrilineage to kill one of the members. The rationale behind this is that the diviner's instruments are unable to detect the origin of the sorcery beyond the immediate cause. A diviner will indicate that the cause of death of, say, a child is sorcery, but that the witch is observed behind the quarrelling words of some relative. Consequently, danger to a matrilineage ensues when one of its 613 754 578 626

[1] See Chap. V, p. 112.

The evening of the first day is called Ipwon Ipo mokwanni, or "the day of singing," as singing is kept up far into the night, but the exact significance of the word Ikwanni I have been unable to find out.

The second day is spoken of as Ipwon Ipo mowuno, "the day of washing of hands," (Iwuno, "to wash the hands") when the youth are quickly instructed as to the necessities of washing hands before preparing food, etc.; precept is followed by practice. The night is spent quietly; for this day's proceedings few people probably will have remained.

On the third day, however, they come back again from their villages in crowds to witness the performance of wuno, Ipwon Ipo wuno, "the day of house moving" (Iwuno, "to change one's abode, carrying goods and chattels with one"). A representation is given of an onslaught on a village by enemies and all pretend to run away carrying their worldly goods with them. The part of the attackers is played by a number of women who, armed with guns and having donned hats and powder horns, rush in on the crowd from the bush and make prisoners of all they can catch. The men are put in miniature slave-sticks; women who are seen trying to run off with a child on the back, one round the neck and one on each hip, are driven as prisoners into a group. When all the noise and fun are over, the prisoners are released. This is often followed by a mock trial. Two women dressed up to impersonate chiefs of rival tribes, argue an old, imaginary quarrel, usually pretending that there has been a raid by one party on an ivory caravan going to the coast, with stealing of the ivory, while the other party in revenge has caught and killed some of the people belonging to the first mentioned. The thing may be kept up for an hour with much talking and great wit, all those taking part being women. Finally each party agrees to give compensation for the damage done; each presents the other with bundles of sugar cane, and friendship is reestablished. That night, everyone again rests quietly.

The fourth day is known as Ipwon Ipo Iwapwapa (Iwapwapa, "to go round about," referring to the dancing which goes on). Dancing takes place during the day and also the ceremony of Lokwi to be referred to later. One of the favorite songs sung this day runs as follows:

> "Ikkwuki'ji ukwuki'pripa ocinde mowu ukwapri'pa, ocuri' ocokwapa upwjimwi"
> "(Tuck this) a present don't give me free wuk for me little girl, dear curi' and we'll have some fun together!"

On the fifth day, return is made to the villages. The girl curi' attended constantly by their elderly dear live together for the period of instruction in huts in a special enclosure in the chief's village or in similar enclosures in a number of villages. The curi' may go out into the village but must go about with bowed head and look no man in the face; they wear bark-cloth called Ikwiko and should they meet anyone, they must pull over their faces the kind of hood with which their garments are provided. They may not share food with outsiders. If they did so, the latter would sicken with a disease called ekwuinde.

3:Stanton D-5 (on. 1912) 1922 FT7 Tao FT7

and under as well. I am inclined to believe that the words primarily refer to a person's maternal and paternal relatives whose children bear the relationship of uncle to the person. A strange point, however, crops up, namely, that the paternal aunts are called atati (ataye) and their husbands atati again.

An elder brother is ahulu, his younger brother mpondwe, a sister ahulu, ahulu wamadi and ahulu mdulungwe, younger and elder sister.

Disease. Apart from old age, the native recognises in all illness and death the hand of an enemy or the result of transgression of some custom: some one has made medicine against him, or he or some one else has broken a custom founded on superstition which is visited on his head. These ideas are so deeply rooted in the native mind that it is with difficulty any appropriate treatment will be received. They rely, rather, on some medicine-man to cure them by medicine more powerful than that made against them. Even an ordinary accident or an attack of pneumonia is accounted for in this way.

The terms given in speaking of sicknesses are, of course, applied rather to symptoms, but in some cases where the symptom cannot be pathognomic of a disease, the word practically stands for the disease. The word used may imply the supposed cause or refer to a resemblance to some object, or again simply state the part affected; thus ahiwale (the belly) running stomach ache, mwa (eyes), conjunctivitis, etc.

The following words most of which are found in the Reverend Dr. Hetherwick's Yao Language, give some idea of the Yao native's conception of disease. The cause which the above authority gives is not always quite the same as I would venture to give. I shall not enter into the question of the diseases as such but only in so far as they bear on customs, etc.

The word ahiwale signifies any disease or illness; ahiyao and ahiyakuyinda refer to epidemic diseases, the former refers to a disease of lowls and dogs characterised by vomiting and hence is commonly used for bronchitis in man. Chiyinkuyinda refers to a series of deaths from a cause unknown to the natives. The word ahuta, which Hetherwick gives as meaning a plague, rather means arrow poison, I think.

Chendale: a liver disease of fowls.

Chiyao: a congenital deformity of any kind (Iayapwa = to be born with).

Chimwiwa: a patch of white hair on the scalp of congenital origin.

Chiziwani (a wanda): the word used for a little-mark or freckle; ladwi freckle is also included. Children sometimes mark either to see how many "ziwani" each has; anyone with none is made fun of.

Chinkondwanali (kondwanda = a big lump): a bronchocele.

Chinulula (Iu-nulula = to split): a "splitting" headache, or more commonly, medicine by means of which the pretender can inflict pain or death.

Chinyl'ahwyl'ahu: a localised pain in the head.

Chiyayayayaya: giddiness.

3: Swanson D-5 (on. 1912) 1932 F77 Too F77

B/F
753
192.

Chibali: deaf and dumb (Chibi); the word is used in slang to mean impotence.
Chimbuto: an old word meaning high force.
Chimukulumbe: "mulungwe wamile chimukulumbe," the woman died in confinement without giving birth (mwpamwi). The cause of dumbness and constipation are unknown.
Kulubilwa: constipation.
Mulumbangali: mile; Mwapupa, swellings in the bowels, hydrocyprid.
Mwenkulili: " plus and swollen."
Chibwa: sore and swollen gums, pyorrhoea; has been translated scurvy.
Chipupuchululu: hardened skin, like a sore on the hand.
Kjambo: without eye-balls, as result of disease.
Kimulapwi, Lumpumbilu: indistinctness of vision (Stefanovich).
Lusoo: watering of the nose; nasal catarrh.
Mumbulu: the secretion at the corners of the eyes in the morning, also the purulent secretion of conjunctivitis (Stefanovich translates " watering of the eyes ").
Nawilu: nasal mucus.
Chimbwalapulu: mucus from the nasal passages (Stefanovich translates merely " nasal mucus ").
Lukumulu: cough.
Chimupunga: after-pains of labor.
Kpuchwi: hiccough.
Ki'mwing'iwu: nystagmus, from a verb meaning "to look from side to side aimlessly."
Jumpu: any skin eruption supposed to be due to eating various substances, chiefly meat.
Ku-kimulu: to have a rash on the body of the nature of urticaria.
Kpukulu: the name of a condition in which the place where a man passes water becomes whitened; hence it refers to syphilis, leucoria, etc.
Chikwakwa (kwakwa = a mat): the white on the ground resembling a mat mark left by a man with Kpukulu.
Kibwi or Kiti: smallpox.
Kikupulu or Kandulu: chicken pox; this term may also include other diseases with similar rash, i.e. modified smallpox and pemphigus.
Chimulu (mlulu = an elephant): elephantiasis.
Malawa: leprosy.
Mapumpumu: yaws (chimulu, given by Stefanovich as "redness alone," is a Chinyanja word for yaws).
Chindulu: (Swahili) syphilis.
Chamwa: (Swahili) gonorrhoea.
Lukuchilulu: whooping-cough.
Chilulu: measles.

3-Disease D-5 (on. 1912) 1922 FTT Tao FTT

164
753
192

Whoma: asthma.
Chichida (ba-whida = to scrape out): diarrhoea, dysentery.
Chipunga (ubunga = vomiting): swelling at angles of jaws, mumps.
Lomdilim: nasal or bronchial catarrh.
Mwoda: insanity; mongomongo, delirium of fever (Fijiharwich translates as periodic madness).
Whida: asthma.
Lokimoto: gutter (lokida: pressure school).
Nakumula: bruisedness of hands and feet.
Chimongomo: a pustule.
Chimulubum: a boil.
Chilunga (ngunga = the spotted guinea-fowl): ring-worm of face.
Lomoto: any mark on the skin, e.g. birthmark, pigmented spot, ringworm, scar.
Bumoto: a wart.
Nikoali: a burn of the skin.
Lipulowa: a bubbled scar (Fijiharwich gives "bull").
Lumpu: a rash after shaving.
Lilubu: a blister.
Chipulowa: a wheal after a blow or an insect bite.
Chiqu: redness of a limb.
Chipupu: whitlow.
Lipulu: an abscess, sores, pus.
Lilubupu: an abscess; (ba-wubu: to swell).
Lumupu: a sore or ulcer.
Mlumupumpu: a chronic ulcer.
Lulubilin (ba-upulu = to come to life again): an ulcer which heals and then breaks out again.
Lituhubiqu: secondary enlarged glands in groin or shoulders from a sore on the foot, etc.
Nikoi: Any freely movable lump under the skin, e.g. sebaceous cyst, pustule, ganglion, etc.
Chikoni (ba-koni = to bite): rheumatism.
Ulpuru: itch, scabies.
Pimula sulumuru: thrush.
Lumupu: diarrhoea in infants with green stools.
Lulumu: passage of blood in urine; Urinary Bilharziasis.
Ryfulu: ulcer or leucorrhoea of women.
Chiqu'mqu'u: rabies in dogs.
Lumbiini: round-worms of man.

HF
753
W2

Mangangulani: round worm of dogs or found in the ground.
Wakangan mahuwe: a barren woman (lit. dry).
Chimpanda: sterility in the male.
Chipangalo or pajo: an impotent man or Wanda jua ipapo: a useless man!
Ayuli: impotent.
Mikiwa (ku-ikwa = to cut off): a "cut man"; a man over ifan he has been castrated.
Mlungu: a month after he has become fat.
Fwimudzu (indicated Chin.): the word is derived from kimdu, to mistrusts. Natives say that when disturbed, the insect of this name which is a beautiful, Hapalopsis durandi, makes water which falling on the skin of the passer-by causes ulceration. I have seen a variety of cases of ulcerative ulceration due to syphilis, etc., assigned to the effects of this insect; I have, however, shown that it does secrete a corrosive fluid from pores at the sides of the body which dropped on to the skin will dissolve the superficial layers of the epidermis and should such ulceration become infected, ulceration may, of course, result.
Ulendo: tremor, similar to the movements of one of the ways.
Mwajuju: tremor of old age, paralysis agitans.

HF
753
W2
753
G6

The preceding short list of words will give some idea of the richness of the language in some directions and also its limitations. There now follows an account of diseases which are based on superstition, generally connected with the idea of uncleanness or the transgression of some rule of life. Whatever the symptoms, if there has been a transgression, the disease is labelled with the name of the disease supposed to follow the act. Similar diseases are to be remarked among the other tribes in the country; some of them relating to the Anyanja I have already mentioned,[1] and the following may be read as an amplification of the remarks previously made.

Chinyere (Kanyere Chin.) from kanya, to delouse: At the birth of a child, if the contents of the bowel (meconium) are passed before the body is born (as often happens in breech presentations), the child is said to be "born with disease." One of the women attending the confinement will always go out and inform the husband of what has happened, saying, "Ayuli 'ikwawa," (it is born well) or "Ayuli wi chikuli," (it is born with disease). This only refers to the passage of meconium and not to any antenatal disease.

When this significant event has happened, the husband may not occupy the house sleeping mat as his wife and have intercourse with her until the child if its own accord crawls from the mother's sleeping mat to that of her husband on the other side of the hut; Kwapinga mwanake ku mapwa (Kwapinga mwana ku mpwa, Chin.) = "to go the child to the mat." Should the husband disregard this custom, he will sicken with Chinyere. The symptoms commonly ascribed to Chinyere are pain in the loins and in the hypogastrium.

[1] "Notes on some tribes of British Central Africa," op. cit.

3:Stanzas D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Tao FT7

This has led to the word being translated as Bright's disease (Hetherwick). No symptoms referable to the pedicels are included under this disease. Mwere (Chin. Kapende): hydrocele; said to be another sequela. A woman called by the movement of her infant after birth is not considered unclean and intercourse will have no ill result to the husband. Sometimes in the event of Ayali ni chilende, recourse is had to the practice of intercourse between the woman and some other man. She is then rendered "clean" and the man who is not her husband will not sicken. Such a man is called Lisoso (see Widowhood).

Lesoso: a disease similar to Chinyere, which inflicts a man having coitus with his wife who has not been cleansed after abortion.

Kwimenda: a practice indulged in if a new-born child falls ill; the word refers to the "hardening" of pots when they are being made and the same idea is applied to the child. If the new-born child gets fever, the illness is ascribed to the unwonted regulations about the vulva of the mother. These are cut off by an old medicine-woman and the blood allowed to drop into a mortar; water and some herbs are added and pounded together, and the mother attired only in a cloth reaching to the loins, washes her breasts with the liquid while the baby is supported on one thigh; the child is then given the breast and the mother, turning her back on the mortar, pushes it over backwards with her buttocks.

Ye ujale (from uali; Chin., dar mahen): If a woman who, after the death of a child, has not been cleansed by medicine, adds salt to her husband's food, he eating it will sicken.

Yemwe (a Chinyanja word): If a man or a woman commits adultery and any member of the family falls ill, the native say the illness is due to the unlawful act; the sinner is said "to have gone in front of the other"; kwayende (ungwendowa, Chin.), "he has gone in front of," from kwyenda and kwgendowa, to go in front of, or kwenyeka (Chin.), to go slyly in front of. Hence the word kwemwe which also is used loosely for dar mahen. If a child who according to custom has gone to stay with the grandmother, returns to the parents' house and the parents continue to have sexual intercourse, the child may sicken; it is said that the house is "hot" for the child and his disease may be called kwemwe. Or if a child which has been weaned is again given the breast after the mother has resumed cohabitation with her husband, it may sicken with kwemwe. And the husband is called kwayende.

A child which is suckled after menstruation is established, is not affected by any untoward symptoms.

In the event of a woman dying in childbirth, if it so happens the husband has committed adultery, he is held responsible for the death and her relatives claim very heavy compensation.

Ku-wemwiten, to be met with (ku-kwemwiten, Chin.): If the act of coitus causes the onset of menstruation and the husband cannot draw back in time to prevent himself being contaminated, he will sicken, and he is said "to have met with (it)" when referring to his illness. In this disease, the penis is said to withdraw into the bladder. Sent from the end

3: Swanson D-8 (on. 1912) 1932 FTT Tao FTT

161
H2
753
G8

of the lot, shanjiide, and the red part of the flower of the banana, dedicine on account of its shape, are used as medicine for this disease.

Kwindangana or Ndoko: If a man dies and his relatives eat of the food-stuffs left by him, such as corn from his grain-store, before they have been cleansed by medicine, they will sicken with ndoko, the symptoms being stomach-ache and vomiting. The word kwindo ndoko is also used for sickness due to partaking of food cooked by an unfaithful wife.

Chipate is a word used by both Yao and Anyanja to denote a disease which a man contracts from adulterous intercourse. Scott[1] derives the word from ku-pata, to stick to; the woman is so influenced by medicine made by her husband that should any man have adulterous intercourse with her, the disease will "stick" to him, while it will not affect the woman herself nor her own husband. Both the disease and the medicine made to cause the disease are known as Chipate. Secondarily, the word has come to be used for any disease which may be gained by sexual intercourse and is sometimes used as a general term for venereal disease.

Chipate cha chipale (chipale, a knife): A man who is going away from home obtains medicine and dedicates his knife with it. As he leaves his house to go on his journey, he pretends just to remember his knife and calls for it. His wife brings it to him and it is put into its sheath; he then goes out and sticks it in the grass of the roof of the house. The medicine is made from the tail of a dog, an animal in which coitus is prolonged and the two animals cannot separate. Should the wife commit adultery, it is supposed that just as the knife was undomiciled and dedicated with dog medicine, so the adulterous pair will remain fixed in coitus and be found out. This may be called chipate cha kutego (kutega = to set a trap).

The Anyanja make medicine with the same idea, chipate cha kudawa (ku-dawa, to set a trap, Chin.); medicine is put round the house and any man crossing the medicine and committing adultery with the wife will be trapped. In all cases, the man will become ill.

Chipate cha mimi, mimi, blood (mwazi, Chin.): disease caused by intercourse with a menstruating woman. Blood is passed in the urine.

Chipate cha mwa, mwa, pus (mafuqa, Chin.): practically venereal gonorrhoea.

Chipate cha kusuji, kusuji, cotton (usuja, Chin.): the discharge from the urethra resembles a thread of cotton; it is supposed that this thread can be pulled out endlessly.

Chipate cha ndanka, ndanka, the white-ants (chiwa, Chin.): so called when a man passes whitish pulsive debris in the urine. It is supposed that when he has finished passing water, white ants rush up the penis and enter the bladder, thus causing the pain which characterises this affection. The origin of the idea lies in the fact that if one sprinkles water or urine on the ground near white-ant burrows, the ants will come to the surface of the ground in numbers and make a rustling sound.

[1] D. C. Scott, A syllabic dictionary of the Mang'anja language, p. 48.

Other hypothetical diseases which are feared by theholdiness to women are mentioned under various other headings. Kwaiye: a disease generally characterized by elevation of the legs but in some cases by pains in the back, or loosely used for a variety of symptoms. It is said to be caused by the entry into the body of a worm which lives in water-pools. This worm which I have had identified is a gordian worm and not known to be parasitic in man. Lemei: When a man kills another in battle, he will slit open the belly of his victim; otherwise he believes he will shiver with fear and his own belly will swell up like that of the corpse when putrefaction sets in. He is supposed also to hunger after warm killing and blood. Lihenge is the name of a supposed disease which kills off one child after another in a family when they are about six months old. Congenital syphilis naturally suggests itself but I have never been able to verify this idea. Lihenge lya hoinin: a supposed disease which causes the death of the first child when the second is born, the second when the third is born and so on, whatever the intervals between the births. Each child is said to push (ko-tsin) the previous one out of this world. Under these circumstances the disease is ascribed to something wrong with the mother or father and they are examined by a medicine-woman or medicine-man, and any carunculus or an external pile found will be cut away.

If a snake bifurcate two bites, the man will prove fatal. If a crocodile swim a grunting sound when seizing his victim, though he escape he will certainly die.

Treatment of diseases. Of surgical treatment there is very little to be noted. Nothing in the way of operation is performed with the exception of circumcision (see Legends).

An abscess is allowed to burst, the excellent tumor is left untouched, but supernumary digits which are not rare, attended only by a few patients, are snipped off.

The natives cannot extract teeth. They are incapable of rendering any assistance in cases of difficult labor. Dislocations are not recognized as such, but fractures are treated by the application of wooden sticks placed at intervals round the circumference of the limb parallel to it and held in position by twisted pieces of bark string (Pl. XXII, fig. 3). The principle of the tourniquet appears to be unknown.

The only instruments used consist of a small knife for incision, a cupping-horn, and a primitive form of funnel for administering enemata (Pl. XXII, figs. 1, 2, 4). The knife has a triangular blade with a stem which is commonly twisted at one of the corners. The knife is used for wet-cupping, tattooing, and circumcision (Pl. XXII, fig. 1). The cupping-horn is a small horn of a calf. The open is placed and after application to the part, suction is made with the mouth and then the hole sealed by working a piece of beeswax over it with the tongue. The small incisions are made in the skin for the withdrawal of the blood. The cupping-horn is called shoot (tokomkin, Chin.). Cupping is used for headache and for pain in the chest and back. The enema funnel, shipdipe (ishidiri, Chin.) is made from the neck of a gourd to which is attached a hollow stem for introduction into the anus. Half a pint of an infusion of tamarin is injected for constipation associated with pain.

Peas, mmmm (Pisum sativum), are grown in abundance. There are two other varieties, mmm (pomodoro), and ahahmmm.

Sweet potatoes: mhmm (Ipomoea batatas), of which the natives are very fond; they distinguish a red and a white variety, mhmm mpnjipu and mhmm mpmmmm.

The tube-like root of a bush called mpmhu is also eaten, likewise the young underground shoots of a palm tree. The leaves of the sweet potato and the leaves of many wild growing plants are collected by the women and cooked like spinach; the flowers of pumpkins are used in a similar way. Of fruits eaten, the bananas, lipombo, takes first place. A very large number of species of Musaceae are grown, including mahumbulu, mhinga, mahili, mmm'i mmpungu, lubulu a dwarf banana, lisipu a wild banana, and mhunga, the plantain. The pawpaw is found all over the district. There are several varieties of pumpkin, lipungu, including mhondo, chindwahili, and a very large species called mtoo ma mpamba, "the crocodile's head." Varieties of mmmmhmm include lingulu and lubinungulu.

A large number of wild fruits are eaten, among them figs, lubujo (Ficus), kindu (Cissus), chilili and lisungu, the fruits of two species of Landolphia, mutunga or Kaffir oranges (a species of Strychnos), chikondo, the fruits of Hyphaene (palms), mahombwe (Myrianthus) a wild tree belonging to the mulberry family, and mhoon, mhoon, mahungumbwalu, mhondo, chingulungulu, chinkungulu, mahondo, likwendu, etc. The seeds from the heads of lubwalwa (Typha) are roasted up and eaten.

All fish are eaten except the sponge, which always causes urticaria.

The flesh of all the antelopes, of course, sheep and goats is eaten generally; only bushbuck is avoided by some people as it is said to cause a skin eruption. Elephant is shunned by many on account of its rough skin, also rhinoceros because of the shoot which it often has on its body, and hippopotamus on account of the marks on its back which are thought to be akin to leprosy. People eating the flesh of these animals are supposed often to sicken with leprosy, the pachydermatous skin, the elevation or anaesthetic depigmented patches of that disease being reproduced, on the man may be. Few will eat pig or warthog on account of the digging habits of these animals. It is thought they may sometimes grub up bodies from graves. These flesh taboos may be due to Mohammedan influence. The lion, hyaena, and fox are never touch, as they are supposed to be connected with witch; but the heart of the lion might be eaten to acquire courage. Few will touch leopard flesh, but Kamanga's descendants do so. All will eat of the flesh of the serval cat but very few of the common wild cat. The rock rabbit, mpumpumbwa (mbira, Chin.), is refused by most. Tree ca It is a "beast without shame," having no tail to hide what should in decency be hid. Very few will partake of the baboon, but monkey is acceptable to many. A few reject porcupine, supposing they will break out in spots, while the zebra may cause strikes, and none will touch the shrew. No one eats snake, a reason that is believed to die if it crosses a path. All kinds of rats are eaten, but the shrew-rat and mice-rat only by boys. Bushbaby

* See supra, p. 246.

4: Stabnow D-1 (ca. 1909)1910 FT7 Yao FT7
Marav FR4

M 632 this is then added to a brew of new beer and given to her husband to drink. He will then think of and love only herself. This is said to have caused the death of some husbands.

Ilpuri: medicine made and drunk by a woman to make her beloved by a certain man.

M 633 644 647 At confinement a woman has to answer whether she has ever committed adultery; if she denies an adultery she may die, if she owns up and gives the name of the man this can be remedied. Adultery on the part of the father or mother is said to be a cause of abortion.

M 637 A man going away from his village for several months and leaving his wife behind and wishing her to remain faithful puts a knife into its sheath and hangs it in the hut, telling his brother. It is then believed that should anyone commit adultery with his wife separation after the coitus is impossible till some third party comes and pulls the knife from its sheath, and in doing so becomes a witness of the adultery.

M 637 642 645 652 Eating of eggs is believed to cause impotence in children or adults. Much fat meat is said to have the same effect. It is believed that if a hare run up against the leg of a man while going through the forest he will become impotent. It is for this reason that dung of the hare is put at the door of a man to make fun of him as impotent. This is a trick played by Ahuhulu.

M 637 643 739 If a woman who has committed adultery puts salt into the food while cooking, of which her husband will partake, will thereby cause his death. At the present time among the Yao-Makonde community a woman always calls one of the children to do it—this speaks for itself. A woman, after connection with her husband, putting salt in food, may cause illness among any children partaking of the food.

M 637 If a man accuse his wife of adultery and she denies it, he will procure medicine and place it under her pillow, then in the middle of the night she will wake her husband and tell him the name of her lover.

M 767 777 Mpingo = ill omen. A journey would always be stopped if on setting out one of the party die; or should they meet an ant-eater or black snake. It used to be considered a sign of bad luck if one of them knocked the toe against a stone; now if blood flows from the big toe they say it presages good luck.

M 672 674 The Yao at the age of sixteen years climbs the mtondo tree, and finding a fruit which is soft makes a hole in the middle and inserts the penis. After this procedure the penis is said to enlarge as the fruit grows; when the size desired is reached the fruit is cut down.

M 627 The mtiwa says that every one has a small animal inside the ear, the sounds it makes causes the man to hear. If the animal escapes the man becomes deaf. The animal is said to be ½-inch long, and wax is said to be its excrement.

M 684 777 Where a man runs on a journey he often puts a stone in the fork of the nearest tree; on many journeys there are regular halting places, often at cross roads, and here every passer-by adds a stone for luck, making quite big heaps.

4:Stanmus D-5 (ca. 1989) 1910 FT7 Too FT7
Morovi FE4

Gape, the residue after pounding maize, is eaten by the women. No oils are used in cooking, but of fat and meat any native is very fond. Meat may be dried and smoked if in large quantity; flesh, fish and fowl is commonly roasted on spits; small pieces of chicken may be made into a kind of stew with beans and eaten as the relish. When on a journey the fire is commonly made against a tree. The cooking vessels are cleaned before use, not after. The dried fish eaten is often partly decomposed, and meat which is very high, even with maggots, is cooked and eaten, maggots and all.

Taboo.—Bushbuck is not eaten by many natives, as they say it feeds near graveyards. Fowls are not eaten by some, as this diet causes them to vomit; a snake-catcher never eats vegetables, and at the same time puts medicine on his hands. Many abstain from the flesh of certain animals as certain skin diseases are said to be caused thereby; all such diseases bear the same endeavoge.

A man who loses a relation by drowning takes an oath that he will never again eat fish, and never drink water from such lake, river, etc. Here the idea is of course simply to avoid eating part of the relation.

A Nyanja and Machinga will not eat the flesh of the hippopotamus, because on the body they say there are the marks of a string round the loins and of a mat on his back, adding that long ago he was a man. Animals of prey would never under any circumstances be eaten. Milk used never to be drunk by an adult, as it was said to cause a man to become as a child. A man would not dare to drink woman's milk as it was said he would surely die of dysentery.

Tobacco, etc.—The smoking of tobacco was a custom introduced from the coast. Chewing was general among Machinga and Yao men and women, while the Angoni and Mananja snuffed. With the tobacco a little lime, made by burning shells, was taken in the mouth. Giddiness and sleepy sensations were experienced after chewing. The Nyasa and Awisa smoke a hubble-bubble, the water vessel being a large sausage-shaped gourd with a reed stem supporting a large bowl of ebonite wood, sometimes very nicely carved (Plate XXVII, Figs. 5 and 7). The Amyanja smoke a pipe with the bowl made of clay and the stem of bamboo (Plate XXVII, Fig. 6); these are made by the women. Tobacco is grown in nearly every village, a large-leaved rather coarse variety; it is sun-dried and rolled up into hollow rings 6 inches in diameter and 3 inches broad. For snuff (Fulin wowsam) the sun-dried tobacco is further dried over a fire on a pan, when cold it is ground on a stone with a smaller stone by the women, and with it is mixed some ashes of the upon fig-tree.

At Blantyre I obtained a water-pipe made of bamboo stem; this was the water reservoir; a stem of reed supports a little clay bowl. The mouth is placed over the upper end of the bamboo. Bhang (cannabis indica) is smoked in a pipe of this kind.

AGRICULTURE.

The people live by cultivating the soil. Both sexes help in hoeing and planting, the collecting of the crops being mostly done by women. The hoe is the ndondo, a woman who is pregnant for the first time;[1] kawabwa, a woman who has one or two children; ajinakwa, a woman who has three or four children, and lastly, ndabwa, a woman who is past child-bearing age.

The information which I have been able to collect on abortifacients and contraceptives suggests that they are not used by married people merely to prevent their having more children, but that they are used by people who wish to avoid pregnancies which would be embarrassing, for example, by a woman whose husband is a labour migrant. To what extent the abortifacients and contraceptives are effectives I cannot say; some, I know for certain, rely on a magical principle, for example, the medicated cord worn by a man during intercourse. On the other hand, the abortifacients taken orally may have some active ingredient.

A barren woman or an impotent man is regarded with some embarrassment and the marriage nsimbwa (ninsimbwa-nsimbwa) of a childless couple will go to considerable trouble and expense consulting diviners and herbers in an attempt to make their wards productive. Childless couples are regarded as not fully adult and are treated in a patronizing way by those who have bornne children. Since a man may marry other wives, barrenness in a woman is a cause of sorrow to her husband, but is not in itself a ground for divorce. Where the man is impotent, however, the woman may divorce him on this ground, though she usually takes a paramour and forces her husband to an action for damages which automatically leads to a divorce because it is the usual practice in these cases for the court to ask the woman if she wants to be divorced from her husband.

In contrast to the satisfaction shown at the birth of a child is the sense of swelo evinced when a child is still-born or the woman miscarries. The Yao do not distinguish between still-births and abortions, both events being known by the word kwanga. This is a verb and refers to the process of abortion; there is no term for the dead foetus itself. I made no attempt to enumerate miscarriages and still-births because they are supposed to be due to breaches of sexual taboos on the part of the husband and wife, and interviewees were naturally reluctant to mention them. Miscarriages and still-births are greatly feared, and the woman is considered to be in a very dangerous condition until she and her husband have carried out a ritual purification. Should a man have intercourse with a woman who has miscarried and not yet been purified he will contract a disease called kwaw which is believed to be invariably fatal. Still-born children or aborted foetuses are buried in a hole dug with sharpened sticks in the bush by the women, whereas children who are born alive and die afterwards are buried in the graveyard in graves dug by men with hoes. The burial spots of still-born babies or aborted foetuses are marked with a stone or broken pottery, since it is believed that to step on them will induce an illness.

The concern of the interested kin-group is shown in the child-birth procedure. Birth normally takes place in a hut in the presence of the older female relatives of the woman and the female representatives of the man. The husband's representatives are necessary because the Yao, like many other Central African peoples, believe that an adulterine child will not be born to the woman unless she confesses (kapaw) the name of the genitor. If she persists in concealing the identity of the genitor, they

[1] ndondo = elephant, hence ivory. The terms Mbile and ndondo here both refer to the ivory bangles ceremonially worn by the woman in the pregnancy initiation ceremony.

9:Hatharwick M-S (ex.1950) 1952 FT7 Tao FT7

779 they said, "we shall be able to take away their shadows and they would die." In their 123 mind the Soul was allied to the shadow or picture, and the removal of it to the photographic plate would cause the disease or death of the shadow body.

As an instance of their faith in the close relationship of the Soul and the 123 picture or shadow, I may relate the following incident. An influential Yao chief
753 on Mount Zomba with whom I was on terms of intimate friendship for years,
779 refused to allow himself to be photographed, fearing the consequence on his life. At last I was able to persuade him to give me a sitting, but on the sole condition that the picture was to be shown to none of his subjects but to be sent out of the country as soon as possible. He feared lest some ill-wisher might see it as a means towards his bewitchment. Some months afterwards the chief became seriously ill, and in the minds of his attendants his illness was attributed to some accident having befallen the photographic plate on which they believed the picture of their chief to be imprinted. If that negative had been broken in England, whither it had been sent, their chief's illness would be accounted for. Accordingly they appealed to the divining oracle, who, however, after consulting the "bones," assured them that the picture was intact, and that its consequence the disease must be ascribed to some other cause.

779 The Soul or soul is recognized as the chief agency in disease. To dream is,
787 in the Yao tongue, kwapenda mzimu, where mzimu is the plural form of Soul. The Soul is supposed to go out and visit the scene and persons in dreams about, and in turn is visited by the souls of others, dead or living. Pains in the body on rising from sleep in the morning are usually attributed to such nocturnal visits, [753] while disease or pains of a severe type are ascribed to contagious by the whips of the souls or more frequently of the witches who prowl around during the night watches.

779 Madness, idiocy and the ravings of delirium or disease are accounted for by a 828 similar agency. The sufferers are as mazuki, they of the spirits, and a sudden fit of epilepsy or insanity is described as gulumwali mzimu, the spirits have seized him. Such persons are literally regarded with awe, as living in close contact with the unseen, but no incantations or enchantments are ever used to expel the spirit in possession. Some native doctors are credited with a knowledge of certain [755] medicines which they say are effectual in such cases, but their application in no way differs from those employed in treating ordinary types of disease. Idiots and the insane are allowed to wander at will about the village, and only when violent symptoms show themselves as a danger to the community is any physical restraint put upon them.

759 The mazuki are also recognized as the inspiring agencies in the ravings of the witch detective. This person, usually a woman, is called in to discover who is the guilty agent in cases of mysterious deaths or outbreak of an epidemic at a village. She arrives on the scene and takes up her abode for a few days previous to her actual demonstration. She mixes with the people, hears all the scandal and gossip of the community, and at night prowls about the houses searching for are composed of the descendants of slave-wives of village headmen in days past. Like the village headmen the chief was considered to be in danger from sorcery with death. He could not attend the funeral of commoners, he could not eat the chicken which was brought to him at the announcement of the death of a commoner (for a village headman) or subject (of a chief). Should he do so he would suffer from a disease called sabbe. Also village headmen, like the chief were supposed to be well versed in medicine and were regarded with some awe on this account. The chief and the village headmen were distinguished from the commoners in these ways.

But, the chief himself was a village headman. He had to administer the affairs of his family group and shares as had other village headmen. He was involved in the struggle for power going on around him because he was not lifted above these secular struggles as was, for example, the Zulu King.[8] Duff MacDonald records for example: "In a dispute between the inhabitants of different villages, the respective headmen represent their own subjects, and the chief is appealed to. All his decisions are final. Still the chief may otherwise have less influence than a powerful headman, and we have known cases where he simply contented himself with grumbling when his headmen acted contrary to his desire; and in many criminal trials he is eclipsed by the sorcerers and pounders of poison."[9] Again MacDonald records how the chief tried to entice subjects away from a village headman at a trial by pointing out that the village headman had a poor character and was unsuitable to look after people.[9] While there seems to have been some evidence that a number of village headmen under a chief acted jointly in the face of a common danger, but apparently with no powerful military organization. Village headmen seem to have been almost entirely autonomous in their actions, slave-raiding on their own, even raiding villages who paid tribute to the same chief as they did.

1: Tew . E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

Kangambe, used to persuade Nyanja to help in the unofficial rite. When Kapeni in turn fled to Mount Sache from the Ngoni, and died there, the Yao addressed their allegiance to him, not to Kangambe.[1] The word Mulungu has sometimes been interpreted to mean Supreme Being, God, Creator, but among the Yao it seems not to have any personal connotation. It was used to describe the agent in any mysterious event,[2] or the place where the ancestor spirits (mizimu) were supposed to dwell. Daily life was full of acts of respect towards the ancestors, who were regarded as jealous of the living, and requiring constant propitiation.[3]

Sorcery

Accusations of witchcraft and measures for dealing with it play a dominant role in Yao social life. With certain exceptions nearly all diseases and deaths are thought to be caused by sorcery. The exceptional causes are: the hand of God, old age, the transgression of certain taboos, and battle wounds. If sorcery is suspected the relatives of the sick or dead man consult the diviner to identify the offender.

Yao (in common with the Mawri and many peoples of Central Africa) believe that sorcerers have a craving for human flesh, which they satisfy by killing with magic the victims of their malice and hatred. They acquire their magical powers by an apprenticeship, which might include incestuous relations with mother, sister, or mother-in-law, or sleeping on the grave of the mother for one night. The sorcerer then learns the incantations and finally demonstrates his power by killing a young relative by magic; he waits till the victim is buried, and then magically exhumes him for the secret feast with his fellow sorcerers. Each sorcerer who shares the flesh owes a debt to the one who secured the victim.

Charms are used as preventive measures against sorcery. When a diviner has diagnosed the cause of death as sorcery, retaliatory measures are taken. The headman of the village could either call in the witchfinder to identify the offender or he could call in the diviner to take action against all the sorcerers in the village. After the diviner, Mabiliile, had revealed the guilty ones, they were challenged to take the poison ordeal to prove their innocence. If they died, the proof and the punishment were simultaneously accomplished. If they survived, the diviner was held to have been at fault and they were acquitted. The witch doctor was supposed to entice sorcerers to the graveside, and slay them with magic more powerful than their own.

The diviner's findings are to-day checked by the poison ordeal administered to a chicken. A sorcerer detected in this way might be asked to provide medicine for the man whose sickness he had caused, or after a death he might be compelled to pay compensation. If the accused is a village headman, he will not be summoned before a chief, but his brother will take the villagers away from the sphere of his influence, or he may be chased away from the district. Accusations of sorcery follow certain regular lines. Nearly all accusations fall on relatives. Diviners are consulted by matrilineal relatives of the sick or dead person, and the man most usually accused is the brother of the accuser, or the husband of his sister. Witchcraft is therefore a manner of expressing the hostilities latent in these relations, which are, in the Yao social system, full of tension.

[1] Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, p. 70.
[2] Hetherwick, 3, 1900.
[3] Hackel, 1935, pp. 14–15; Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, pp. 58–75, 204–13.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

vomited human flesh.[1] They said that they had a strong headman and that they could trust him; he was a good headman without witchcraft. If he had been a sorcerer they would have kept scolding him until the next morning.

About two hours after sunrise the people gathered and started dancing. At about this time Cimombo was brought out of the hut and put in the grass shed which had been built for the occasion. This was the climax of the ceremony.[2] He sat on a chair in the grass shed with one of his two wives on either side. Makoka then started a chant, exhorting the visitors to come to throw pennies at Cimombo's feet. Some of the people there made speeches about the type of behaviour they would expect from him. Then Nyambi arrived from the court village in a rickshaw. When the noise had subsided he told the people that if they disobeyed Cimombo it meant that they disobeyed the chief. He emphasized the importance of the rank of the new headman. After the speech he presented 12*s.* to Cimombo which was received on his behalf by Ncimbo. Nyambi then left and the ceremony was over, but the people remained to dance and drink beer.

This description of the procedure following the 'coming out of the hut' is somewhat sketchy. The interaction of the headman and his villagers on this formal and ceremonial occasion is of great interest and importance. During the entire ceremony the headman adopts the pose which is appropriate for any Yao initiand. His hands are on his lap or on the arms of the chair and his head is bowed forward with eyes downcast. He neither speaks nor moves. His attendants, when necessary, wipe the sweat off his face or chase away the flies. The other occupants of the mat, who may be his wives, and sometimes his heir, adopt similar postures. In contrast to this, is the behaviour of the villagers who run about shouting wildly, the men discharging muzzle-loading guns, and women ululating in the typical Central African way.

Before the new headman comes out of the hut his mentors

[1] This is a test based on the witchlore of the Yao, who believe that sorcerers kill relatives with magic and then share out the flesh of their victims with fellow-sorcerers in ghoulish feasts.

[2] Called the 'coming out from the hut' (kukupoka nyumba). It is of course the first public appearance of the headman in his newly assumed status.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

strike out with his adherents to found a new village. A sum of £6 or £7 is a considerable amount in everyday Yao life where the annual cash income of the average individual is not much more. The leader of a dissident group is prepared to forgo this wealth to get one foot on to the lowest rung of the political ladder—that is by becoming a village headman. 621 166 627

Obviously there is a great deal of sentiment attached to the idea of a united village. To the Yao way of thinking a village is broken by fighting or death, and these evils are linked by witchcraft beliefs. The association of death and the break-up of the village is brought out clearly by the funeral ablutions of villagers after the burial of one of their number. An important ingredient in the medicine with which the mourners wash themselves after the funeral, is cikula. It is the earth from a particular type of termitary which is usually about 12 to 18 inches high, upright and almost cylindrical. The crust is very brittle and it is comparatively easy to chip off a piece. When this is done a mass of internal chambers and passages is revealed. The soldier ants, unlike those of other species that retreat into the darkness of their passages as soon as they are exposed, come into the open daylight and swarm in confusion over the fractured termitary. When I questioned my informant about cikula, he kicked the crust off the top of one of the hills and said, 'See all the houses in the village of the ants? I have broken their village. So it is with death. It breaks the village.' 621 784 783 835

The Yao believe that death 'breaks the village' and that conflicts through sorcery lead to death. Therefore, conflicts are the real cause of village splits. Hence differences must be settled immediately if the village is to persist, because if they last too long one of the aggrieved parties is sure to start using sorcery against its opponents. Those who do move away, go to a distant place because they believe that sorcery operates only where there is social interaction. But the fear of sorcery on the other hand is just as strong a force in maintaining the physical unity of the village. It is while the migration is being planned that sorcery is most likely to be used. This is particularly so if the village break is taking the form of a lineage split. This happened, for example, in Lupunje village. 621 754 626 621

Kalambo, the sister's son of Lupunje, wanted to leave the village and had gone to seek a suitable site. When he returned he found that 626 753

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

dimesu ndaka.[1] This disease, as we have seen, affects the sexually inactive when they are brought into contact with those who are sexually active. But the disease will only affect the members of the matrilineage of the errant person. For example, suppose a labour migrant is coming home from Southern Rhodesia and has, among other things, a few pounds of salt in his baggage for a gift to his relatives. Suppose also that while he is returning he has promiscuous intercourse. The salt becomes charged with sexual heat and if he gives it to any of his matrilineal relatives to cook with, they will contract this disease. He must therefore give the salt to members of another matrilineage, even if they live in the same village. 613 753

It is when the unity of the matrilineage is threatened, by either death or division, that its mystical value appears most clearly. When a member of the matrilineage dies the whole matrilineage is thrown into mourning and remains continent for three days. On the fourth day they perform a ritual purification and some members resume sexual relations, but the closest matrilineal relatives, such as the mother and uterine siblings, remain continent for the remainder of the mourning period, which is about 36 days. 613 765 834

It is tension within the lineage which is most closely attended by dire results. The most important reflex of this tension is accusations of sorcery. Good relationships among members of a matrilineage are adjured, mainly because friction opens the way to sorcerers. The Yao believe that sorcerers kill their matrilineal relatives so that they may share the flesh with other sorcerers. The sorcerer is fundamentally a wicked person and may kill any relative but is more likely to kill those whom he hates. Hence it is most important that relationships are kept amicable within a matrilineage for fear that sorcery ensues. 613 626 754

An interesting variation of the dangers of sorcery is the belief that sorcerers take the opportunity of squabbles within a matrilineage to kill one of the members. The rationale behind this is that the diviner's instruments are unable to detect the origin of the sorcery beyond the immediate cause. A diviner will indicate that the cause of death of, say, a child is sorcery, but that the witch is obscured behind the quarrelling words of some relative. Consequently, danger to a matrilineage ensues when one of its 613 754 578 626

[1] See Chap. V, p. 112.

613 members goes to an outsider and grumbles to him about the
659 family squabbles[1] and quarrels. The outsider then takes the 578 opportunity of using this squabble to introduce his sorcery into 626 the lineage. The Yao greatly fear backbiting because of their dread of sorcery and never decide it more than a village headman, a warden of a security-group,[2] or a person in the position of having to keep a matrilineage or section together. These people are continually adjuring the women under them—for it is the women who are believed to be the main culprits—not to fight among themselves; and if they do, not to take their complaints to an outsider but to the senior member of the matrilineage. The significance of this in relation to lineage unity is plain enough.

613 Apart from sorcery, strained relationships between members of 578 a matrilineage are believed to be dangerous for other reasons.
843 Malice may adversely affect people who are in mystically danger-
229 ous states. The most common of these states is pregnancy. If a woman has a quarrel with a matrilineage member while she is pregnant she is likely to have a difficult labour. The Yao say 'the womb has heard these bad words'. Another situation where malice or quarrelling will cause difficulties is in hunting. The luck of the chase is capricious and malice may easily bring bad fortune to an otherwise good hunter. For example, a successful hunter once gave each of his two sisters a piece of venison. Each complained that the other had been given the larger piece and quarrelled vehemently about it for weeks. The hunter now found that no game fell into his traps. He went to a diviner who indicated the quarrel of the sisters as the cause of his failure and told the hunter to get them to 'blow water' (huperyo). He did this; good relationships were restored and his traps were filled once more.

613 These deleterious effects, like the curse, are connected in some 578 way with the ancestor spirits. This is sometimes expressed quite 769 clearly when a person is called upon to 'blow water'. A mother who wishes to revoke a curse, a woman who wishes to recant her malice towards her matrilineal relative who is suffering
755 in childbirth, or a man whose sister's son is ill supposedly because

[1] This is called mieet, which I have translated as 'backbiting'. This idea is extremely important, as we shall see later.

[2] i.e. those men who are responsible for their sisters and their descendants. See p. 145 ff.

2: Mitchell E-1 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

[90] brother, is called anyaw mbumba, or 'the warden of the security-group'. As one would expect among a matrilineal people, the link between a man and his mother and sisters is strong. But it is the link with his sister that is strongest. She relies on him for protection, particularly when she becomes ill, but also in her [92] relationships with her husband. Her brother will be her junior marriage sponsor, and he will give the consent which will allow a man to marry her. Also a woman's brother will have to consult the diviner and find the medicines when she or her children [79] sicken. In times of distress, as, for example, if her crops have failed, she will appeal to her brother for help. Similarly the man is dependent on his sister in a number of subtle ways. He can always rely on her for hospitality, and is able to get a meal from her if he needs it. But his dependence on his sisters for prestige is much more important. The significance of this will emerge when we see the mbumba organization in the light of the segmentation and fusion of the lineage. A man can only found a new village if he has the full support of his sisters. A sister also plays a most important rôle at the birth of his children. She represents him both at the first foetal-quickening ceremony and at the birth of his child, when she listens to the birth-pang confessions of his wife.[1]

At the same time the relations of sister and brother are restricted by custom. A man must never appear too familiar with his sister, especially in sexual matters. He may not, for example, [91] sleep in the same hut as she does; if she is away and he sleeps in her empty hut he must not make his bed in the place where she usually sleeps. He may not even sit on her sleeping mat. [93] Authentic cases of incest with a sister are extremely rare, whereas I recorded three or four cases of father-daughter incest while I was in the field. Supposed cases of brother-sister incest are recounted and discussed widely. This is understandable because [95] a man who is suspiciously familiar with his sister is suspected of being a sorcerer, since it is widely believed that a sorcerer usually obtains the power that he needs for the performance of his dire deeds by sleeping with his sister. The riddle of the initiands—'What is the sweetest fruit which may not be tasted?' Answer, 'Your sister'—neatly reflects the attitude of the Yao.

The close link of brother and sister is also reflected in the

[1] The significance of this is explained in Chap. VII, p. 185.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

a definite pattern. Very frequently indeed an accusation of sorcery is involved.[1] This usually stimulates a dissatisfied warden to gather his dependants together and to move off to found a new village. Elsewhere I have set out in detail the typical events which precede a village break-up when the lineage splits after a man quarrels with his mother's younger sister's son.[2] These splits are not always successful because the seniority of the older relative, especially if he is a headman of some standing, may serve to reunite the village, and the leader of the dissident group may be unable to maintain its independence. This is what happened in Mwambajila village.

Mwambajila is one of the more important village headmen in Jalasi's area. The tension between him and his mother's younger sister's son Mbwana Somu reached a climax after a series of deaths among Mbwana Somu's children. He consulted a diviner and found that Mwambajila was the sorcerer causing these deaths. Mbwana Somu was very angry at this and told his sisters that they ought to leave the village and go to live in Liwende's area, i.e. about 15 miles away. Eventually he persuaded them to move and they went to live on the Masanje river banks. But the deaths continued. The women now started to be worried because they had left Mwambajila's village

---

[1] The implications of this cannot be understood without some knowledge of Yao divining procedure. The type of divining is usually by gourd and objects (ukuwe). The diviner first of all establishes the reason for the visit, i.e. death, illness, theft, or whatever it is. He then empties his gourd and throws into his hand a variety of symbolic objects. He builds a story round these objects, and finally pronounces that he sees some person whom he vaguely defines. The consultor is then asked to mention who this could be. Though sorcery is supposed to be practised mainly in order to get human flesh for ghoulish feasts, it is not believed to act haphazard. In other words, a sorcerer is supposed to select his victims for revenge as well as for meat. The selective processes at work, therefore, when the consultor seeks to reconcile the diviner's findings with his own suspicions, are that he should select someone who is obviously evil, i.e. from his point of view, one with whom he has been quarrelling, and he should appraise the possible motivation for sorcery. After he has made the selection the name is tested by the diviner and the consultor may later submit a chicken to the poison ordeal to test the diviner's findings.

This, of course, confirms Evans-Pritchard's analysis of Azande witchcraft and I here acknowledge my debt to him for stimulus both from his book and from the discussions we have had on the topic. I assume his analysis in my discussion. See Evans-Pritchard, E. E., Witchcraft, Oracles and Magic among the Azande, Clarendon Press (Oxford, 1937).

[2] In Seven Tribes. Case History II, 321.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

578 and that he could not understand who could be inducing them to 593 talk like this. He told them also that as far as he was concerned they 624 could report the case to whomsoever they wished. The women came out of the hut and went straight to Pawesi who was the headman's younger brother. He told them to go back and to wait a while before they took further action.

578 After four days had passed the headman's sister who had fought 593 with the headman's wife, became ill. In the morning the sisters sent a message to Mponda but he did not come. They sent another 759 message to Pawesi who came and asked if they had told Mponda.
787 They said that they had, but he had refused to come. Pawesi called James and Ajuna, the sister's sons of the headman, and told them that he would tell the headman that they were going to find out the cause of the illness. This they did. The diviner indicated that the headman had caused the illness by sorcery, because of the fight between his wife and sisters. Pawesi tested the divination by giving a chicken some poison. It died, indicating that the divination was accurate. He took the chicken's head to Ngunga who was Mponda's perpetual mother's brother.

When Ngunga heard this he refused to believe it. However, he agreed to send for Mponda and to ask him about it. When he did so Mponda denied the accusation. Ngunga now produced the chicken's head and accused Mponda of being a liar. At that moment a child came to tell them that the woman was dead and the interview ended. They went to the funeral and the next morning they decided to have a post-mortem meeting (mapeto) in order to decide the cause of the death. Mitomoni, one of Nyambi's perpetual sons, represented the chief. Ngunga opened the discussion by telling the meeting that the woman had been killed by the headman because of the fight between his sisters and wife. Mitomoni asked how they knew this and Ngunga told of the divination and the poison ordeal. He then asked Mponda if he had heard what had been said and what he had to say. Mponda replied that he knew nothing of it. Ngunga said that Mponda was a bad man and that the others would leave him and he would have to live alone. Mitomoni told Pawesi and Ngunga that they must not leave the village. Ngunga replied that it was impossible to stay there while Mponda was so bad. If the women stayed with him he would finish them all. Pawesi collected 30 of the 40 huts that made up the village and took them away to Chikweo's area, a distance of about 15 miles. Those who stayed behind with Mponda were his 'children' and some unrelated people.

593 This case brings to the fore the position of the younger brother
578 as a constant challenge to his elder for the care of his sisters.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FTT Yao FTT

the arbitrators awarded 30s. compensation to be paid by Cikuba to Cikoja, less 5s. owing. This money was to be paid to Ayesi in compensation for the loss of her baby. Ayesi, however, refused to accept the money because she said she wanted to have her baby. The matter now became an inter-segment affair and Cikoja, Amidu, Kanyenga and Kaifa (F36), the son of Ayesi, with Bt. Amina had a meeting on what to do. Ayesi was quite adamant about it. There was nothing to do but to drop the matter, and the state of tension between the segments remained as it was before. 613 578 965 683

The next incident occurred in 1943. Mpakula, the husband of Bt. Amina, had some goats. One day two of them strayed on to the verandah of Bt. Madi's hut. Bt. Madi (F70) was the daughter of Amina (F2) and a member of the senior lineage segment. One of the goats moved its way into a basket of flour that was lying under the verandah and started to eat it. Bt. Madi came out and picked up a log that was lying nearby and threw it at the goat. It broke the goat's leg and the goat had to be destroyed. The owner, Mpakula, who was watching at that moment immediately rebuked the woman. He went and reported the matter to Cikoja and he sent a message to Mpakula's marriage survey who sent back to say that they would meet at Chiwalo's hut the following morning. The arbitrator in the case finally decided that the correct action should have been to take the goat to the owner and to lay a complaint against him. As it was he had to award compensation of 30s. to be paid to the owner of the goat. Mpakula, however, refused to take the money. He argued that although the goat was his, so was the offender.[1] He said that he was afraid of sorcery so he would take a token amount of 3s. only. Cikoja gave him this.[2] 578 613 685

A few months later the eldest child of Bt. Bwana Isa (F16) suddenly fell ill and died.[3] Kanyenga, Kaifa and Mzuza went to the diviner. Kaifa, the son of Ayesi, went as the headman's representative. Kanyenga went as the warden of the sorority-group, i.e. the child's mother's brother. Mzuza was the marriage survey of the child's father. Kanyenga consulted the diviner who indicated that Kanyenga's mother Bt. Amina was responsible but that she was not a sorceress. Sorcery, he said, was introduced by an unknown person who was using Bt. Amina's grumbling as a screen. Kanyenga refused to accept the finding of the diviner, saying that his mother had never been 'caught' 613 578 754

[1] His wife's collateral sister's child he also calls 'my child'.

[2] Mpakula is a stranger in the village and in this situation Cikoja represents both segments to Mpakula, even though the senior segment is guilty.

[3] Sudden illness, called chisuno or 'the hammer', is believed to be without a doubt due to sorcery.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 F77 Yao F77

613
578
759

by a diviner before. He went back and reported the matter to Cikoja who accepted the finding. Kanyenga, however, argued that the real sorcerer was using magic to confuse the diviner. After some argument Cikoja sent for the then senior living member of the matrilineage, Bt. Mkwinda (C6), who was living in Chulo district, for Mbunda, a perpetual brother, and for Cilwanza Kawinga, his perpetual mother's brother. A big meeting was held at which all the important local headmen attended. The case was argued on the point whether Bt. Amina and her husband, who was implicated in the accusation, could be sorcerers. After some argument the court decided that it was impossible for Bt. Amina to be a sorceress without Cikoja also being a sorcerer, so that the accusation now settled on Cikoja himself. The case was taken up to Chiwalo who refused to award compensation. He reviewed the various charges of sorcery that had been made in the village before and observed that after the death of one of the supposed sorcerers the village had lived peacefully. He deplored the new friction and warned that there was to be no migration from the village. He advised Cikoja to modify his sinews if he could. Kanyenga, Cikoja's eldest sister's son, said that he did not think that it would be possible because the headman had virtually accused his sister of sorcery. Cilwanza Kawinga now said that there was no question of whether it could be done or not. It simply had to be done.

About one month after this episode, Ajina (F26), the last-born child of Bt. Amina, who was about 2½ years old, died after two days' illness. When he was obviously very ill Kanyenga left with Mpalalala to call Amidu. They went first to wake Cikoja who in turn sent for Gwili (F4) to be his representative. Kanyenga went off to a diviner at daybreak without waiting for the father's marriage sorcery. The diviner indicated that there was tension in the lineage which was at the back of the child's illness. Eventually, he indicated that Bt. Ntalika (F3) was the cause of the illness and it harked back to the dispute over the sifting basket and the goat. The diviner prepared suitable medicine and the two went back to the sick child. They got back about 8.30 a.m. and found the people congregated at the hut. In the meantime, Cikoja had sent off another divining party, Amidu (F18) and Jauma (F7). Kanyenga prepared the medicine and gave it to the child. It seemed to be getting no better and before Amidu and Jauma returned Cikoja sent Kanyenga and Gwili out to divine again. Then Amidu and Jauma returned and indicated that the same person was responsible, and almost immediately afterward Kanyenga and Gwili came back with the same result. When Kanyenga heard this he went to Chiwalo and reported the matter. Chiwalo sent a messenger to call Cikoja, Bt. Ntalika and her eldest sister's son Cilimba (F1), who was the senior male member of the senior lineage

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

613
578
759

segment. They were to go to Chiwale's hut the next morning. During the night the child Ajim died, and Chiwale remarked that Cikoja was bad at heart and that he merely killed his people like chickens.[1] Four days later after the funeral a meeting was held to decide the cause of death. The arbitrator and chief's representative was the local court messenger. The man's party opened the discussion saying, 'If Cikoja is tired of us he should tell us. To-day he is killing his child. We know that Mpulula[2] has begotten a sheep. The sheep pen is filled and when Cikoja wants to eat he merely eats these.'[3] The arbitrator said that Cikoja had done a shameful thing and that they should make up a divining party to find the cause of death. Kanyenga immediately denounced and said that they had divined three times with the same results. Further divination was a waste of money. He insisted that they called Cibwana Kawinga. The meeting broke up and Cibwana Kawinga was called for. He came a day or two later and the meeting was resumed. He said, 'Cikoja, you are evil.[4] You have found it impossible to keep the village. Now what are you going to do with your children? The man's money says that he is going to take Mpulula away. Your brothers say that they are going to take their mothers away. Now what do you say to this?' Cikoja had no reply to make. Chiwale then said that he would have to pay compensation to his sister. Kanyenga, however, said that they did not want money. They wanted to go away. Cibwana Kawinga here checked Kanyenga and told him that they would take Cikoja and give him a talking to, and instruct him on the traditional way of keeping a village together.[5] Chiwale accepted this settlement of Cibwana Kawinga and endorsed his action.

When they got back, Cilimba told Cikoja and Mbunde that he wanted to move out of the village because his 'mother' had been called a sorceress by his 'brother'. Cikoja was anxious to avoid further trouble and told his lineage members that he was going to build a hut for his second wife some distance from the village because his first wife did not get on with her. He put up a hut about half a mile away across the Nanwoce stream. Cilimba (F1) who was living virilocally, his mother Bt. Ntalika (E1), Bt. Mbwana (F2),

[1] This is a reference to the ghost-motif in Yao witchlore. Cikoja here, of course, is a symbol of the whole lineage, so that this imprecation is directed toward the whole lineage and not to Cikoja personally, as in the last dispute.

[2] The father of the dead child.

[3] Mpulula had begotten eleven children. This is another reference to the ghost-motif.

[4] Uchwo—this word is also used to mean 'polluted'.

[5] Kala ntawe wakwe mwi—'the building of a village of old'.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

Kausi (F3), Bt. Madi (F12), Bt. Aliya (F11) and their children moved across the stream and built with Cikoja. One of Cikoja's wives stayed in the old village and the other moved across. Shortly after this Aimauma (E6), Cikoja's sister, decided that she would like to move across to be with the headman. She reported to Kanyenga who sent her to tell Cikoja. Cikoja in turn sent her to tell Amida. Eventually, Cikoja, Amida, Kanyenga and Salimu (D3) had a meeting about it. Neither Amida nor Kanyenga, nor Salimu, was enthusiastic, but they said she should follow her own wishes. She moved across with her children. Aimauma's arrival on the other side of the stream was greeted with some suspicion by Cilimba because she was a member of the junior lineage. However, Cikoja assured him that he wanted one of Aimauma's daughters to fetch water for him. Cilimba was satisfied with this explanation and accepted the situation as it was.

It was not easy, however, and there were continual quarrels between the children of Bt. Ntalika and those of Aimauma. The members of the junior segment in the old village also looked upon this arrangement with some suspicion. The friendship of Amege (F18), Aimauma's daughter, with Asubiya (E9), her mother's younger sister was particularly deprecated by the members of the junior segment. Asubiya was warned several times that this friendship could only lead to sorcery.[1]

In the meantime, Salimu (D3), who will be the next Cikoja and who was the senior lineage member in the old village site, undertook most of the duties of the headman in that section. He settled most of the minor cases and saw to the divining. However, he reported his doings to Cikoja who was still the village headman.

In 1948, another death took place and the tension became evident again. Bt. Ntalika's child died. Kausi (F3) and Jauma (F7) went to the diviner, who revealed that Amege had gone to Salimu to grumble about what was going on in the other village, and Salimu had taken this opportunity of bewitching the child. Cikoja refused to accept this explanation and said that the diviner was a liar. When the body was being washed, a knife was found under the mat on which it was lying, and the story went around that a piece of flesh was taken out of the dead child's buttock.[2] Cikoja interpreted this as meaning that Bt. Ntalika herself had bewitched the child. He felt it unnecessary to call a funeral meeting. Shortly after this there was some friction between Amisa and her younger sister Asubiya, arising out of jealousy because of the difference in their harvests. Bt. Amisa was convinced that Asubiya in her jealousy had gone to grumble to Bt. Ntalika about this. Rajabu (F20) who had heard about this called Cikoja and they assembled Bt. Amina, Bt. Bwana Iu and Asubiya in Bt. Amina's hut, and spoke to them about the dangers of backbiting. Cikoja remonstrated with the women saying, 'I don't want to hear about this again. When you love people do not love people who are strangers. Do not talk behind people's backs and bring war in the knots of your body-cloths.' 613 578 754

[1] This is based on the fear of backbiting. See p. 138.

[2] Once a person is dead the matrilineal relatives do not touch him. They leave the hut and the undertakers (ŵŵlo) wash the body and prepare it for burial. They reported this finding to Cikoja.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Tao FT7

A few weeks after this, in June 1948, Alewinda (F27), a 3½-year-old daughter of Asubiya, died. When her mother saw that the child was seriously ill she took her to her patrilateral relatives in Liwonde area. She had barely got there when the child died. The headman of the village sent a message back to Cikoja to tell him of the death. He in turn sent a message to Amidu and Rajabu and they went to the village to attend the funeral. After the first mourning feast three days after the funeral, Kaifa, the child's mother's elder sister's son, and Malewaga, representing the village in which the child had died, went to a diviner who indicated that the cause lay in the backbiting of Asubiya about Bt. Amina, but that the sorcerer was Bt. Ntalika. The tension now had reached almost breaking point and after about six months Bt. Ntalika moved out into Liwonde area without announcing that she was going.

At the end of December, Asubiya's son Selemu (F46), aged 4½, suddenly became ill one night. In the morning Amidu and Rajabu and Nkatawila (D20), who was the husband's marriage surety, went to a diviner. He indicated that the cause was a girls' initiation basket which Ayesi kept. This basket, the diviner said, kept losing its strength and it was only on the death of a close relative that it would regain power. They returned and when they got near the village they could hear the women keening. They agreed that the diviner was a liar and returned and got their money back. The body was buried on January 3rd, 1949. Asubiya now left the village without announcing her intention and went to complain to chief Kawinga. Cikoja in the meantime, noticing that Asubiya was not present at the funeral, sent out men to search for her. After two days Kawinga's chief court assessor, Masunda, brought Asubiya back to the village. He told Cikoja that he had cross-examined her and found that she said her elder sister was causing death because of her jealousy over the food. Masunda returned and some days later Kawinga wrote a letter to Cikoja telling him to come to the court village. This he did and was told to hold the mourning feast, but to take the people to the court village to hold the funeral meeting. There a divining party would be arranged and the cause of the death determined. 613 578 754 695

After the first funeral feast the people of Cikoja assembled at

613 578 754 695

Kawinga's court village. Masunda reviewed the events leading up to the calling of the meeting and asked Cikoja to give his statement. Cikoja replied, 'You say I am finishing the people. I do not deny it. If the people are being finished by my sister, then I am finishing them.[1] You may speak what is in your hearts.' Asubiya now made her statement. After this, Bt. Amisa was called out. She denied knowing anything about the case. Masunda at this point was about to send the case back to Cikoja when Matosa, a second arbitrator, asked who the marriage sureties were. Amidu came forth as the woman's surety. Matosa asked him to tell the court about Asubiya's marriage relationships. Amidu then reviewed the history of Asubiya's pregnancies. He pointed out that the first child had died.[2] The second one also died. The diviner had indicated that she had broken a sexual taboo and the child had died from ndaka as a result. The third child was still alive. The fourth had died recently. The fifth was the one about whom there was a case that day. He recounted how they had gone to a diviner and how he had indicated that the cause of the death lay in the backbiting which the person herself had done. Masunda cross-questioned Amidu about the ndaka medicine that was given and assured himself the complainant was satisfied that the second child had died of ndaka and not sorcery. Masunda then called Salimu since the woman was living at the old village site under Salimu's charge. Salimu, who works as a tailor in an Indian store some miles away, said that he did not have a great knowledge of the case. Cikoja said he had nothing to say. Eventually, after some hours of cross-questioning, Masunda decided that a divining party must be made up and the results of the divination reported to the court. Bt. Amisa now stood up and said she was prepared to undergo the poison ordeal to prove that she was not a sorceress. She said that she would go with them to the diviner to find out the cause of the death of the child. Masunda said that they would leave the matter at that. At the village they would have to decide on a divining party and they would have to give poison to a chicken to make sure that the divination was correct. After that Cikoja would have to report the matter to Kawinga and the case would be re-opened. Nyenje was at the inquest and said to Cikoja that if they were not relatives he would have other words to say to him about this business. As it was he did not see what he had to rejoice about. Cikoja said that he did not know, but that Nyenje should ask the owner of the village. Surprised, Nyenje said, 'Who is that?' Cikoja indicated Salimu.

[1] Cikoja is talking as a representative of his lineage here.

[2] The first death in a family is never divined for, because the Yao say that if this is done, it 'would chase the father away'.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

Salimu said that Cikoja ought not to speak like that because it only made things difficult.

Two days after this Cikoja called a meeting at Salimu's hut in order to choose a divining party. Eventually they chose Kanyenga, Asimama, Raisi and Musa. Musa was the witness for Kanyenga who represented the woman's party. Raisi represented the father's party, and Asimama went to be his witness. Cikoja gave them 5*s.* and they went to look for a diviner. Eventually they found one and Kanyenga opened the consultation. The diviner indicated that the cause of the death of the child was litukula.[1] The party paid him and looked for a place to sleep. The following day they sought another diviner. Kanyenga again consulted and was told that Bt. Ntalika and her son were sorcerers but that the mother herself was ill with litukula. Kanyenga rejected the litukula explanation and insisted on the sorcery of Bt. Ntalika and Cilimba. The diviner consulted again and said that the main cause of the death was the litukula and that the sorcery of Bt. Ntalika was added to the other. Asimama here insisted that the sorceress in reality was Bt. Amisa. The diviner rejected this. He said the best way to test the divination was to give poison to a chicken. The party was at a loss to know what to do. In two divinations, a likango was indicated twice, while sorcery was said to cloud the issue. They decided to give a chicken poison. They returned to Rajabu's hut in the village where he had married. Here they sent Rajabu to tell Salimu that they were about to test a chicken at the poison ordeal, but that he must not tell Cikoja. They gave two chickens poison, one for litikula of the mother and one for the sorcery of Bt. Amisa. The litukula chicken died, indicating that Bt. Amisa was innocent. When Cikoja was told this he refused to believe it and sent them to poison another two chickens. The result was the same. He now decided that he would take the divination to a distant place and chose to go to Ngokwe chiefdom. Kanyenga led the divination party again. They consulted the diviner and after much testing and retesting the diviner decided that the sorcerers were Bt. Ntalika and Cilimba and that the litukula had nothing to do with it. He also specifically excluded Bt. Amisa. The diviner now told the father's two representatives to stay behind while the woman's representatives fetched Cikoja. When he came, the diviner revealed the result to him personally. Cikoja was at a loss what to do in this situation. Two divinations including poison tests had indicated that likango was the cause, a third and very exhaustive one had revealed Bt. Ntalika and her son. Neither had indicated Bt. Amisa.

[1] Litukula is a type of pimple (the generic term for which is likango) which, when it comes to a head and bursts, causes the death of the last-born child.

613 578 754 695 Eventually, in March, he decided to take the case up to Kawinga's court. Cikoja was not willing to accuse Bt. Ntalika and Cilimba publicly. Accordingly he went to Kawinga but he did not send for Bt. Ntalika. When Masunda, the court assessor, heard this he refused to handle the case and told Cikoja that Bt. Ntalika had to be brought to court so that they could hear her statement. Cikoja and his people came back to the village and nothing more was done about it. In April, Rajabu wrote a letter to Cikoja telling him that he wanted to report him to Kawinga and to bring a charge for compensation against him because he had falsely accused his mother of sorcery.

I left the field in June and do not know what the result was.

The series of events are extremely complex. I have given only a summary of them. Nevertheless, the main themes in the history are clear enough. We see Cikoja as the representative of the lineage of any order whatsoever. We find in particular the opposition of the two collateral brothers, Kanyenga and Cilimba. They are the representatives of the two lineage segments in this situation. There is seldom any doubt about the affiliation of these two personalities. Consistently in the accounts of the divinations each rejects the diviner's finding if it accuses a member of his lineage segment. Note that the divination seance itself becomes a field in which the opposition of the segments is expressed. Kanyenga continued consulting diviners until finally he got the answer he wanted. His opponents rejected these findings and eventually even discounted the chicken ordeal. The diviners' findings and the results of the poison ordeals, therefore, are bandied about between the opposed groups, and though the whole procedure of divination and accusations of sorcery is directed towards the extirpation of discordant elements in the community, in fact, it is only a facet of the underlying cause of the tension—the opposition of segments in an ever-segmenting lineage.

613 578 In addition to the structural opposition of Kanyenga and Cilimba there is a certain amount of tension among Cikoja's uterine sisters. Bt. Amisa, Asimama, Ayesi and Asubiya have all had children. Bt. Amisa is the senior and the relationships between her and any of the other sisters are difficult. In addition to this there is the tension between the generations seen in the attempts of the sons of Amisa to bring a compensation claim

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

604 627 sister's son. This, however, is not common because matters such as these, the Yao feel, ought to be settled within the matrilineage, or at least among kinsmen. The more usual procedure is for the mother's brother to take his complaint to some senior matrilineal relative who may be a perpetual mother's brother of the mother's brother, as say Cibwana Kawinga is to Cikoja.[1] Or if the matrilineage is part of a village, the mother's brother may take his case to his village headman, who is as likely as not his perpetual father. The senior relatives have the force of authority and public opinion behind them and frequently some agreement can be reached at this level. Where this is not possible, say because the perpetual elder relative lives too far away, the mother's brother may take the sister's son to court and bring the sanction of the Native Authority's punishment upon him. This is very rare.

604 789 There is still a certain mystical sanction behind the mother's brother's control over his junior relatives. This is based on the curse, which in turn draws on the belief in common ancestor spirits. A mother's brother may say to a sister's son or other junior matrilineal relative: 'If you have never sucked from the breast of my sister, nothing dreadful will happen to you.'[2]

604 754 The fear of sorcery is another force which operates to control the wayward activities of a sister's sons. People in senior generations are usually looked upon as having particularly wide knowledge of potent medicines. Though a sister's son may sometimes use sorcery against his mother's brother, the reverse is believed to be more likely to happen. I have recorded elsewhere[3] the details of a case where a sister's son left a village, against his mother's brother's wishes, to find work in town. He subsequently met his death in an accident while trying to get the honey out of a wild bees' hive in a treetop. At home his death was attributed to the sorcery of his mother's brother whose will he had frustrated.

604 578 On the other hand the sister's sons, while bound by an ethical code to honour and respect their mother's brothers, find that in fact these stand in the way of their own personal ambitions. A man's heir is his sister's son and it is quite understandable that there should be some tension between a man and his heir. But

[1] See p. 132. [2] See Chap. VI, p. 133.
[3] 'A Note on the African Conception of Causality', 54-5.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

845 one of Malemya's men died, after giving birth to quintuplets, some thirty years ago. Deformed children are buried alive. A large number of children is always hoped for and where polygamy is practiced, some families are of considerable size, although the mortality [165] among young children is very high. It is, of course, very difficult to state the child-bearing period among natives. It does not start so early as is commonly supposed, and I think the menopause is found within about the same limits as among Europeans.

Death. Natives of Nyasaland live to a good old age. That such is not the case I have 761 found to be one of the many fallacious beliefs concerning natives which should be relegated 165 to the realm of exploded theories, as I have pointed out elsewhere.[1]

Death in old age is recognised as a natural event but apart from this, all sickness and [754] death were formerly and are still to a large extent looked upon as the result of the machinations of some person, an idea which forms the outstanding feature in their belief in witchcraft, usewi.[2]

763 Here I shall mention the ordinary customs in the case of death. During the last hours of a mortal illness, a man is tended by his wife or wives; the head wife sits constantly supporting his head on her lap or against her breast. A woman is similarly tended by her mother, sisters, and friends. As unconsciousness sets in and the extremities become cold, they say, "His spirit has gone and only the heart remains alive."

The native does not like the idea of lingering on and a man on his death-bed will say to his sons, "Now watch me that I die quickly." He may take medicine to help him over that time or he may give his sons instructions as to what to do. Should a man linger unconscious for a long time, friends will ask his sons, "Did he give you any instructions?" If he has done so, the sons will then carry them out. This perhaps consists of bathing themselves in medicines left by their father, while they stand on the roof of his house. Sometimes, the natives say of a lingering case, "Ah, perhaps he has eaten of a tortoise's heart!" [805] knowing the phenomenon of the tortoise's heart and believing that by partaking of it, the same property can be conferred on the heart of a man.

764 When death is manifest, the body is covered with a cloth by a brother, a son, or some other person in attendance. The eyes are closed, the mouth shut, and at the present time, [197] the body straightened out. This, however, is a recent practice copied from the Anyanja, Europeans, and Mohammedans.

764 News of the death must be sent to the chief, and a messenger goes to his village where the chief and his people sit in the village open space. He carries a fowl in his hand. The 203 present of a single fowl always denotes bad tidings. One of the chief's men, seeing the stranger approach with the single fowl, will jump up and take the bird. He is joined by the others and they go away to the cross-roads where they kill the fowl, pluck it, cook it and eat it. In the meantime, the messenger delivers his news to the chief who will produce from his house about eight yards of white calico; if the deceased has been a much respected

[1] Hugh S. Stannus, 'The life-span of negroes', (Lancet, April 11, 1914, p. 1053). [2] Vide infra, p. 386.

643 ivory by his own hunting parties or as a kind of tithe on other hunting expeditions. The ground tusk, i.e. the tusk on the side on which the elephant falls when killed, was the chief's share. In the same way, the hind leg on the ground side of any game animal killed was sent to the chief. He took a share of the spoils of war and most of his people yearly gave him either service in building houses, etc., or kind in the form of food-stuffs, but he enforced no service and levied no tax, except for the making of a new burial place.[1] New settlers in his village were expected to invite him to drink beer made with their first crops.

In return, he always provided cloth to invest the body of the dead. He also made presents at the time of Unyago.[2]

A chief's life, therefore, may not be "all beer and skittles," though he consumes a good deal of the former and a kind of skittles[3] was a favorite pastime of one of the Malemyas. A saying embodying this idea was used when pleading for a man who had [538] committed adultery with his chief's wife "one who carries a tortoise (on a string over his back) is likely to get his clothes soiled"; a man has to put up with the troubles his belongings bring him. So a chief must bear with his own people who do wrong.

643 Ample opportunity for exercising such forbearance was provided, since the chief was formerly the adjudicator of all disputes and dispenser of justice in all crimes. The headman 692 did the same in a smaller way but appeal could always be made to the chief. Cases were heard by the chief sitting in council. He and his headmen and elders would assemble in the village open space and here cases were stated, often at great length.

Each party to the case would employ some man well known for his powers of oratory as leading counsel. The speaker for the plaintiff would start proceedings by a recital of all the evidence he could collect. After him would follow innumerable speakers, whether actual witnesses or not, each telling as good a story as he could, and the defendant's case would then be put by his representatives. There was no cross-examination but at the end, a summary was made and judgment given. A chief often took the advice of some one of his old men whom he trusted.[4] The chief received no payment for his services, except in the case of murder; neither did the "counsel" receive anything for their efforts.

674 Crimes. Causing the death of a person by witch medicine, usuni, was the most heinous [754] crime; a mwai ordeal might be held, but if the offense was proved, burning was the punishment which usually followed.

[684] The offense second in gravity was adultery. This might be expiated by payment or by death, according to the circumstances under which it occurred; mutilation was often [696] performed in the case of a chief's wife. All death sentences with the exception of those

[1] Vide supra, p. 244. [2] Vide supra, pp. 248, 264. [3] Vide infra, p. 360.

[4] The old Malemya (Nahitumbo) has some very fine men among his counselors. Kuntupa and Chiupile, the latter renowned for his oratory, were his chief advisers in legal matters. Ndabka, a slave, was his mentor in all personal and family affairs, while Chekasengo was in charge of all ceremonies and served with his assistant, Mpanje, as high priest on all occasions of intercession. Others acted as his emissaries, such as Mkopiti who always went on any missions to the Angoni, among whom he was known as Ndonjira.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

and uncles as well. I am inclined to believe that the words primarily refer to a person's maternal and paternal relatives whose children bear the relationship of wanke to the person. A strange point, however, crops up, namely, that the paternal aunts are called atati (atati wakungwe) and their husbands atati again. 601

An elder brother is akulu, his younger brother mpunkwe, a sister mlumbu, mlumbu wanandi and mlumbu wakulungwe, younger and elder sister.

Disease. Apart from old age, the native recognises in all illness and death the hand of an enemy or the result of transgression of some custom: some one has made medicine against him, or he or some one else has broken a custom founded on superstition which is visited on his head. These ideas are so deeply rooted in the native mind that it is with difficulty any appropriate treatment will be received. They rely, rather, on some medicine-man to cure them by medicine more powerful than that made against them. Even an ordinary accident or an attack of pneumonia is accounted for in this way. 753 754 164

The names given in speaking of sicknesses are, of course, applied rather to symptoms, but in some cases where the symptom named is pathognomic of a disease, the word practically stands for the disease. The word used may imply the supposed cause or refer to a resemblance to some object, or again simply state the part affected; thus chitumbo (the belly) meaning stomach ache, mcso (eyes), conjunctivitis, etc.

The following words most of which are found in the Reverend Dr. Hetherwick's Yao Language, give some idea of the Yao native's conception of disease. The sense which the above authority gives is not always quite the same as I would venture to give. I shall not enter into the question of the diseases as such but only in so far as they bear on customs, etc.

The word chiluele signifies any disease or illness; chitopa and chipindupindu refer to epidemic diseases; the former refers to a disease of fowls and dogs characterised by wheezing and hence is occasionally used for bronchitis in man. Chipindupindu refers to a series of deaths from a cause unknown to the natives. The word chaola, which Hetherwick gives as meaning a plague, rather means arrow poison, I think. 164 753 192

Chombola: a liver disease of fowls.

Chipage: a congenital deformity of any kind (kupagwa = to be born with).

Chitweeime: a patch of white hair on the scalp of congenital origin.

Chisiwani (a cousin): the word used for a birth-mark or freckle; helical fistula is also included. Children examine each other to see how many "cousins" each has; anyone with none is made fun of.

Chindundumuli (lundumula = a big lump): a hunchback.

Chiwalula (ku-walula = to split): a "splitting" headache, or more commonly, medicine by means of which the possessor can inflict pain or death.

Ching'alang'ala: a localised pain in the head.

Chiyungusyungu: giddiness.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

Strophanthus is specially reserved for poisoning arrows and it is doubtful if it is ever given by mouth; Kombe is the name used in this country, but there are two species of strophanthus in Nyasaland, Strophanthus kombe and Strophanthus courmonti. The seeds and bark are used and, less commonly, the root. They are mixed with the roots of a shrub called Nchazimba, pounded together and boiled, and the liquid used to anoint the arrows. The use of poisoned arrows is a Manyanja custom adopted to some extent by the Yao. 137 278 [107]

A number of poisons are also employed in catching fish, Ngunga and Mtuta being the most common, also Kamsimbile Ngochi (Nkodzi, Chin.), and Chinyenye. [226]

Witchcraft. In my article on the Anyanja,[1] reference is made to witchcraft and mfiti. Beside the Nyanja mfiti or the Yao masuwi, all tribes as far as I know in Nyasaland have firmly fixed among their beliefs, the conception of the supernatural human-flesh eater. It is a little difficult to define the term mfiti or masuwi, as it has come to have the somewhat generalised sense of one who practices witchcraft, but the original meaning is defined by Scott,[2] a person who has acquired the knowledge of occult medicine by which he can kill his fellow men; "what makes the power so dreaded is not that the mfiti exercises this power for reasons of spite but (as is supposed), to eat the body of his victim." It is at once interesting to note that the word mfiti does not belong, according to Scott, to the personal class of nouns but to the yo-as class, which seems to imply that they believe a mfiti to be something outside the idea of a person. Among the Anyanja in Zomba district, however, the word belongs to the first class of nouns (the personal class) as also does masuwi in Chiyao. 754

The natives believe that any man in a village may be a mfiti or it might be more correct to say, is capable of changing into a mfiti. Ufiti is the state of being a mfiti; in Chiyao, usuwi.

As I have pointed out under Diseases, practically all illness and death are thought to be due to the machinations of some person or persons. The inciting motive which may cause a man to compass the death of another may be spite, revenge, etc., or the desires of usuwi. Until recent years, when the Government legislated to put down witchcraft, the charges of usuwi were everyday occurrences. Whether or not the prevalence of the idea of cannibalism has any substance in correspondingly frequent practice has never been and now probably never will be surely proved. Duff Macdonald believes it to be so.[3] It is true that native graves have been and are still rifled and that the graves of some Europeans have been so opened in the past, as I have learned from eyewitnesses. It seems probable that the graves were tampered with by natives with the object of removing the human remains, possibly to be eaten or to obtain portions of the body to use as charms. Mr. L. T. Moggridge,

[1] 'Notes on some tribes of British Central Africa,' op. cit., p. 202.
[2] Op. cit., p. 245.
[3] Africana, op. cit., vol. 2, p. 213-214.

754 Resident Magistrate at Blantyre, told me of a case where the grave of a well-known European hunter was opened and his trigger finger removed, the reason being obvious. The same thing is said to have occurred in regard to the heart of a brave man. In the former case the finger was probably worn as a charm; in the latter, the heart partly eaten and partly made into medicine. I have found human fingers and skulls among the outfits of witch-doctors. Such practices seem akin to those of cannibalistic societies found in other parts of Africa.

754 The natives insist that usuzi are banded together in some sort of society. There are numerous discrepancies in the evidence brought forward about usuzi, but such would necessarily arise and they do not, therefore, disprove the general belief in the actuality of usuzi. Be that as it may, it seems probable that though there may be little or no cannibalism at the present day, the beliefs about usuzi have arisen in consequence of common cannibalistic practices in the past. There are individual cases of cannibalism well known and one has only to call to mind that of Kamtukule of Malemya's village. This man more or less openly killed and ate a number of people. On one occasion after a fight, he was seen looking over the dead bodies of the slain foes and in answer to an enquirer, he denied that he wanted any spoils but said he was just marking the bodies, "that would be his share." Later on, his own son, who tells the story, brought an Angoni man into the village who wished to settle under Malemya. It was evening, so he was introduced into his father's (Kamtukule's) house where Kamtukule gave him food and later a mat on which to sleep, the son meanwhile having gone to a beer drinking. In the morning, he returned to take his Angoni friend to the chief, but his father said he had gone away. Entering the hut, however, the son came upon the Angoni's snuff-box, and said to his father, "No Angoni would go away and leave his snuff-box." But the father said, "Well, he has gone." The lad being suspicious again went into the hut and found the place where the Angoni had been sleeping drenched with blood. Going out again, he noticed blood dripping through the bottom of Kamtukule's grain-store and looking inside, he found the body.

This man Kamtukule was a great friend of the reigning Malemya's headwife, Kung'ando; after the death of Malemya and after his wives had passed to the present Malemya, circumstances arose in the village which cast suspicion on Kamtukule and the woman. One of two brothers was ill and, it appeared afterwards, that the woman had said to Kamtukule, "Won't you finish him off?" It is supposed that Kamtukule thought she meant the brother who was not sick; for it so happened that both died the same night. It was supposed they were killed in order that Kamtukule and the woman, his friend, might eat them. Malemya had the woman turned out of the village. She now lives near Zomba and has once come under my care. The man, who was also turned out, took up his abode near a highway where he is reported to have killed several Angoni porters whom he said he preferred, because "being travellers far away from their homes, no one would bother about them."

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

The father of one of my servants helped to clear out the remains of a body from his grain store on one occasion and shortly afterwards, it is supposed that his own sons who had said they could not allow it to go on any longer, employed some one to kill him, as he was found, one day, with his head smashed in. There are, I believe, a number of similar cases known. 266

A person is supposed to gain the powers of usawi by procuring medicine from some one willing to sell his secrets at a price, and by performing certain rites usually connected with his method of bathing. It is said that "such and such a one takes his bath on the top of an ant hill" or "on the roof of his house by moonlight." The usual initiation into usawi is a long business, the individual being successively initiated into all the various practices of uhewa, the supernatural. Medicines are made from a still-born child, from various plants, from the hyaena, etc., and used for preparing the individual in the new science. He is introduced to the hyaena, the fox, etc. It is also asserted that a man may acquire supernatural powers by having sexual intercourse with a near relative, a sister or mother. I have had pointed out to me an old man who is said to have wished thus to acquire power but the women refused and he has been a laughing-stock ever since. 754 575 [835]

On one occasion, a man related to me the pathetic life story of his attempt to find his favorite sister who, like himself, had been taken away to the coast as a slave. In desperation he has adopted the above procedure to try to gain supernatural powers to help him but without result. It would therefore seem to be a method not particularly associated with usawi.

The mawi is supposed to bring about the death of his victim not by administering poison or other such direct means, but by the more subtle mode of making medicine "against" him. When the victim has succumbed and is in due course buried, the mawi arrives at the grave to secure that for which he has been working. To the mawi is attributed the power of making himself invisible, and of taking the form of an animal; owing to the carrion-eating habits of the hyaena, this animal form is most commonly taken. Other animal forms which are associated with the mawi are the leopard, the fox, and the owl, all night-going animals. The Yao say, "The cry of the fox (jackal) is heard at night because he associates with usawi doings." 754 [825]

Arrived at the grave after sunset, the mawi blows his horn, the horn of a small antelope, to call his brethren; a fire with a blue flame is made by the grave and around it they dance, or the grave may be illuminated by blue flame without a visible fire. The mawi calls upon the deceased to rise from the grave, addressing him by the name he bore before he was initiated, i.e. his child-name. Obeying the summons, the dead man rises to the surface of the ground, though how he comes out is not quite clear — "the hole may be ever so small." The risen dead is then killed again by magic medicine and his body divided to be eaten by the congregation of usawi. It is said that the skull is made into a gourd, the eyes are used as beads, and the ribs formed into a girdle. [266]

754 A masuwi may be met with under different circumstances. An educated native told me of his experience one night when riding a bicycle back to a township where he was employed. Coming along a smooth-hoed path with his lamp alight, he became aware of the presence of something in the bush in front and at the side of him. Suddenly his lamp was smashed and he was left in darkness, while something pushed him over so hard that he fell off his cycle. Picking himself up, he started to wheel his cycle on, when there appeared on the path in front, figures who, rubbing their hands together to produce a phosphorescent glow, held them up in front of the boy's face. He was, however, not molested further, and coming to a group of huts he knew, he went in and made inquiries as to the cause of his experiences and was promptly told that there was a man living in a hut near the spot on the path where they had occurred who was supposed to be masuwi. Such a story is given for what it is worth. The boy was about twenty-two years old, a highly educated native with an intelligent appreciation of the worth of superstition.

Some wasuwi demonstrations can have no object but to strike terror and keep up the prestige of the masuwi class. Mr. Moggridge wrote me, "A boy of mine was certainly attacked and squeezed about the neck by a man whom he described as naked, huge, and slightly luminous, on the road at the back of my house in Blantyre. The boy was strolling up and down in the dusk and had nothing about him to provoke robbery; he was almost choked before he managed to let out a yell which determined his assailant to let him go. He was not a local boy and no theory of personal spite was supportable. I thought and still think that the motive was to show that even the Resident's servant twenty yards from the Resident's house was not safe from usuwi." It seems possible that some natives with intent to rob had pretended to be wasuwi but recognising that their victim was likely to cause trouble, they went no further.

[824] It is said that the phosphorescence is produced by rubbing in the hands two vegetable substances from local trees and that this is the method the wasuwi adopt to announce their presence.

754 Poison Ordeal. As I have said above, when anyone sickens or dies, the illness or death
-695 is likely to be considered the work of some one who is masuwi, and action will be taken by the relatives to find him out. The proceedings in such a case where witchcraft is suspected will now be briefly sketched; though I give an account of a case from beginning to end as if it occurred at the present time, it must be understood that the giving of muwi, the ordeal poison, is now much less common than formerly. A man becomes ill in some village and does not get better, so the caster-of-lots is consulted. The sick man's relatives or friends go to the lot-caster and approach the subject indirectly by asking him his advice about a number of imaginary cases; they may say, "Things have been stolen from our house." The lots are cast and the caster replies, "No, you have not come to see me about that." This may go on for hours before the facts of the case proper are mentioned to him. Finally, they tell him that one of their relatives is ill in the village, the lots are consulted and advice is given as to procuring medicine for him from a medicine-man. If the caster of lots is suspicious that some one has caused the illness, he will at the same time add, "Let so and so pray," mentioning the name of the man whom he suspects. Following the advice given, the medicine-man is consulted. He promises to get medicine for the sick man and goes into the forest to search for it. Having returned, he prepares his decoctions and having first partaken of a little himself, he gives it to his patient with further instructions. The friends of the sick man having returned to the village, indirectly ask the man on whom suspicion has been cast to pray for the sick man saying, "He is covered by some spirit." The man prays, sometimes using mbepesi and beginning chondel chondel "please! please!" and goes on to ask Mhungu to take away the spirit which has covered the sick man, adding that he himself is innocent of any ill doing against the man and that any grudge he may have had against him is now forgotten.

[787]

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

If the sick man recovers, well and good, but should he die, there is more to be done. The morning following the burial, the relatives go to the chief and in answer to his inquiry of what they are going to do, they say they must again consult the caster-of-lots. They will choose some one who lives a long way off and is not cognisant of the death of their relative: those who go to him have not been shaved after the funeral. Much the same business is gone through as on the first occasion but, in the end, the caster-of-lots is told that they suspect some one unknown to have brought about the death of their relative. The names of all the possible persons are given, the lots cast in each case and, eventually, one is picked out as the guilty man; the caster-of-lots saying, "If I am not telling the truth, you can test my words by giving mwai (ordeal poison) to a fowl; if it does not die, come back and break up all my properties."

He may have gained information from his lots that the suspect is a man of power gained by some special rite, e.g. the midnight bath on the ant hill, in which case he will insist that the fowl poison-ordeal must take place on an ant hill or he will give other specific instructions. On the way back, the relatives will buy two fowls; mwai will be prepared by a boy who has not passed through his initiation ceremonies, and two of the party will be chosen as pleaders, one for the deceased, the other for the accused. One fowl is then selected to represent the accused and the poison administered according to the conditions laid down by the lot-thrower, while the two pleaders give injunctions to it, one saying, "You are guilty; you shall die"; the other, "You are innocent and you shall show your innocence by vomiting the poison and recovering." If the fowl dies, a third man cuts off its head, saying, "I am the burier of the dead." Mwai is then administered to the second fowl to ascertain whether any other persons are involved. The head of the first fowl is singed, stuck on a stick and carried back with the party towards their village. A little way outside, they halt in the bush, and send word to the headman that they are returning. He then comes out privately to see them, asking what has happened, and is told all the events in sequence.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

754
695

One of the group is chosen to go in the morning and summon some one to appear on behalf of the accused man. He and the headman join the party in the bush when the whole of the case from the beginning of the deceased's illness, is again related, ending with the fowl test and dramatic statement of the name of the accused, whereupon the fowl's head on its stick is planted in the ground opposite to the man who has appeared for him as he squats listening to the story. The man who has been called to defend the accused, though the latter may have no particular claim on his kindness, is in honor bound to do his best. As the fowl's head is planted opposite him, he will shift quickly to one side, protesting the innocence of the accused. All then adjourn to the village to put the case before the chief. One of the men acts as prosecutor, again going through the whole case, calling witnesses and others to aid him in speaking. The accused is then defended by the man chosen for the purpose, assisted by others whom he asks to help him. They may speak for a week or more. The chief decides the case, and the result will be communicated to the defendant by his pleader.

If he is found guilty of causing the death of the deceased, he must pay the fine inflicted or if he has been accused actually of usuwi, he may have to undergo, or may offer to undergo, the mwai ordeal poison himself or the test may be made with a dog tied to the leg of the accused man. If the ordeal is satisfactory to the defendant, the man claims compensation for wrongful accusation. If he dies with mwai, his relatives have to pay compensation for the crime he is thereby shown to have committed.

[692] If either party is dissatisfied with the chief's decision, recourse may be had to a hearing before another chief, the first being very glad to be rid of the case. The second gives judgment quickly. If the case goes on to a poison-ordeal, a day is fixed and the accused is taken out to some spot two or three miles from the village where a hut is built called ndowe (place of torture). Accompanied by the two pleaders, he remains here for several days. People from the village come out and attempts are made to make him confess any accomplices; beans are fried over a fire and when very hot are put into the accused's hands and his fists closed over them, or they are put in a cloth which is fastened round the perineum, or bamboo sticks are arranged one on either side of the head and tightened by a string.

The third day, natural undyed bark-cloth is obtained and men go out to fetch the mwai poison, two men from each party, the prosecutors and the defendants. One man sent by the prosecutor has actually to take the bark from the tree, while the others look on to see fair play. The bark can only be taken from the east or west side of a tree; it may not be cut with a knife or axe or be pulled off, but must be cut with a stone and allowed to fall; only a piece which falls with the inner surface lying upwards is taken. Any of the party may carry it but they must on no account leave one another. Having returned, they hide the mwai.

On the appointed day, the big drum is sounded and a crier goes round saying that everyone who wants to see so and so drink mwai must go to the appointed place. Every large village had its regular place of torture and mwavi drinking, two or three miles from the village. Those used by Malemya, the old Zomba chief, may still be seen. 754

3:Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

A clear way is made two feet broad and fourteen feet long in the bush and here the accused takes up his position attended on either side by the two pleaders, the defending pleader on the right, the prosecuting on the left. Facing east or west or following the directions originally given by the caster-of-lots, that is, taking up the position in which the accused is supposed to take a midnight bath, or practice some rite under a tree or an ant hill, etc., he is given a decoction of mwavi to drink from a gourd. This decoction is made on the spot, the bark being pounded up on a stone by one of the prosecutors. The accused must have had no food that day. He then starts to walk up and down the short cleared path with the two men, one on either side of him, the one saying, "Now you have drunk mwavi, you shall die as you deserve; you did in So-and-So," the other denying the accusations, saying, "He shall vomit the poison." He is watched by the assembled crowd who note the various symptoms of which vomiting is the first and said to be the most characteristic. After this has gone on for some time, they watch for what is called the mpompo which is said to be "a ball of bile formed in the mouth and expelled by vomiting so that it bursts on reaching the ground but not before", followed often by a second ball, twenty minutes later. Should this be expelled, recovery may be expected, foreshadowed by clearing of the vision. If he recovers, he is indeed a wonderful man and is hailed on all sides. The women trill with their tongues and shout, and he is carried back in triumph; the defending pleader will swagger about and demand anything he wants for his client. 695

A fatal termination is characterised by little and non-forcible vomiting. Purging is common but said to be painless. Vision is affected and as time goes on, the spectators ask what he can see, "Do you see that over there?" indicating a hill. If he makes mistakes, then they say, "Ah, he is going to die!"

The poison may not take full effect for three or four hours. The end is ushered in by a last stage when the legs become weak; he staggers, then unable to stand any longer, falls to the ground dead, execrated by the onlookers who rush in and hurl stones upon the body, crushing it. The relatives take the mangled corpse and lay it on logs covered with grass in the bush. No other covering is permitted. It may be placed in a tree by people acting as nsilo. Burial is forbidden. [766]

In some cases mwavi used to be burned, not being given the chance of the poison trial. This took place at a recognised spot like ndowe. The last man to be burned by Malemya was Mtulula in 1892. Burning was also a punishment in some bad cases of murder. Such was the fate of Chingale. The man was put in a slave-stick, a pile of logs was built round him and then set on fire. [683]

Witch-finder. In addition to ordeal poison, another method of discovering a mwavi is by "smelling out." If a number of people have died in a certain village, the inhabitants may begin to think that there is a mwavi among them, and procure the services of a mbianhla. 754 695 791

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

754 695 791

Mbiashila is a Chinyanja word from ku-bisa, "to hide," referring to his custom of hiding in the village; the practice is originally Mang'anja, since adopted by the Yao. Mbiashila is often a woman and may be young.[1] She comes to stay in the village unknown to the people, lives in a watch house in the gardens and is said to go about at night when she is able to summon wusui persons from their houses. The fee for her services is paid beforehand. Later, the villagers are assembled and going round the company holding out flour in her hand, she calls upon So-and-So as the guilty man saying, "This is his 'night-name.'" The villagers all answer, "There is no one of that name in the village." She then goes round again and throwing the flour over the accused, utters his ordinary name and runs off into the bush, not to appear again. The accused may then offer to take wusui (ordeal poison) to prove his innocence or if it is a case of illness only and not death, he may be treated by a medicine man, the process being called ku-lopolola, "to take evil things out of."

A wusui man is sometimes said to renounce his old practices and may then be received into the company of mbiashila. A famous mbiashila near Zomba affirms that he used to be wusui. The mode of action of mbiashila varies greatly with different men; for some the ceremony is quite a minor matter; in other cases, it is an important affair.

Witch-destroyer. Where death is suspected to have resulted from wusui, steps may be taken immediately to catch and kill the wusui. For this purpose, the help of the wundu juaseketela is sought. Ku-seketela means "to break off the end of a stick"; it appears to be both a Chinyanja and a Chiyao word. The word refers to the practice of the professional witch-killer who is supposed to run a stick through the anus up the bowel of his victim and then break it off, leaving part inside. The juaseketela having been informed of the approaching funeral hides in the bush near the graveyard and watches the interment. After everyone has gone, he is free to put in operation that for which he has been called. The following wudus operandi is related of a celebrated wundu juaseketela called Angoni of Zomba. The water in which the corpse had been first washed was obtained and put in an earthenware dish. He also provided himself with a gourd containing medicines and some stones, and another gourd filled with poison made from crocodile gall to anoint the seketela sticks. He also had a small antelope's horn containing medicine which when smeared on the head rendered him invisible, together with the stalks of a species of millet called mbulus which sheds its grains at a touch, and a whistle made from the horn of a small antelope, the ortbi.

So provided, he proceeded to the grave, around which he drew a ring with medicine contained in still another horn. Within this circle, all was safe. This was followed by a square immediately around the grave with a stone from the gourd placed at each side, north, south, east and west. The plate of water was placed on top of the grave. The wundu juaseketela then anointed himself with the medicine which made him invisible to the wusui and sitting within the circle, he blew his whistle which was irresistible to the mwosi man who was then induced to come out of his house. When he had reached the grave, the water was sprinkled over him by the juaseketela with the millet stalk from the dish on the grave, or he was struck with the gnu's tail; in either case, he fell to the ground senseless. He was then ready to be dealt with. The seketela sticks, small bamboos filled with crocodile poison, were pushed up the anus and broken off to liberate the poison. Sticks might also be inserted behind the ear or in various other spots. The mwosi was then beaten to wake him up; he ran off to his own village and there, a little later, he sickened and died, telling no one the cause. After death, the awilo when preparing the corpse of the hitherto unsuspected mwosi, might find the end of the stick projecting from the anus or see the punctures elsewhere with the medicine adhering to them, and the man was revealed in his true colors. 754 695 791

[1] Cf. Scott, op. cit., p. 288.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

At Mtwiche's village, there was a man called Liunga who professed to be able to extract the poison injected by the juaseketela by causing his patients to undergo a vapor bath and to drink certain decoctions. This man would never reveal the name of anyone who came to him for treatment but would brag that "trade was brisk." The symptoms of the mortal malady caused by the seketela are said to be intestinal obstruction with tremendous distention of the abdomen (peritonitis). [184]

Of this same village, a story is told which, if not true, at all events illustrates the sort of thing that is believed. As has been mentioned above, whenever the juaseketela blows his little horn, any wosowi will hear it and thinking it is one of their band calling, will go to meet him. A woman of this village told how she and her husband were sitting over the fire while the evening meal was cooking, when he suddenly jumped up and said he must go outside for a bit. She remonstrated and asked him to wait for his food, but he hurried off. Later he returned, complaining of feeling very ill; his belly swelled up and he died soon after. It was said that this man was very friendly with a woman named Abibi and that when he went out into the bush, he was heard calling in a low voice, "Is that you, Abibi?" When his body was examined, two punctures were found on the left side of the chest. It was supposed that it was Abibi he expected to meet and with her enjoy a cannibalistic repast, whereas it was a juaseketela who had called and killed him.

This brief outline of a case of sickness, suspicion of witchcraft, death, and the consultation with the caster-of-lots, the witch-finder, ordeal poison, death, and the catching of the cannibal witch, has been given as a more or less consecutive story in order that it may be most easily understood. Some further details concerning the lot-caster, witchcraft, etc., must be added.

Lot-casting. Medicine men who cast lots were at one time fairly plentiful and were consulted on many matters, often of small importance from a European point of view. Chief of all were questions of witchcraft. The modus operandi varied in different cases. In wosowi and other important matters, the medicine man always used the chisango (divining in- 787

Witch-medicine. The making of medicine against people has been shown to occupy an essential place in usuwi, and it plays an important part in all occultism. So by insensible grades, the ordinary use of drugs in common diseases is reached, though it is probable that very much greater faith is placed in a packet of burnt roots put under the floor of the house than in the efficacy of any concoction taken by mouth. 754 [757]

There is a general belief that by medicine extra ability verging into supernatural power can be acquired. This power in a general sense is represented by the word ukoma and a man so possessed is spoken of as wundu jwa kowala. The desire for increased power may be a perfectly natural one, such as a desire for influence and popularity as a chief, or on the other hand, the power of usuwi may be aimed at, or again, the knowledge of magic medicine for thieving or for any other practice. Ukoma is, therefore, a relative matter. The necessary medicine or initiation into the understanding of magic can be purchased from persons already practitioners, the honest herbalist merging by imperceptible degrees into the most criminal witch-doctor. A single practitioner may prescribe a charcoal dressing for an ulcer, exorcise an evil spirit by a vapor bath, sell medicine to enable the buyer to win a case at court, arrange medicine on a pathway to act as a selective love potion, or prescribe a drug to change a man into a lion. 756 787 791

Deserving of special mention are the people who thieve by the aid of medicine which they have either purchased or prepared themselves. Such a man is called chitaka and the medicine sitela wa chitaka. The active principle of this medicine is said to be prepared from the tail of a hyaena, an animal which is said to be able to enter a house where people are sleeping and kill and carry off the fowls without waking the occupants. The medicine is often carried in a hyaena's tail. The chitaka is supposed to approach the house he would rob and chewing some medicine in the mouth, gently blow towards it to put everyone to sleep. The door is supposed to unfasten itself and the thief is free to take what he wishes. He is even said to kill, cook, and eat food in the house while the inmates remain unconscious. A special characteristic of the chitaka is that whatever he lays his hands on in the house he must remove, though he does not want it, so that in the morning many unwieldy, useless objects may be found outside the hut. 791 789

There are many other magic medicines. One of these, luunga, if introduced into a village, will cause the illness and death of some inmate. Anyone handling the body of the sick man or the corpse after death, sickens and dies until the whole village is wiped out. There is a man serving a life sentence now at the Central Prison, Zomba, who was convicted of having caused the death of many people in a village in Angoniland. He is said cheerfully to have admitted the power of his medicine. 754

Medicine made from a cousin is supposed to be efficacious in various ways. The blood of a cousin is instilled into the ear for otorrhoea. Drinking the water which has been used by a cousin to wash his face relieves intestinal colic. Medicine is made from the hairs of the beard of a cousin or from an ubilo and used for chest trouble. 757 605

7: Hetherwick M-5 (ca. 1900) 1902 FT7 Yao FT7

774 they said, "was about to take away their shadows and they would die." In their 123 mind the liaslu was allied to the chiwilili or picture, and the removal of it to the photographic plate would mean the disease or death of the shadeless body.

As an instance of their faith in the close relationship of the liaslu and the 123 picture or shadow, I may relate the following incident. An influential Yao chief
753 on Mount Zomba with whom I was on terms of intimate friendship for years,
774 refused to allow himself to be photographed, fearing the consequences on his life. At last I was able to persuade him to give me a sitting, but on the sole condition that the picture was to be shown to none of his subjects but to be sent out of the country as soon as possible. He feared lest some ill-wisher might use it as a means towards his bewitchment. Some months afterwards the chief became seriously ill, and in the minds of his attendants his illness was attributed to some accident having befallen the photographic plate on which they believed the picture of their chief to be imprinted. If that negative had been broken in England, whither it had been sent, their chief's illness would be accounted for. Accordingly they appealed to the divining oracle, who, however, after consulting the "lota," assured them that the picture was intact, and that in consequence the disease must be ascribed to some other cause.

774 The liaslu or soul is recognized as the chief agency in dreams. To dream is, in the Yao tongue, kwangamila masalu, where masalu is the plural form of liaslu.
787 The liaslu is supposed to go out and visit the scenes and persons it dreams about, and in turn is visited by the masalu of others, dead or living. Pains in the body on rising from sleep in the morning are usually attributed to such nocturnal visits, [753] while disease or pains of a severe type are ascribed to castigations by the whips of the masalu or more frequently of the witches who prowl around during the night watches.

774 Madness, idiocy and the ravings of delirium or disease are accounted for by a similar agency. The sufferers are wa masalu, they of the spirits, and a sudden fit
828 of epilepsy or insanity is described as gakumwila masalu, the spirits have seized him. Such persons are usually regarded with awe, as living in close contact with the unseen, but no incantations or enchantments are ever used to expel the spirit in possession. Some native doctors are credited with a knowledge of certain [755] medicines which they say are effectual in such cases, but their application in no way differs from those employed in treating ordinary types of disease. Idiots and the insane are allowed to wander at will about the village, and only when violent symptoms show themselves as a danger to the community is any physical restraint put upon them.

754 The masalu are also recognized as the inspiring agencies in the ravings of the witch detective. This person, usually a woman, is called in to discover who is the guilty agent in cases of mysterious deaths or outbreak of an epidemic at a village. She arrives on the scene and takes up her abode for a few days previous to her actual demonstration. She mixes with the people, learns all the scandal and gossip of the community, and at night prowls about the houses searching for evidence. On the appointed day she dances, kwina mazdu, to dance the spirits, or kuwesta, to rave or prophecy, and in the ravings of the dance she calls out the name of some party who is afterwards accused of being the mazwi or witch. Followed by a crowd of excited spectators she dances through the village spear in hand, stopping here and there to dig up charms or medicines which the supposed witch has buried in the ground as the instruments of his occult practices. It is only in cases of supposed special difficulty, or when the magnitude of the supposed crimes demands that special measures be adopted for their detection, that the services of such a witch detective are called in. In ordinary cases these appeals are made to the divining oracle who consults his "lota" as a means of discovering crimes of this nature. 754 [787]

7: Hetherwick M-5 (ca.1900) 1902 FT7 Yao FT7

Among the Yaos the human being is believed to be the sole possessor of a liadu. I have been unable to discover any trace of a theory that the liadu may pass into any animal or inanimate object and thus confer upon it the nature or power of a fetish. Such belief is cherished among the Angoni and Achewa tribes to the westward by Nyasa and the upper Shire River, and the intelligent Yao is aware of this, but he states that among his people no such belief exists. Even charms which have the effect of healing or warding off disease, or of protecting the wearer from war or wild beasts or other danger by land or water, are supposed to possess this power without any idea of their being possessed by a liadu or other spirit influence. The nearest approach to such a theory is in the case of certain powerful "doctors" who have obtained special medicine by means of which, at death, they can transform themselves into lions, leopards, crocodiles, etc. Lepers also are sometimes supposed to become hippopotami. But both of these cases must be regarded rather as transmutations of body than transmigrations of soul. 774 [171] [751] 756 775

It will be thus seen that the nature of the human liadu is closely allied to that of the mazdu, which are the inspiring agents in madness and in the ecstasy of prophecy or incantation. What the origin of these inspiring mazdu is, or to whom they belonged when in bodily life, the Yao holds no theory. He is content to accept them as they are, mazdu ipepe, "Just mazdu and nothing more," as he says. 774 828

It is, however, when we follow the disembodied liadu after death and consider its position and power in the other world that we find ourselves in a region of higher spiritual activities. 775

In dreams or in fainting fits the liadu leaves the body but only to return to it with the awakening consciousness. At death, however, it leaves its earthly abode never to return. It is now spoken of as having gone to malanga or mlanga. This word, which lies at the basis of all Yao theories of the place of the soul after death, will be dealt with later on as regards its derivation and connections in the Bantu family of languages. In its actual use it bears two significations.

I. The word malanga is in the first instance applied to the human soul or liadu after death when it is considered as an inhabitant of the spirit world. Even in life a man, when he meets with any piece of good luck, will be heard to say, "It's my malanga," as if his soul had an influence in determining the character of his

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

613 members goes to an outsider and grumbles to him about the 754 family squabbles[1] and quarrels. The outsider then takes the opportunity of using this squabble to introduce his sorcery into 578 the lineage. The Yao greatly fear backbiting because of their 626 dread of sorcery and none dreads it more than a village headman, a warden of a sorority-group,[2] or a person in the position of having to keep a matrilineage or section together. These people are continually adjuring the women under them—for it is the women who are believed to be the main culprits—not to fight among themselves; and if they do, not to take their complaints to an outsider but to the senior member of the matrilineage. The significance of this in relation to lineage unity is plain enough.

613 Apart from sorcery, strained relationships between members of 578 a matrilineage are believed to be dangerous for other reasons. Malice may adversely affect people who are in mystically danger-843 ous states. The most common of these states is pregnancy. If 224 a woman has a quarrel with a matrilineage member while she is pregnant she is likely to have a difficult labour. The Yao say 'the womb has heard these bad words'. Another situation where malice or quarrelling will cause difficulties is in hunting. The luck of the chase is capricious and malice may easily bring bad fortune to an otherwise good hunter. For example, a successful hunter once gave each of his two sisters a piece of venison. Each complained that the other had been given the larger piece and quarrelled vehemently about it for weeks. The hunter now found that no game fell into his traps. He went to a diviner who indicated the quarrel of the sisters as the cause of his failure and told the hunter to get them to 'blow water' (kupesya). He did this; good relationships were restored and his traps were filled once more.

613 These deleterious effects, like the curse, are connected in some way with the ancestor spirits. This is sometimes expressed quite 578 clearly when a person is called upon to 'blow water'. A
769 mother who wishes to revoke a curse, a woman who wishes to recant her malice towards her matrilineal relative who is suffering
755 in childbirth, or a man whose sister's son is ill supposedly because

[1] This is called miseri, which I have translated as 'backbiting'. This idea is extremely important, as we shall see later.

[2] i.e. those men who are responsible for their sisters and their descendants. See p. 145 ff.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

of his malice towards him, might equally be called upon to do this. The person makes a statement to the effect that he bears no malice and hopes that the sufferer will be well. For example, a woman in Cikoja village who was called upon to 'blow water' during the labour pains of her mother's younger sister's daughter's daughter,[1] because they had quarrelled over a sifting basket, put some water in her mouth, spat it out and said: 'Those words I spoke: the basket is mine. This is my child. Both are mine. When I spoke and asked my child about it, they were not words to place in my heart, so that to-day we should have to go to the diviner because my child is hitched[2] and be accused because of the sifting basket. These words I push aside. I do not know whether there are other words that we fought about, but if they are these, my daughter's child come out!'[3] Sometimes the ancestors are specifically invoked, 'Conde, conde ŵamasoka . . .' 'Please, please, O spirits . . .' This is a public confession of the tension within the lineage and it allows the lineage leaders to attempt to straighten out the difficulties, as they did in this case.[4]

These beliefs in mystical dangers of one sort or another which beset the matrilineage as the result of bad feelings within it, have the effect of constraining matrilineage members to maintain peaceable relations among themselves and are, therefore, conducive to maximum solidarity.

It is clear from MacDonald's writings that in earlier times the periodic offerings to the spirits of the ancestors was a valuable way in which the solidarity of the matrilineage was expressed. With the introduction of Islam and Christianity these sacrifices have disappeared. I have not worked in Christian areas long enough to be able to say whether the ancestor cult still persists. In the northern area, however, I can say that the ancestor cult survives as part of the practice of Islam. Periodically, feasts are held in

[1] See the history of the division in Cikoja lineage, pp. 165–6.

[2] Kukolekwa, i.e. the child cannot be born.

[3] Une malôŵegala ciwlo cila cangune. Aju muwanangu. Yosepe yangune. Phunwerenga nikwenya, kumbenya muwanangu, nginiwa malôŵe gakwika kwetima, gati ngaku lelo nikwende kwiciungo cakolekwa muwanangu nikunkamula une ligonga lya ciwlo. Cekgo ngwetaka. Kwalini nagapali gani getuwa kangamile nambo nagagga malôŵe gakwe, cimkula cangu cikopoce.

[4] I have drawn attention to the cathartic effect of accusations of sorcery and public confession of guilt in a paper, 'A Note on the African Conception of Causality', The Nyasaland Journal, v, 2 (July 1952), 57–8.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

757 Simple incision is practised for relief of pain or again "medicine" may be introduced into the wound. Such medicine usually consists of charcoal prepared from various vegetable substances. There is no evidence that any active medicinal principles are involved and the most that is attained is probably a certain amount of counter-irritation. For pain, a string is tied tightly round the part; thus for headache one sees a string tied round the head and doubtless some relief is felt when pressure is made on the temples. A man with an abscess of the hand or foot will tie a string round the arm or leg, but I have never seen it so applied as to produce any effect comparable to that of Bier's hyperaemic treatment. By analogy a string may be worn round the chest for pleuritic pain and by limiting movement may be effective. In many cases a charm is attached to the string as an adjuvant.

The use of drugs as such is widespread but I have very little evidence of their efficacy. The methods of administration are various. The vapor bath is often used. Over a pot of water in which have been dropped herbs and stones heated in a fire, the patient squats enveloped in a blanket and is thereby subjected to the action of the medicated steam. This method is also adopted for enuresis. A case which came recently to my notice was the wife of a native hospital dresser who, suffering pain in the abdomen, avoided my ministrations and consulted a female medicine-maker. She was given a vapor bath as above described and after a few moments, the medicine-woman clapped her on the back and told her to rise. The old woman plunged her hands into the pot and brought forth some human hair tied in a piece of calico and a human metacarpal bone. "These are what troubled you," she said — fee £1! This is called ku-lopiola, to take evil things out for. [795]

Various powdered barks and leaves are applied to ulcers and appear to have an astringent effect in some cases but the majority seem to go from bad to worse. No other external applications have been observed except one for scabies. Incision of the skin and insertion of "medicine" have been mentioned above.

Large numbers of vegetable products are administered by mouth, always in the form of an infusion or suspension. It is probable that a number of these are really beneficial but I am not able to speak in detail of their effects. Many astringents are undoubtedly used for diarrhoea. Herbs containing oil are used for gonorrhoea.

757 751 Apart from magic medicine dealt with elsewhere and commonly employed for purposes outside disease, charms are used for the prevention and treatment of ordinary diseases and injuries. There are only a few varieties of charms. A vegetable substance, root or stem, may be worn on a string round the part of the body concerned. Thus one sees a couple of little pieces of stick, ubiji, on a string tied round the head, round the arm or round the chest for headache, a whitlow or diarrhoea as the case may be. The medicine may be in the form of a preparation, generally charred vegetable substances, and is made into a little packet in leaves and cloth worn most commonly round the neck; it is called kabwaua. Such a charm is supposed to be effective against all ills.

3:Stanzus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

516 731 769

knees and elbows, at intervals swaying their bodies from side to side and clapping their hands. Kasungu then ordered all to go and bathe, men and women separately. As they returned from the stream, rain began to fall.

Intercession on behalf of the sick may be made, especially by anyone who is likely to be accused of causing the illness by witchcraft.[1] The man standing with arms outstretched, downwards and a little in front of his body, the hands supine, takes some water in his mouth and discharges it in a stream on the ground, (probably as a sign of purification of his tongue), and then invoking "all the spirits above," asks that they will intercede to restore health to the sick man and bear witness to his own innocence of any wish to do the sick man injury. Ku-pepe is the word meaning to offer sacrifice and prayer. 755 769

Harvesting and hunting are occasions when sacrifices may be offered. It was formerly the custom for the chief to determine the day on which harvesting of millet should begin. On the day appointed, a big drum was beaten in the village and word passed round; then everyone would go down to his garden, gather a head of millet, and bring it back to the village where it was all handed over to the chief's headwife. After drying and threshing, a little of the grain was laid at the grave of an old chief by one of the reigning chief's advisers, the remainder being again distributed to all the people gathered together in the village meeting-place, who ate it raw. After this ceremony, harvesting begin. 769 241 782

In passing through a millet garden, if a child asks his mother to give him some to eat, she plucks a bunch or two and reverently laying one at the foot of a mavo tree for the spirits or at the base of some other tree, if she cannot see a mavo, she gives the rest to the child.

When a hunting expedition makes its first killing, part of the flesh of the animal is laid at the base of a tree as a thank offering to the spirits and in anticipation of further favors to be conferred. All such offerings are supposed by the natives to be partaken of by the spirits, though they are well aware that they do not actually diminish in quantity. There is an interesting point in this connection: any man who has acted as nhilo (undertaker) to some well-known man may appropriate these offerings. In the case of the hunting offering, he will run round the tree, saying, "I am a hyaena, the spirits will not mind me," and will then take part of the flesh-offering and eat it. 782 224

In the same way, a nhilo may drink from a grave beer-pot after three days, when the spirits are supposed to have taken what they want.

With the exception of the mavo tree above mentioned (ndima, Chin.), and possibly another called nsile-ngumu (Chin.), which is never used as firewood and which is supposed to be used by masuí, I do not think there are any sacred trees properly so-called. Miss Werner supposes that many of the big trees (often a species of Ficus) in villages are sacred.[2] The truth is, I believe, simply that a village is made naturally round a big tree which conveniently offers its shade for the village meeting place. The spirits of deceased chiefs may 824 778

[1] Vide supra, p. 307.

[2] The natives of British Central Africa, op. cit., p. 82.

3:Stanner D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

791
789
255

As an example of another kind of intermediary may be mentioned a woman called Binibi Chikanowa, who, though an Anyanja, was well known among the Yao of Zomba. She was consulted on many occasions about the future, about rain, or the prevention of disease. She was a woman of quiet ways and greatly respected; she had no fixed abode but was received everywhere and given food and shelter. She would sometimes disappear from the district and travel to far distant places. A son, born to her when a young woman, was lately a patient under my care, a man of about forty-eight. On one occasion she was consulted about an epidemic of ulcers among the people near Zomba. She asked all the people from the villages to go down to Lake Shirwa and to take a white fowl with them. When they had all collected, she appeared, carrying in each hand a little gourd containing mbepwi flour, and a small open basket on her head. She took the fowl in one hand and then proceeded to walk into the water, saying she would have to go to a little hill on an island in the lake called Chidio Mpiri and that she would come back in three days. She then walked on into the water and disappeared below its surface. In three days time, she returned to the village and said that the women must give up dancing the chipondo dance for twelve months and all would be well.

On other occasions she usually worked along similar lines. Consulted as to whether or not some sick person would recover, she always answered with the same formula, if she thought he would die, "The house is prepared for him and medicine would avail nothing!"

791
828

There are certain other supernatural persons or spirits to which reference must be made. Chimalo-mawi has been mentioned above. Mawawa, a word which Hetherwick translates as "madness, idiocy,"[1] really refers to the delusions and hallucinations which form part of the perceptions of the insane. The word also has the meaning of obsession, phobia, and intuition; thus the natives say of an ox about to be slaughtered that shows signs of realizing the approaching evil, "it has mawawa." On the other hand, they say the hartebeest is a foolish animal that does not know what to do when hunted: "it has mawawa, it is a deluded animal." Again, the baboon and the crow "have mawawa"; they are possessed of senses or faculties which warn them of the approach of any enemies before they can be seen or heard; they cannot be stalked. In all these cases, the crowd of hallucinatory men pursuing some melancholic, the rats of the delirium tremens patient, and that which appears to warn the crow or the baboon, are all mawawa and are, I think, supposed by the natives to have some kind of materialistic form.

791
789

Ndodoka: when the wasawi[2] do not wish immediately to devour the body of a deceased person which they have raised from the grave, they cut off the arms and legs at the elbows and knees and insert medicine into the stumps; these living-dead are then compelled by the wasawi to live in caves and hollow ant hills during the day and to follow them at night in their travels, "like a herd of goats," to be eaten as required. The ndodoka may be heard as they wander along in the night, making sounds like a cat's mew. A woman will

[1] Yao language, op. cit., p. 288. [2] Vide supra, p. 266.

7: Hetherwick M-5 (ca. 1900) 1902 FT7 Yao FT7

774 they said, "was about to take away their shadows and they would die." In their 123 mind the liseku was allied to the ekiwilili or picture, and the removal of it to the photographic plate would mean the disease or death of the shadeless body.

As an instance of their faith in the close relationship of the liseku and the 123 picture or shadow, I may relate the following incident. An influential Yao chief
753 on Mount Zomba with whom I was on terms of intimate friendship for years,
774 refused to allow himself to be photographed, fearing the consequences on his life. At last I was able to persuade him to give me a sitting, but on the sole condition that the picture was to be shown to none of his subjects but to be sent out of the country as soon as possible. He feared lest some ill-wisher might use it as a means towards his bewitchment. Some months afterwards the chief became seriously ill, and in the minds of his attendants his illness was attributed to some accident having befallen the photographic plate on which they believed the picture of their chief to be imprinted. If that negative had been broken in England, whither it had been sent, their chief's illness would be accounted for. Accordingly they appealed to the divining oracle, who, however, after consulting the "lota," assured them that the picture was intact, and that in consequence the disease must be ascribed to some other cause.

774 The liseku or soul is recognized as the chief agency in dreams. To dream is, in the Yao tongue, kwangamila maseku, where maseku is the plural form of liseku.
787 The liseku is supposed to go out and visit the scenes and persons it dreams about, and in turn is visited by the maseku of others, dead or living. Pains in the body on rising from sleep in the morning are usually attributed to such nocturnal visits,
[753] while disease or pains of a severe type are ascribed to castigations by the whips of the maseku or more frequently of the witches who prowl around during the night watches.

774 Madness, idiocy and the ravings of delirium or disease are accounted for by a similar agency. The sufferers are wa maseku, they of the spirits, and a sudden fit
828 of epilepsy or insanity is described as gakumwile maseku, the spirits have seized him. Such persons are usually regarded with awe, as living in close contact with the unseen, but no incantations or enchantments are ever used to expel the spirit in possession. Some native doctors are credited with a knowledge of certain [755] medicines which they say are effectual in such cases, but their application in no way differs from those employed in treating ordinary types of disease. Idiots and the insane are allowed to wander at will about the village, and only when violent symptoms show themselves as a danger to the community is any physical restraint put upon them.

The maseku are also recognized as the inspiring agencies in the ravings of the 754 witch detective. This person, usually a woman, is called in to discover who is the guilty agent in cases of mysterious deaths or outbreak of an epidemic at a village. She arrives on the scene and takes up her abode for a few days previous to her actual demonstration. She mixes with the people, learns all the scandal and gossip of the community, and at night prowls about the houses searching for

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

Again, charm medicine may be contained in various articles which are also generally worn round the neck. The teeth and claws of the beasts of prey are so employed, generally arranged in pairs bound together so as to form a crescent and suspended from a string. The teeth of crocodiles, lions, leopards, and the claws of the same beasts and of some large birds of prey are thus employed. The teeth etc., are in themselves charms against injury, probably against what one might call homologous injury. The idea of stuffing them with medicine is probably a secondary consideration, a process of fortification of the charm so that its use comes to have a more powerful influence. It is interesting to see of late years that the native, recognizing the decorative value of these crescent-shaped amulets, has begun to copy them in lead and ivory. A series of these of graduated size is worn as a necklace by women. 751 757 825

When a medicine-man is consulted, part payment is made in advance, "payment to go and dig medicine (roots)." The rest of the payment is made when the cure is effected. Should a patient not be satisfied with his treatment and wish to consult some other medicine-man, he pays to the first a quarter of the fee he would have paid if his cure had been effected; this is called "paying him to get his medicine away." Unless this is done, should he recover later, he will be liable to claims for full fees from all of the medicine-men he has consulted; each will say his own medicine has gone on acting and has effected the cure. A medicine-man may take a case he is treating into his own house. 756

In prescribing medicine, very particular instructions are given with an embargo on certain things which may or may not have some use and significance. A medicine-man in 1891 at Malemya's, who inoculated every one in the forehead with bullet proof medicine, said that no one must step across a mwiri (pestle for pounding grain), and no one must eat the leaves of the sweet potato.

A medicine-man always partakes of part of the decoction he is giving to a patient to show that it is harmless; I think these preparations are mostly inactive. I should hate to sample all the castor oil I have prescribed, though many natives have had suspicions about me when I have not done so.

Poisons. Though there are a large number of species in this country, both vegetable and animal, from which poison might be extracted, those that have gained any reputation among natives and have come under my observation are but few in number. Mwai (Mwabi Chin.) "the ordeal poison," is the bark of Erythrophloeum guineaense. The natives distinguish two varieties of mwai, the two trees differing slightly in leaf, flower and bark; mwai is the Erythrophloeum guineaense, the second variety known as mperanjilu is doubtless an allied species. Mwai is the poison employed in the poison ordeal.[1] It is administered in a poisonous dose as a decoction of the bark, recovery or otherwise depending on whether or not the poison is voided by vomiting. Natives give as the symptoms headache, giddiness, disturbances of vision, vomiting and purging, with slowing of heart beat. Mper- 137 278 [695]

[1] Vide infra, p. 296.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

Witch-medicine. The making of medicine against people has been shown to occupy an essential place in usawi, and it plays an important part in all occultism. So by insensible grades, the ordinary use of drugs in common diseases is reached, though it is probable that very much greater faith is placed in a packet of burnt roots put under the floor of the house than in the efficacy of any concoction taken by mouth. 754 [757]

There is a general belief that by medicine extra ability verging into supernatural power can be acquired. This power in a general sense is represented by the word ukoma and a man so possessed is spoken of as mundu jua komala. The desire for increased power may be a perfectly natural one, such as a desire for influence and popularity as a chief, or on the other hand, the power of usawi may be aimed at, or again, the knowledge of magic medicine for thieving or for any other practice. Ukoma is, therefore, a relative matter. The necessary medicine or initiation into the understanding of magic can be purchased from persons already practitioners, the honest herbalist merging by imperceptible degrees into the most criminal witch-doctor. A single practitioner may prescribe a charcoal dressing for an ulcer, exorcise an evil spirit by a vapor bath, sell medicine to enable the buyer to win a case at court, arrange medicine on a pathway to act as a selective love potion, or prescribe a drug to change a man into a lion. 756 787 791

Deserving of special mention are the people who thieve by the aid of medicine which they have either purchased or prepared themselves. Such a man is called chitaka and the medicine mtela wa chitaka. The active principle of this medicine is said to be prepared from the tail of a hyaena, an animal which is said to be able to enter a house where people are sleeping and kill and carry off the fowls without waking the occupants. The medicine is often carried in a hyaena's tail. The chitaka is supposed to approach the house he would rob and chewing some medicine in the mouth, gently blow towards it to put everyone to sleep. The door is supposed to unfasten itself and the thief is free to take what he wishes. He is even said to kill, cook, and eat food in the house while the inmates remain unconscious. A special characteristic of the chitaka is that whatever he lays his hands on in the house he must remove, though he does not want it, so that in the morning many unwieldy, useless objects may be found outside the hut. 791 789

There are many other magic medicines. One of these, luunga, if introduced into a village, will cause the illness and death of some inmate. Anyone handling the body of the sick man or the corpse after death, sickens and dies until the whole village is wiped out. There is a man serving a life sentence now at the Central Prison, Zomba, who was convicted of having caused the death of many people in a village in Angoniland. He is said cheerfully to have admitted the power of his medicine. 754

Medicine made from a cousin is supposed to be efficacious in various ways. The blood of a cousin is instilled into the ear for otorrhoea. Drinking the water which has been used by a cousin to wash his face relieves intestinal colic. Medicine is made from the hairs of the beard of a cousin or from an mbile and used for chest trouble. 757 605

7: Hetherwick M-5 (ca.1900) 1902 FT7 Yao FT7

evidence. On the appointed day she dances, kwyina masoka, to dance the spirits, or kwewerela, to rave or prophecy, and in the ravings of the dance she calls out the name of some party who is afterwards accused of being the mawi or witch. Followed by a crowd of excited spectators she dances through the village spear in hand, stopping here and there to dig up charms or medicines which the supposed witch has buried in the ground as the instruments of his occult practices. It is only in cases of supposed special difficulty, or when the magnitude of the supposed crimes demands that special measures be adopted for their detection, that the services of such a witch detective are called in. In ordinary cases these appeals are made to the divining oracle who consults his "lota" as a means of discovering crimes of this nature. 754 [787]

Among the Yaos the human being is believed to be the sole possessor of a lisoka. I have been unable to discover any trace of a theory that the lisoka may pass into any animal or inanimate object and thus confer upon it the nature or power of a fetish. Such belief is cherished among the Angoni and Achowa tribes to the westward by Nyasa and the upper Shire River, and the intelligent Yao is aware of this, but he states that among his people no such belief exists. Even charms which have the effect of healing or warding off disease, or of protecting the wearer from war or wild beasts or other danger by land or water, are supposed to possess this power without any idea of their being possessed by a lisoka or other spirit influence. The nearest approach to such a theory is in the case of certain powerful "doctors" who have obtained special medicine by means of which, at death, they can transform themselves into lions, leopards, crocodiles, etc. Lepers also are sometimes supposed to become hippopotami. But both of these cases must be regarded rather as transmutations of body than transmigrations of soul. 774 [171] [751] 756 775

It will be thus seen that the nature of the human lisoka is closely allied to that of the masoka, which are the inspiring agents in madness and in the ecstasy of prophecy or incantation. What the origin of these inspiring masoka is, or to whom they belonged when in bodily life, the Yao holds no theory. He is content to accept them as they are, masoka igoyo, "Just masoka and nothing more," as he says. 774 828

It is, however, when we follow the disembodied lisoka after death and consider its position and power in the other world that we find ourselves in a region of higher spiritual activities. 775

In dreams or in fainting fits the lisoka leaves the body but only to return to it with the awakening consciousness. At death, however, it leaves its earthly abode never to return. It is now spoken of as having gone to mulungu or mlungu. This word, which lies at the basis of all Yao theories of the place of the soul after death, will be dealt with later on as regards its derivation and connections in the Bantu family of languages. In its actual use it bears two significations.

I. The word mulungu is in the first instance applied to the human soul or lisoka after death when it is considered as an inhabitant of the spirit world. Even in life a man, when he meets with any piece of good luck, will be heard to say, "It's my mulungu," as if his soul had an influence in determining the character of his

10: Sanderson D-5 (ca. 1920)1922 FT7 Yao FT7

796 THE WHOLE VILLAGE IS THOROUGHLY "SPRING-CLEANED", ALL RUBBISH
[364] is swept up, the ground round the houses is hoed clean, and the interiors remudded. Ceremonial beer is brewed by the head-wife of the chief, and after this has been drunk the ashes of the fire used in the brewing are carefully collected and taken to a malehano ("cross-roads," or "diverging of paths") where they are deposited.
[783] The chief, as representative of his people, bathes in special medicated water, a [824] decoction made from the bark of ng'wenyu and mbawa, and the root of mpingo.
[622] This completes the ordinary annual ceremony, at which new fire is not made.

On certain special occasions a more elaborate ritual is carried out; such occasions are the death of a chief, a threatened epidemic of infectious disease, a murder (especially by shooting) and the frequent occurrence of quarrels in the village.

In such circumstances, in addition to the ordinary pyajila ceremony described above, the porridge sticks of the whole village are renewed and all fires extinguished. The discarded sticks and all ashes of the old fires are carried to the meeting of paths, where the former are stuck upright in the ground and the ashes piled together;
[372] this is done in procession, all the people taking part. On their return to the village new fire is made by friction by either the chief or his younger brother—usually the latter; fire procured in any other way would nullify the proceedings. Finally [783] all the people bathe in the medicated water used only by the chief at the ordinary ceremony.

751 In addition to this special form of the pyajila ceremony, another rite is sometimes
796 performed after the occurrence of a murder or as prophylactic against the spread of epidemic disease. The doctor first makes a kind of trough (lukungwa) from the bark of mtondowoko or mpapa, and procures a chichiliko (or chipengule) basket—used as a strainer in salt-making. Having collected his medicines he proceeds to the bank of the stream near the usual bathing-place of the village and digs a shallow hole, in which he places the basket; in this he puts the leaves of a certain thorny shrub and covers the whole with the trough, which is banked up with earth so as to be perfectly firm. He then puts his "medicines" into the trough; these are, first, the head of an iron hammer and a piece of slag, both from a smelting furnace. On top of these he puts pieces of the root of a certain tree which has many and particularly sharp thorns, and bits of bark from two trees peculiar for having very straight stems. Having distributed these evenly along the floor of the trough, he fills it with water and then proceeds to construct an arch over the end of the trough furthest from the stream. Two long poles, cut from a kind of tree particularly rich in sap, are planted in the ground, one at each side of the trough and close to it; these are bent over towards each other, and fastened together by means of a strip of their own bark. A bamboo is now planted alongside each, and similarly tied to its fellow. During all these preparations and throughout the ceremony it is essential that the doctor has no knots in any part of his clothing.

The preparations are now complete, and when all the fires in the village have been extinguished the people go in procession to the spot where the doctor awaits them. All must be poorly clad and must have no metal about them.

[622] The chief opens the ceremony. He steps into the trough and taking some of the medicated water therefrom in his hands he rinses his mouth with it. He then
[769] offers a prayer to the spirits of his ancestors, first stating the emergency and detailing the measures which are to be taken to deal with it (new fires, sweeping, discard of porridge-sticks and shaving). The prayer over, he splashes the water in the trough over his body and passes through the arch, first throwing some gift (beads or, in more modern times, money) into the trough. These gifts, presumably [756] intended as an offering to the spirits, are the perquisites of the doctor, and everybody is supposed to contribute in turn.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

Other hypothetical diseases which are caused by disobedience to custom are mentioned under various other headings. Kasipa: a disease generally characterised by ulceration of the legs but in some cases by pains in the back, or loosely used for a variety of symptoms, is said to be caused by the entry into the body of a worm which lives in water-pools. This worm which I have had identified is a gordian worm and not known to be parasitic in man. Luasi: When a man kills another in battle, he will slit open the belly of his victim; otherwise he believes he will sicken with luasi and his own belly will swell up like that of the corpse when putrefaction sets in. He is supposed also to hunger after more killing and blood. Likango is the name of a supposed disease which kills off one child after another in a family when they are about six months old. Congenital syphilis naturally suggests itself but I have never been able to verify this idea. Likango lya kututa: a supposed disease which causes the death of the first child when the second is born, the second when the third is born and so on, whatever the intervals between the births. Each child is said to push (ku-tula) the previous one out of this world. Under these circumstances the disease is ascribed to something wrong with the mother or father and they are examined by a medicine-woman or medicine-man, and any carunculae or an external pile found will be cut away.

If a snake inflicts two bites, the case will prove fatal. If a crocodile emits a grunting sound when seizing its victim, though he escape he will certainly die.

Treatment of disease. Of surgical treatment there is very little to be noted. Nothing in the way of operation is performed with the exception of circumcision (see Lupanda).

An abscess is allowed to burst, the smallest tumor is left untouched, but accessory digits which are not rare, attached only by a fine pedicle, are snipped off.

The natives cannot extract teeth. They are incapable of rendering any assistance in cases of difficult labor. Dislocations are not recognised as such, but fractures are treated by the application of wooden sticks placed at intervals round the circumference of the limb parallel to it and held in position by twisted pieces of bark string (Pl. XXII, fig. 3). The principle of the tourniquet appears to be unknown.

The only instruments used consist of a small knife for incision, a cupping-horn, and a primitive form of funnel for administering enemata (Pl. XXII, figs. 1, 2, 4). The knife has a triangular blade with a stem which is commonly twisted at one of the corners. The knife is used for wet-cupping, tatooing, and circumcision (Pl. XXII, fig. 2). The cupping-horn is a small horn of a calf. The apex is pierced and after application to the part, suction is made with the mouth and then the hole sealed by working a piece of beeswax over it with the tongue. Six small incisions are made in the skin for the withdrawal of the blood. The cupping-horn is called chusi (tulumika, Chin.). Cupping is used for headache and for pain in the chest and back. The enema funnel, chigolya (ntimbiri, Chin.) is made from the neck of a gourd to which is attached a hollow straw for introduction into the anus. Half a pint of an infusion of nungwiu is injected for constipation associated with pain.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

757 Simple incision is practiced for relief of pain or again "medicine" may be introduced into the wound. Such medicine usually consists of charcoal prepared from various vegetable substances. There is no evidence that any active medicinal principles are involved and the most that is attained is probably a certain amount of counter-irritation. For pain, a string is tied tightly round the part; thus for headache one sees a string tied round the head and doubtless some relief is felt when pressure is made on the temples. A man with an abscess of the hand or foot will tie a string round the arm or leg, but I have never seen it so applied as to produce any effect comparable to that of Bier's hyperæmic treatment. By analogy a string may be worn round the chest for pleuritic pain and by limiting movement may be effective. In many cases a charm is attached to the string as an adjuvant.

The use of drugs as such is widespread but I have very little evidence of their efficacy. The methods of administration are various. The vapor bath is often used. Over a pot of water in which have been dropped herbs and stones heated in a fire, the patient squats enveloped in a blanket and is thereby subjected to the action of the medicated steam. This method is also adopted for exorcism. A case which came recently to my notice was the wife of a native hospital dresser who, suffering pain in the abdomen, avoided my ministrations and consulted a female medicine-maker. She was given a vapor bath as above described and after a few moments, the medicine-woman clapped her on the back and told her to rise. The old woman plunged her hands into the pot and brought forth some human hair tied [755] in a piece of calico and a human metacarpal bone. "These are what troubled you," she said — fee £1! This is called ku-lopolola, to take evil things out for.

Various powdered barks and leaves are applied to ulcers and appear to have an astringent effect in some cases but the majority seem to go from bad to worse. No other external applications have been observed except one for scabies. Incision of the skin and insertion of "medicine" have been mentioned above.

Large numbers of vegetable products are administered by mouth, always in the form of an infusion or suspension. It is probable that a number of these are really beneficial but I am not able to speak in detail of their effects. Many astringents are undoubtedly used for diarrhoea. Herbs containing oil are used for gonorrhoea.

757 Apart from magic medicine dealt with elsewhere and commonly employed for purposes
751 outside disease, charms are used for the prevention and treatment of ordinary diseases and injuries. There are only a few varieties of charms. A vegetable substance, root or stem, may be worn on a string round the part of the body concerned. Thus one sees a couple of little pieces of stick, mbiji, on a string tied round the head, round the arm or round the chest for headache, a whitlow or diarrhoea as the case may be. The medicine may be in the form of a preparation, generally charred vegetable substances, and is made into a little packet in leaves and cloth worn most commonly round the neck; it is called kotumwa. Such a charm is supposed to be effective against all ills.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

Again, charm medicine may be contained in various articles which are also generally worn round the neck. The teeth and claws of the beasts of prey are so employed, generally arranged in pairs bound together so as to form a crescent and suspended from a string. The teeth of crocodiles, lions, leopards, and the claws of the same beasts and of some large birds of prey are thus employed. The teeth etc., are in themselves charms against injury, probably against what one might call homologous injury. The idea of stuffing them with medicine is probably a secondary consideration, a process of fortification of the charm so that its use comes to have a more powerful influence. It is interesting to see of late years that the native, recognizing the decorative value of these crescent-shaped amulets, has begun to copy them in lead and ivory. A series of these of graduated size is worn as a necklace by women. 751 757 825

When a medicine-man is consulted, part payment is made in advance, "payment to go and dig medicine (roots)." The rest of the payment is made when the cure is effected. Should a patient not be satisfied with his treatment and wish to consult some other medicine-man, he pays to the first a quarter of the fee he would have paid if his cure had been effected; this is called "paying him to get his medicine away." Unless this is done, should he recover later, he will be liable to claims for full fees from all of the medicine-men he has consulted; each will say his own medicine has gone on acting and has effected the cure. A medicine-man may take a case he is treating into his own house. 756

In prescribing medicine, very particular instructions are given with an embargo on certain things which may or may not have some use and significance. A medicine-man in 1901 at Malemya's, who inoculated every one in the forehead with bullet proof medicine, said that no one must step across a muisi (pestle for pounding grain), and no one must eat the leaves of the sweet potato.

A medicine-man always partakes of part of the decoction he is giving to a patient to show that it is harmless; I think these preparations are mostly inactive. I should hate to sample all the castor oil I have prescribed, though many natives have had suspicions about me when I have not done so.

Poisons. Though there are a large number of species in this country, both vegetable and animal, from which poison might be extracted, those that have gained any reputation among natives and have come under my observation are but few in number. Mwai (Mwabei Chin.) "the ordeal poison," is the bark of Erythrophloeum guineensae. The natives distinguish two varieties of mwai, the two trees differing slightly in leaf, flower and bark; mwai is the Erythrophloeum guineensée, the second variety known as mperunjilu is doubtless an allied species. Mwai is the poison employed in the poison ordeal.[1] It is administered in a poisonous dose as a decoction of the bark, recovery or otherwise depending on whether or not the poison is voided by vomiting. Natives give as the symptoms headache, giddiness, disturbances of vision, vomiting and purging, with slowing of heart beat. Mper- 137 278 [695]

[1] Vide infra, p. 296.

Witch-medicine. The making of medicine against people has been shown to occupy an essential place in usawi, and it plays an important part in all occultism. So by insensible grades, the ordinary use of drugs in common diseases is reached, though it is probable that very much greater faith is placed in a packet of burnt roots put under the floor of the house than in the efficacy of any concoction taken by mouth. 754 [757]

There is a general belief that by medicine extra ability verging into supernatural power can be acquired. This power in a general sense is represented by the word ukoma and a man so possessed is spoken of as mundu jua komala. The desire for increased power may be a perfectly natural one, such as a desire for influence and popularity as a chief, or on the other hand, the power of usawi may be aimed at, or again, the knowledge of magic medicine for thieving or for any other practice. Ukoma is, therefore, a relative matter. The necessary medicine or initiation into the understanding of magic can be purchased from persons already practitioners, the honest herbalist merging by imperceptible degrees into the most criminal witch-doctor. A single practitioner may prescribe a charcoal dressing for an ulcer, exorcise an evil spirit by a vapor bath, sell medicine to enable the buyer to win a case at court, arrange medicine on a pathway to act as a selective love potion, or prescribe a drug to change a man into a lion. 756 787 791

Deserving of special mention are the people who thieve by the aid of medicine which they have either purchased or prepared themselves. Such a man is called chitaka and the medicine mala wa chitaka. The active principle of this medicine is said to be prepared from the tail of a hyaena, an animal which is said to be able to enter a house where people are sleeping and kill and carry off the fowls without waking the occupants. The medicine is often carried in a hyaena's tail. The chitaka is supposed to approach the house he would rob and chewing some medicine in the mouth, gently blow towards it to put everyone to sleep. The door is supposed to unfasten itself and the thief is free to take what he wishes. He is even said to kill, cook, and eat food in the house while the inmates remain unconscious. A special characteristic of the chitaka is that whatever he lays his hands on in the house he must remove, though he does not want it, so that in the morning many unwieldy, useless objects may be found outside the hut. 791 789

There are many other magic medicines. One of these, luunga, if introduced into a village, will cause the illness and death of some inmate. Anyone handling the body of the sick man or the corpse after death, sickens and dies until the whole village is wiped out. There is a man serving a life sentence now at the Central Prison, Zomba, who was convicted of having caused the death of many people in a village in Angoniland. He is said cheerfully to have admitted the power of his medicine. 754

Medicine made from a cousin is supposed to be efficacious in various ways. The blood of a cousin is instilled into the ear for otorrhoea. Drinking the water which has been used by a cousin to wash his face relieves intestinal colic. Medicine is made from the hairs of the beard of a cousin or from an ubilo and used for chest trouble. 757 605

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

752
757
413

1, Cupping horn; 2, Surgical knife; 3, Splint; 4, Enema funnel; 5-11, Children's toys; 12-17, Drums

[End Plate 22]

The chief or an important village headman

[601] is usually addressed by a kinship term, either baba (father) or 643 ambuje (master or grandparent). When he is referred to, his 622 name is not used. Village headmen are owners or wardens of 554 villages (anyene misi) but only those headmen of some standing 178 are referred to as mwenye.

Important village headmen, like the chief, are in mystical 643 danger from pollution by death. They cannot come to the hut in 622 which a corpse is lying ; and they cannot eat the chicken which 554 has been brought to them by relatives of the deceased to announce 761 the death. Like the chief too, an important headman may be buried in a tomb in his village and not in the graveyard.

But an important element in their relationship nowadays is 643 that the Administration will support the chief against a village
622 headman when it comes to a trial of strength, and that a headman
554 these days is precluded by modern conditions from setting up
578 chiefdoms as he did in the old days. Village headmen therefore 691 must struggle for power against their fellows and the chief within the modern Administrative framework. Some attempts are made to resist the power of the chief but these are rarely successful. The dispute between Liwonde and Ndenda illustrates this.

Ndenda was an Nguru headman, who in 1947 had 284 tax-payers under him (Liwonde, the chief, had 186 in his village). Ndenda had come into Liwonde's area before the White invasion and had surrendered with his relative Mlelemba, to Liwonde. The second Liwonde had given him both initiation rights but, unlike his relative, he did not have the right to wear a scarlet headband.

In 1938 or thereabouts, Liwonde decided to move his village site from the Shire River to its present site about half-way up the Great Rift scarp. He sent two of his young men to look for a suitable site, and to plant some mango trees there when they had found one. Ndenda heard of this and sent one of his men to take Liwonde's men into custody. He took their hoes away and then told them to go back to tell the chief they were planting in his (Ndenda's) land. In due course Liwonde moved up to his new site, and asked Ndenda why he had taken the hoes away and whether he owned the country, i.e. was the chief. Ndenda now argued that Mlelemba's ancestors had been given the rights of chieftainship over this area and that the first Mlelemba in the area had given Liwonde some elephant tusks for these rights. Liwonde replied that the chief has a right to tusks and that many had given tusks to him but were not entitled for that reason to rights of chieftainship. Liwonde handled this situation by calling a meeting of the village headmen in the area. They assembled

3:Stanner D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

845 one of Malungu's men died, after giving birth to quintuplets, some thirty years ago. Deformed children are buried alive. A large number of children is always hoped for and where [165] polygamy is practised, some families are of considerable size, although the mortality among young children is very high. It is, of course, very difficult to state the child-bearing period among natives. It does not start so early as is commonly supposed, and I think the menopause is found within about the same limits as among Europeans.

● 764 165 Death. Natives of Nyamland live to a good old age. That such is not the case I have found to be one of the many fallacious beliefs concerning natives which should be relegated to the realm of exploded theories, as I have pointed out elsewhere.[1]

Death in old age is recognized as a natural event but apart from this, all sickness and
[784] death were formerly and are still to a large extent looked upon as the result of the machinations of some person, an idea which forms the outstanding feature in their belief in witchcraft, sorcery.[2]

763 Here I shall mention the ordinary customs in the case of death. During the last hours of a mortal illness, a man is tended by his wife or wives; the head wife sits constantly supporting his head on her lap or against her breast. A woman is similarly tended by her mother, sisters, and friends. As unconsciousness sets in and the extremities become cold, they say, "His spirit has gone and only the heart remains alive."

The native does not like the idea of lingering on and a man on his death-bed will say to his sons, "Now watch me that I die quickly." He may take medicine to help him over that time or he may give his sons instructions as to what to do. Should a man linger unconscious for a long time, friends will ask his sons, "Did he give you any instructions?" If he has done so, the sons will then carry them out. This perhaps consists of bathing themselves in medicines left by their father, while they stand on the roof of his house. Some-[825] times, the natives say of a lingering case, "Ah, perhaps he has eaten of a tortoise's heart!" knowing the phenomenon of the tortoise's heart and believing that by partaking of it, the same property can be conferred on the heart of a man.

764 When death is manifest, the body is covered with a cloth by a brother, a son, or some [197] other person in attendance. The eyes are closed, the mouth shut, and at the present time, the body straightened out. This, however, is a recent practice copied from the Anyanja, Europeans, and Mohammedans.

764 News of the death must be sent to the chief, and a messenger goes to his village where 203 the chief and his people sit in the village open space. He carries a fowl in his hand. The present of a single fowl always denotes bad tidings. One of the chief's men, seeing the stranger approach with the single fowl, will jump up and take the bird. He is joined by the others and they go away to the cross-roads where they kill the fowl, pluck it, cook it and eat it. In the meantime, the messenger delivers his news to the chief who will produce from his house about eight yards of white calico; if the deceased has been a much respected

[1] Hugh S. Stanner, "The Ilo-spun of sorgrum", (Lusaka, April 11, 1914, p. 1002). [2] Vide infra, p. 266.

3:Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

771
784
826
539

68. A child, when one of its milk teeth drops out, stands some five yards away facing the door of the hut and throws the tooth over the roof of the hut, saying:

"Al Mkungulu Ilwe Ipwa-ulyo, mlomi Ipwaye Ipwakwe 'ipa"
"Oh! crow tooth your there is, give me my of good oral"

Religion. The matter of the religious beliefs professed by natives of East Central Africa is one beset with many difficulties to the student of today. It has been the subject of many essays by workers in the missionary field, but the wide contact of the natives of Nyasaland with missionary effort during the past thirty years has done much to confuse the problem, and one feels that many missionaries in their writings rather color the picture with their own feelings. 771

I think probably the Yao with whom I am now concerned have a truer conception of their own beliefs than many of the subject tribes among whom mission teaching has more easily taken root. The religious beliefs of a people are to a large extent the reflection of the circumstances under which that people lives. The outstanding event to all natives is death. At death, something is lost to the body, without which life is impossible. This is the mzimu which may be translated "soul" or "spirit." The mzimu is said to leave the body of the dying man when he becomes unwell or unconscious. It appears that this same mzimu may leave the body during unconscious states unassociated with death, as when a man faints, in epilepsy, and during sleep. 771 761 774

Apart from this evidence of the dissociation of the mzimu from the living body, the Yao believe that a man's shadow is an objective manifestation of the soul and they will say "the shadow is the mzimu." Fear is experienced if a man jumps on the shadow of his fellow. Light is also thrown on the constitution of the mzimu by the belief in a certain evil-spirit which dwells in deep pools. It is called chimulu-mwi, which means "one who may finish (drink up) all the water." The superstition regarding this evil spirit is that it can suck the blood from your shadow as you stand at the edge of the pool, till you become so weak that you fall in and are drowned. 774 774 776

After leaving the body at death, the mzimu goes to take up its place in the spirit-world, occupying a position corresponding to that held by the man during his life. With a truly materialistic conception, the soul is supposed to have all the attributes of the dead man, to be wealthy in proportion as the man was so on earth, and its relative position will be identical with that which he held among the living. The tribal chief becomes a paramount chief in the spirit world, the lesser chief holds sway in his lesser capacity, etc. We shall see that in intercession, when the tribe is threatened with calamities, it is the late paramount chief who is appealed to for help, and when one feudal chief is at war with another, the chief's dead predecessor will be called upon for aid. When a village is moved, it is from the spirit of the dead headman of the village that success in the enterprise is sought. Similarly, in family trouble, some dead ancestor is entreated to set things right, while a native 775

824 778 be supposed to live in such trees. They are convenient natural objects for them to occupy, in fact practically the only ones to be found in villages. Trees may secondarily, therefore, be looked upon as in some degree sacred. About such trees strings or pieces of calico may be placed as an offering to the spirits of the departed. But the Yao do not erect little huts in their vicinity, hung about with strips of calico as is the custom among the Anyanja.

775 Macdonald[1] mentions the spirits in connection with Sochs and other hills round Blantyre and supposes them to be the spirits of the places themselves. This I think is unlikely; they would probably turn out to be spirits bearing the names of long departed Anyanja chiefs whom the immigrant Amangoche Yao venerated just "to be on the safe side," since they had come and taken the country which long ago belonged to the former tribe. When approaching or passing any spot held to be the dwelling place of spirits, salutation is made by clapping the hands.

Spirits of the departed may enter into animals or may take the form of animals, [825] commonly lions and sometimes large snakes (python), but this belief is not so general among the Yao as among other tribes, in my opinion. An animal which is so possessed is called liyuka, from ku-yuka, "to be transformed."

[774] Apart from this habitation of inanimate objects above mentioned by mzimu, there is nothing that points to a belief in Animism among the Yao, so far as I know. Neither hills, rocks, streams, lakes, nor trees have their own spirits, nor are they endowed by the native mind with life.

Deceased persons appear to the living in dreams, the native apparently believing that the deceased appears in his material body.

775 787 791 They believe also in revelation of wishes of the deceased through the medium of the living. The spirit of the deceased is supposed to enter into the medium. The medium, I am informed, is always a woman, never a man. From the descriptions of some of these revelation séances, there can be no doubt that they are manifestations of la grande hystérie. The medium works herself up into a frenzy of excitement and in her delirium gives out the name of the deceased, the voice which speaks being that of the spirit within her. She rolls on the ground and foams at the mouth, uttering the word of revelation which is generally to the effect that some deceased chief's spirit is feeling aggrieved at the neglect of his tomb; the voice may go on to say that certain practices are forbidden, or demand that certain rites be observed by the people. The spirits which possess her are generally spoken of as msasha, a word which, though sometimes used as equivalent to mzimu, usually seems to [158] have rather a sinister significance. Insane persons are called msasha and are thought to be possessed by a spirit, and vapor baths with exorcism may be practiced for their cure. In the case of the death of anyone who is possessed, in answer to my interrogation, I have [761] been told that both the spirit which has entered into the man and his own mzimu leave his body.

[1] Op. cit., vol. I, p. 70.

622 are composed of the descendants of slave-wives of village headmen in days past. Like the village
643 headmen the chief was considered to be in danger from contact with death. He could not attend 622 the funeral of commoners, he could not eat the 761 chicken which was brought to him at the announcement of the death of a commoner (for a village [753] headmen) or subject (of a chief). Should he do so he would suffer from a disease called ndaka. Also village headmen, like the chief were supposed to be well versed in medicine and were regarded with some awe on this account. The chief and the village headmen were distinguished from the commoners in these ways.

643 But, the chief himself was a village headman. He had to administer the affairs of his family 622 group and slaves as had other village headmen.
692 He was involved in the struggle for power going on around him because he was not lifted above these secular struggles as was, for example, the Zulu King.[1] Duff MacDonald records for example: "In a dispute between the inhabitants of different villages, the respective headmen represent their own subjects, and the chief is appealed to. All his decisions are final. Still the chief may otherwise have less influence than a powerful headman, and we have known cases where he simply contented himself with grumbling when his headman acted contrary to his desire; and in many criminal trials he is eclipsed by the sorcerers and pounders of poison."[2]

643 Again MacDonald records how the chief tried 622 to entice subjects away from a village headman at a trial by pointing out that the village headman had a poor character and was unsuitable to look after people.[3] While there seems to have been some evidence that a number of village headmen under a chief acted jointly in the face of a common danger, but apparently with no powerful military organization. Village headmen seem to have been almost entirely autonomous in their actions, slave-raiding on their own, even raiding villages who paid tribute to the same chief as they did.

3:Stanna D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 F77 Yao F77

845 one of Malunga's men died, after giving birth to quintuplets, some thirty years ago. Deformed children are buried alive. A large number of children is always hoped for and where polygamy is practised, some families are of considerable size, although the mortality [165] among young children is very high. It is, of course, very difficult to state the child-bearing period among natives. It does not start so early as is commonly supposed, and I think the menopause is found within about the same limits as among Europeans.

Death. Natives of Nyasaland live to a good old age. That such is not the case I have 761 found to be one of the many fallacious beliefs concerning natives which should be relegated 165 to the realm of exploded theories, as I have pointed out elsewhere.[1]

Death in old age is recognised as a natural event but apart from this, all sickness and [154] death were formerly and are still to a large extent looked upon as the result of the machinations of some person, an idea which forms the outstanding feature in their belief in witchcraft, sasai.[2]

Here I shall mention the ordinary customs in the case of death. During the last hours 763 of a mortal illness, a man is tended by his wife or wives; the head wife sits constantly supporting his head on her lap or against her breast. A woman is similarly tended by her mother, sisters, and friends. As unconsciousness sets in and the extremities become cold, they say, "His spirit has gone and only the heart remains alive."

The native does not like the idea of lingering on and a man on his death-bed will say to his sons, "Now watch me that I die quickly." He may take medicine to help him over that time or he may give his sons instructions as to what to do. Should a man linger unconscious for a long time, friends will ask his sons, "Did he give you any instructions?" If he has done so, the sons will then carry them out. This perhaps consists of bathing themselves in medicines left by their father, while they stand on the roof of his house. Sometimes, the natives say of a lingering case, "Ah, perhaps he has eaten of a tortoise's heart!" [825] knowing the phenomenon of the tortoise's heart and believing that by partaking of it, the same property can be conferred on the heart of a man.

764 When death is manifest, the body is covered with a cloth by a brother, a son, or some other person in attendance. The eyes are closed, the mouth shut, and at the present time, [197] the body straightened out. This, however, is a recent practice copied from the Anyanja, Europeans, and Mohammedans.

764 News of the death must be sent to the chief, and a messenger goes to his village where the chief and his people sit in the village open space. He carries a fowl in his hand. The 203 present of a single fowl always denotes bad tidings. One of the chief's men, seeing the stranger approach with the single fowl, will jump up and take the bird. He is joined by the others and they go away to the cross-roads where they kill the fowl, pluck it, cook it and eat it. In the meantime, the messenger delivers his news to the chief who will produce from his house about eight yards of white calico; if the deceased has been a much respected cipate yearly in the great initiation festival for boys and girls. Consequently as they 881 repeat each year the lessons of their own initiation, the ceremonies are the main 852 vehicle of Yao culture.[1]

[1] Hugh S. Stanton, "The life-span of negroes", (Lancet, April 11, 1914, p. 1052). [2] Vide infra, p. 266.

There are also two Moslem ceremonies:

(1) Jandu, the boys' Moslem baptism, which takes about seven days, and is usually 881 worked in with hupanda: 852

(2) Nsondo, the girls' Moslem baptism, which is the same as jandu, 177
but usually quite separate from ciputu. It is important that the wife of a Moslem should have her nsondo so that she knows how to prepare the food properly at Ramadan.

Menstrual and Other Taboos

Menstruation is held to be dangerous. A special mat is used by the woman during 841 this time, and is rolled up and kept during the rest of the cycle. The hut is completely replastered after menstruation. Intercourse during menses leads to disease of the man. 834
Sexual contact is dangerous to persons at certain other periods: during initiation ceremonies, during mourning, and for babies who have not been through the protective rite. The danger is thought to lie in ndaka, a dread disease characterized by swelling. This may be transmitted by salt in the food. Deaths are often attributed to 'salt'. Much of the significance of the mourning is that medicines are prepared which protect the mourners against the dangers attendant on sexual activity.

Burial Rites

764
News of a death must be sent to the chief by a messenger carrying a single fowl.
The chief gives a present of calico for wrapping the body, and a goat for the burial [203] men. These are called awilo, neighbours unrelated to the dead, who volunteer for [431] certain duties. They prepare the body for burial and carry it in procession to the graveyard outside the village. No uninitiated person is allowed to see the funeral. All who attend the burial are prohibited from sexual intercourse for one month. After this time the prohibition is lifted by a ceremony of beer drinking and feasting, and on the following day all fires in the village are extinguished, and then relit, and the mourners are shaved. A year later beer is brewed for a final ceremony.

For a period after her husband's death a widow is unclean, and has to be purified 768 by ritual intercourse with a man who is paid. The widow is not allowed to remarry 589 for two or three years. A widower leaves his wife's village, after receiving a parting gift. The widows of ordinary persons are not inherited. If a man has himself a 'name' [587] (rank and social position), he has an heir, who inherits also the wives of his predecessor. But if the heir (the maternal nephew) has married a cross-cousin (mother's brother's daughter) he would not consider the wife's mother as his inherited wife.

Before the burial the dead man's hut used to be destroyed, together with his pos- 764 sessions. Immediately afterwards a consultation is held as to whether retaliatory action against sorcerers is called for. The awilo's duties include not only the conduct- 767 ing of the burial, but also the subsequent inquiry and the conduct of the second ceremony, the beer drinking, at which they shave the mourners. A man who has

[1] Main sources for girls' initiation: Heckel, 1935, p. 19; Stannus, 1, 1910, pp. 184–7; 4, 1922, pp. 269–74; Stannus and Duvey, 1913; Duff, 1903, pp. 312–15; Abdullah, 1919, pp. 16–17; Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, pp. 129–30; Werner, 1906, pp. 126–7; Johnston, 1897, p. 410.

1: Tew E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

764 performed these services used to enter a special relationship of privileged familiarity with
767 the village of the dead. This has died out in Nyasaland, but accounts of Utasi[1] among the Yao at Masasi and Songea suggest that something of the kind is still practised.

766 Chiefs and headmen are not buried outside the village, as are other persons. They used to be buried before their own huts, but now in the centre of the village. Shrines were raised over their graves, at which offerings of beer and flour were made. If the village was moved the pot of beer sunk into the ground at the chief's grave was also removed and reinstated at the new site. A dead slave was buried by his fellow slaves; normal rights of sepulture were denied to suicides and to persons who had died in taking the poison ordeal (that is, convicted sorcerers).[2]

OTHER DISTINCTIVE CULTURAL FEATURES

301 The Yao have a tribal mark of two short cuts on each side of the face between the 304 eye and the ear.[3] Their women did not wear the pelele, lip-ring, although their neighbours the Makua and Makonde did;[4] the fashion seems to have spread to south Nyasa
[171] in the 1880's, as many travellers commented on it, without distinguishing whether the wearers were Yao, Nyanja, or Lomwe.[5] The women used to pierce the left ala nasi and insert a metal or lead stud, cipini.[6]

MAKUA-LOMWE

TRIBAL AND SUB-TRIBAL GROUPINGS AND DEMOGRAPHY

000 NOMENCLATURE

The Ma- in Makua is not a prefix, but part of the name, Variant spellings are Makwa, Mahoa, Mahoane. They are sometimes referred to by the name of one subdivision, the Medo Makua, and called Ameto or Meto.[7]

The Lomwe (also spelt Lomwei) are called Alolo by the Yao, and are also frequently called Anguru (Nguru) which is an old name for the people of the region.[8] Any of the Makua-Lomwe peoples who have migrated into south Nyasaland are collectively termed Nguru in official reports; Nguru is a hill in the region of Portuguese East Africa, whence they come, but they should not be confused with the Nguru of Tanganyika.[9] Another name for them is Acilowe.[10] Alolo is incorrectly applied to all the Lomwe; it has a stricter application to the Cuabo from Quilimano.

[1] Scrivenor, 1937; Moreau, 1941; Spies, 1943.
[2] Main sources for burial are: Johnson, 3, 1922, pp. 28–30; Stannus, 4, 1922, pp. 240–6; Abdullah, 1919, pp. 19–21; Duff, 1903, pp. 322–4; Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, pp. 110–12.
[3] Murray, 1932, p. 153.
[4] Thompson, 1882, pp. 77–8, writing of the Yao of the Ruvuma valley.
[5] Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, pp. 16–17; 'around Blantyre hardly any woman is without it'.
[6] Stannus, 1, 1910, p. 316.
[7] Handbook of Portuguese Nyasaland, 1921, p. 39; Murray, 1922, p. 56; Weule, 1, 1909, p. 259; Livingstone, 1874, p. 32.
[8] Theal, 1899, pp. 415–17; Gaspar Bocarro passed through Manguro country. Burton, 1873 (Lacerda's Journey, 1798), mentions Manguros.
[9] Abraham, 1931, p. 15; Murray, 1922, p. 46.
[10] Johnson, W. P., 4, 1894.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

The chief identifies a man who comes to see him in exactly the same way, and the Administration has adopted a similar system, except that it has its own definition of the village. During the initiation ceremonies, the initiands[1] are housed in long grass sheds which are subdivided into sections. Each section or room of the long shed houses the boys or girls from one village. If villages share a burial ground, they have allotted portions where they bury their dead separately. In these and many other ways the village is looked upon by the Yao as a distinct unit in the chiefdom.

The chiefdom in the old days was distinctly a territorial unit and all the villages within that area recognized the superiority of the chief. The boundaries of the old chiefdoms were marked by rivers and hills and fixed after conquest and agreement. They are still well remembered. Modern chiefdoms are defined in their limits partly by Government decree and partly by custom. When Principal Headmen were appointed, the districts under them were demarcated with 'due regard being given to the composition of the Native population'. The traditional areas under the various chiefs, therefore, were recognized by the Administration as districts, so that the districts or their sections almost coincided with the chiefdoms. Some disputes between chiefs over boundaries have occurred from time to time and the Administration has had to arbitrate. For example, the Provincial Commissioner of the Southern Province reported a difference between Liwonde and Kawinga in 1936,[2] but through time these differences have been eliminated.

Traditional and Administrative boundaries do not coincide in a few places, for two reasons. Firstly, the Administration has accepted an obvious and physical boundary in preference to an indistinct and social boundary. It has taken the Domasi River as the boundary between Ntumanje and Mposa, though in fact a few villages under Mbela, Kawinga III's son, live on the south side of the river, and fall for Administrative purposes in Ntumanje's area. Mbela is still very strongly associated with Kawinga in ritual and kinship matters. His dealings with the strike out with his adherents to found a new village. A sum of £6 or £7 is a considerable amount in everyday Yao life where the annual cash income of the average individual is not much more. The leader of a dissident group is prepared to forgo this wealth to get one foot on to the lowest rung of the political ladder—that is by becoming a village headman. 621 166 627

[1] I am grateful to Prof. Schapera for suggesting this word for those who are undergoing initiation ceremonies. The parallel is with graduands, i.e. those who are undergoing graduation ceremonies.

[2] Report of the Provincial Commissioner, Southern Province (1936), 20.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

Obversely there is a great deal of sentiment attached to the idea of a united village. To the Yao way of thinking a village is broken by fighting or death, and these evils are linked by witchcraft beliefs. The association of death and the break-up of the village is brought out clearly by the funeral ablutions of villagers after the burial of one of their number. An important ingredient in the medicine with which the mourners wash themselves after the funeral, is cikula. It is the earth from a particular type of termitary which is usually about 12 to 18 inches high, upright and almost cylindrical. The crust is very brittle and it is comparatively easy to chip off a piece. When this is done a mass of internal chambers and passages is revealed. The soldier ants, unlike those of other species that retreat into the darkness of their passages as soon as they are exposed, come into the open daylight and swarm in confusion over the fractured termitary. When I questioned my informant about cikula, he kicked the crust off the top of one of the hills and said, 'See all the houses in the village of the ants? I have broken their village. So it is with death. It breaks the village.' 621 764 783 825

The Yao believe that death 'breaks the village' and that conflicts through sorcery lead to death. Therefore, conflicts are the real cause of village splits. Hence differences must be settled immediately if the village is to persist, because if they last too long one of the aggrieved parties is sure to start using sorcery against its opponents. Those who do move away, go to a distant place because they believe that sorcery operates only where there is social interaction. But the fear of sorcery on the other hand is just as strong a force in maintaining the physical unity of the village. It is while the migration is being planned that sorcery is most likely to be used. This is particularly so if the village break is taking the form of a lineage split. This happened, for example, in Lupunje village. 621 754 626

Kalambo, the sister's son of Lupunje, wanted to leave the village and had gone to seek a suitable site. When he returned he found that 621 626 753

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

621 his mother was ill and had gone with Lupunje's younger brother to 626 the diviner to find out the cause of the illness. The diviner indicated
753 that Lupunje thought that Kalambo was not showing him the proper respect. Lupunje knew that his sisters had lost their value in the lineage since they had stopped bearing children, whereas Kalambo's sisters were still reproducing. His malice had caused the woman's illness. When Kalambo got home he asked his mother's brother to blow water out of his mouth [1] and help him to prepare some medicine for the sick woman. This Lupunje did and the woman recovered immediately.

Shortly afterwards Kalambo remonstrated with his mother's brother for causing the illness of his sister, but Lupunje said that he had no control over it: the spirits had brought it on her. Kalambo knew that he could do nothing and abandoned the idea of building his own village. He knew that there was bound to be more illness if he carried on with his plan.

182 Clearly the belief in the mystical powers of the ancestors or of
621 sorcery is a force which prevents sections from breaking away
626 from the village. A break follows only when opposition within the village has reached sufficient pitch to force one of the sections to take the risk of illness, rather than to continue living in the village. Sometimes the dissident group comes back because further deaths at their new village site convince them that their action was wrong.[2]

Effects of the Headman's Personality

622 Whether a village maintains its unity or not, depends very largely on the personality of the headman. This is why the officiating headmen and others at the installation ceremonies are so insistent that cases should be settled quickly. The main duty of a headman is to maintain harmonious relationships within his village and to see to the welfare of its members. All severe
[787] illnesses are immediately reported to him, and so are the results of all divinations. He usually sends his representative to divina-
[764] tions concerning kinsmen not related to him matrilineally. He is immediately notified of all deaths and he organizes the funeral rites. Squabbles are brought to him for arbitration and even 622 where squabbles are settled by kinsmen in the village, usually the 692 headman is formally told of them. Frequently marriage diffi-

[1] An act which recants malice. See Chap. VI, p. 139.
[2] See the case history in Chap. VI, p. 153.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

562 601 'sisters' and 'mothers' because alternate generations are merged in kinship terminology and in behaviour. A man's sister's daughter, for example, is called 'mother', and her daughter (his granddaughter) in turn becomes 'sister'. A woman calls her male matrilineal descendants 'children' (mwanangu), or 'grandchildren' (yisikulu); her matrilineal male progenitors 'mother's brother' (akwelume), or 'brother' (alumbwangu).[1] By extension, therefore, another way of expressing common matrilineal descent is to say that two people are the children of one person, ŵanakajumo, even though that person may be their great-grandmother. A term which is almost synonymous with this is mucitumbu cimo, 'in one womb', used as 'we were conceived in one womb', though once again the reference may be to a common grandmother. But the inclusiveness of these terms varies in different contexts. Any may refer to the matrilineage of maximal span within the village, or to a section of the matrilineage seen as a segmented organization of parts. It is only by reference to the particular ancestress that the range of the term may be determined.

The Unity of the Matrilineage

613 A person identifies himself most closely with the members of his matrilineage from whom he expects most help and whom he, in turn, is expected to help. If he is called upon to pay a heavy fine it will be the members of his own matrilineage who will club together to find sufficient money. They, more than others, [753] support him in his quarrels. They come to his aid when he is ill or injured, by consulting the diviner and trying to find the sorcerer who is causing his illness, and by finding medicines which will bring him back to good health. They send him money if he has left the country and needs it to return. The goods he brings home from the labour centres will be shared mostly [764] among his matrilineal relatives. They will find the food to be used at his funeral and also see that his burial is properly carried [428] out. He owes these duties in turn to them. His property will stay almost entirely within the matrilineage after his death.

613 753 Relationship, unless qualified, is looked upon as being entirely matrilineal. This is well illustrated by the beliefs about the

[1] She more commonly addresses them as acimweni. See p. 147.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

613 578 754 Kausi (F3), Bt. Madi (F10), Bt. Aliya (F11) and their children moved across the stream and built with Cikoja. One of Cikoja's wives stayed in the old village and the other moved across. Shortly after this Asimama (E6), Cikoja's sister, decided that she would like to move across to be with the headman. She reported to Kanyenga who sent her to tell Cikoja. Cikoja in turn sent her to tell Amidu. Eventually, Cikoja, Amidu, Kanyenga and Salimu (D3) had a meeting about it. Neither Amidu nor Kanyenga, nor Salimu, was enthusiastic, but they said she should follow her own wishes. She moved across with her children. Asimama's arrival on the other side of the stream was greeted with some suspicion by Cilimba because she was a member of the junior lineage. However, Cikoja assured him that he wanted one of Asimama's daughters to fetch water for him. Cilimba was satisfied with this explanation and accepted the situation as it was.

It was not easy, however, and there were continual quarrels between the children of Bt. Ntalika and those of Asimama. The members of the junior segment in the old village also looked upon this arrangement with some suspicion. The friendship of Amege (F28), Asimama's daughter, with Asubiya (E9), her mother's younger sister was particularly deprecated by the members of the junior segment. Asubiya was warned several times that this friendship could only lead to sorcery.[1]

In the meantime, Salimu (D3), who will be the next Cikoja and who was the senior lineage member in the old village site, undertook most of the duties of the headman in that section. He settled most of the minor cases and saw to the divining. However, he reported his doings to Cikoja who was still the village headman.

In 1948, another death took place and the tension became evident again. Bt. Ntalika's child died. Kausi (F3) and Jauma (F7) went to the diviner, who revealed that Amege had gone to Salimu to grumble about what was going on in the other village, and Salimu had taken this opportunity of bewitching the child. Cikoja refused to accept this explanation and said that the diviner was a liar. When the body was being washed, a knife was found under the mat on which it was lying, and the story went around that a piece of flesh was taken out of the dead child's buttock.[2] Cikoja interpreted this as meaning that Bt. Ntalika herself had bewitched the child. He felt it unnecessary to call a funeral meeting. Shortly after this there was some friction between Amisa and her younger sister Asubiya, arising out of jealousy because of the difference in their harvests. Bt. Amisa was convinced

[1] This is based on the fear of backbiting. See p. 138.

[764] [2] Once a person is dead the matrilineal relatives do not touch him. They leave the hut and the undertakers (aŵilo) wash the body and prepare it for burial. They reported this finding to Cikoja.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

845 one of Malungu's men died, after giving birth to quintuplets, some thirty years ago. Deformed children are buried alive. A large number of children is always hoped for and where [165] polygamy is practiced, some families are of considerable size, although the mortality among young children is very high. It is, of course, very difficult to state the child-bearing period among natives. It does not start so early as is commonly supposed, and I think the menopause is found within about the same limits as among Europeans.

Death. Natives of Nyasaland live to a good old age. That such is not the case I have 761 found to be one of the many fallacious beliefs concerning natives which should be relegated
165 to the realm of exploded theories, as I have pointed out elsewhere.[1]

Death in old age is recognized as a natural event but apart from this, all sickness and
[754] death were formerly and are still to a large extent looked upon as the result of the machinations of some person, an idea which forms the outstanding feature in their belief in witchcraft, usewi.[2]

763 Here I shall mention the ordinary customs in the case of death. During the last hours of a mortal illness, a man is tended by his wife or wives; the head wife sits constantly supporting his head on her lap or against her breast. A woman is similarly tended by her mother, sisters, and friends. As unconsciousness sets in and the extremities become cold, they say, "His spirit has gone and only the heart remains alive."

The native does not like the idea of lingering on and a man on his death-bed will say to his sons, "Now watch me that I die quickly." He may take medicine to help him over that time or he may give his sons instructions as to what to do. Should a man linger unconscious for a long time, friends will ask his sons, "Did he give you any instructions?" If he has done so, the sons will then carry them out. This perhaps consists of bathing themselves in medicines left by their father, while they stand on the roof of his house. Some-[825] times, the natives say of a lingering case, "Ah, perhaps he has eaten of a tortoise's heart!" knowing the phenomenon of the tortoise's heart and believing that by partaking of it, the same property can be conferred on the heart of a man.

●764 When death is manifest, the body is covered with a cloth by a brother, a son, or some other person in attendance. The eyes are closed, the mouth shut, and at the present time, [197] the body straightened out. This, however, is a recent practice copied from the Anyanja, Europeans, and Mohammedans.

764 News of the death must be sent to the chief, and a messenger goes to his village where the chief and his people sit in the village open space. He carries a fowl in his hand. The 203 present of a single fowl always denotes bad tidings. One of the chief's men, seeing the stranger approach with the single fowl, will jump up and take the bird. He is joined by the others and they go away to the cross-roads where they kill the fowl, pluck it, cook it and eat it. In the meantime, the messenger delivers his news to the chief who will produce from his house about eight yards of white calico; if the deceased has been a much respected

[1] Hugh S. Stannus, 'The life-span of negroes', (Lancet, April 11, 1914, p. 1063). [2] Vide infra, p. 288.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

 764

person, he may also give a goat. The calico is to wrap up the body of the dead, the goat is for the undertakers, awile.[1] 203

Until eight or ten years ago, the Wayao buried their dead in a posture of complete flexion. The preparation of the body after death is carried out by friends from a neighboring village who volunteer for the service. They are known as awile, (sing. mbile). Macdonald[2] thinks the word originally meant relatives; it has essentially the opposite meaning now. The corpse is washed in ordinary water and no anointment is made. The limbs, formerly, were then flexed on the body and at all the joints. The clenched hands were placed under the chin of the bent head or the hands were spread over the face of the flexed head, while the legs were tightly bent at the knees and brought up close against the abdomen. The corpse was securely bound in this position and adorned with a loin-cloth of bark. The body of a man found stiff and extended was a source of great trouble. Water was heated, and the body bathed until it was as relaxed as possible. As much force would then be applied as was necessary to gain the required degree of flexion, the bones often being broken in the process. 764 [767]

In the case of a woman, her female friends put on her bark-cloth loin covering, but the washing and trussing up of the body were usually done by men unless there were some women particularly skilled in the operation. [767]

The flexed body was then set up on the deceased's sleeping mat within the hut, and from time to time, so long as it remained exposed, it was washed, people coming from other villages to offer their services for this task. Watchers sat continually by the body, the wife and perhaps a brother on either side, while others slept in the hut to take their turn later. The rest of the mourners sat on the veranda about the door.

As soon as the awile had finished their work, wailing began, started by the wife and carried on by all the women of the village and the women relatives from elsewhere. Wailing continued all day until about ten in the evening, and then started again between two and three in the morning. This went on for three or four days or was intermittent for a longer time, always recommencing with the arrival of a party from another village. I have never heard of flour being put on the heads by Yao mourners, as mentioned in Africana.[3] 765

News of a death was always sent to all the relatives, and burial might be delayed to allow for the arrival of those from a distance. Under such circumstances, the body was enclosed in a casing of bark, the ends being closed by bamboo pegs. Exaggerated signs of grief were sometimes made by the mourners who beat their breasts with their hands while they knocked their heads against the ground or a wall, but the Yao did not indulge in the excesses of the Anyanja near Lake Chilwa who practiced a kind of flagellation, the wailers within the house meeting any new-comers at the door and beating them with sticks. This treatment was not resented. Women alone did the wailing; a man indulging in such expression would be laughed at. His part in the old days when the natives possessed firearms was [764]

[1] Vide infra, p. 244. [2] Op. cit., vol. 1, p. 108. [3] Ibid.

765 to fire off his gun as long as his powder lasted. During the period of mourning, drumming [534] went on continuously, chindimba being played on the three small drums called ichoma.

With the exception of the flexed attitude of the body, the foregoing description is a correct account of what happens today. The body is now fully extended.

The ausile are two or four in number, although other friends may assist in all their ser-767 vices. On about the third day, the ausile sew up the body in bark cloth, completely envelop-
764 ing it; a bamboo needle is used and left sticking in the cloth at the last stitch. The body is then enclosed in a mat slung on a pole, and carried from the hut to the grave. First, the procession makes a round of the village, passing by all the houses which the dead man used to visit, and over all the paths he used to cross. His children and those of his relatives under seven or eight years old gather in the village, and throw pieces of charcoal toward the body as it passes, "so that they shall forget the dead man," or run after the corpse, while some one sprinkles medicine over them.

As the procession leaves the village, it is headed by the drums playing chindimba, but 764 after a few hundred yards, only the ching'anga drum, now called chitanda, beats time for a
[534] short distance; the procession then goes on quietly. Following the drums, walks the mother or another relative carrying flour with which the grave will be marked out. Behind this mourner, the body is borne by the ausile. The ausile are always the first to carry the body, but are later relieved by other friends of the deceased; no one would ever ask to be relieved.
[114] After the chief mourner, follow the other relatives and friends, the men first, the women behind. Boys just back from their unyago attend to learn the customs. All the relatives of the deceased go to the burial, contrary to Macdonald's account.[1]

In this order, the procession reaches some tree thirty or forty yards from the place of burial where the corpse is put down in the shade, mtula, "resting place", and while the women and part of the men watch beside it, the ausile proceed to the burial place. They cut branches from a sacred tree, and strew them on the path. On approaching the appointed spot, they clap their hands in salutation, asking that the burial ground be opened to them.

The head mbile chooses the site where the grave shall be dug, after which the mourner marks out the limits with the flour she has brought. In the days when the body was buried in contracted posture, a circular grave was dug just big enough to allow two men to work in it. Eight feet was the usual depth but this was decided by the deceased's nyanse, if he were living, otherwise, by his near relatives. In the east side of this circular well, a cave was excavated, just large enough to admit the contracted corpse. When all was prepared, the body accompanied by all the mourners, was brought from mtula to the graveside. The chief mbile with a friend of the man's family and one of his wife's, standing in the grave received the body and placed it in the cave, resting on a mat and covered with bark cloth. The body lay on its side with its back toward the well, and its face looking toward the east. After adjusting the body in its place, the mbile would tear open the shroud over the ear, and pour on to the pinna some powdered beads to be used by the dead man as money in the hereafter. Except in the case of chiefs, no objects were buried with the dead, contrary to Macdonald's description [1] of the Amangoche. The pole on which the body had been carried to the grave was broken into bits and together with any stick that had been used to measure the body for the cave, was placed in the grave. The opening into the chamber was then closed by a mat fastened over it by pegs and supported by pieces of wood. The mbile clambering out of the well, pushed the first earth backward into the grave with their elbows, after which the rest of the earth was shovelled in quickly, and a heap made at the surface. The ground about this mound was swept clean with a bunch of leaves by some one walking backward so that no footprints were left; the bunch of leaves was thrown on top of the mound. No medicine was put in the grave, nor were the household utensils placed on the mound, as Macdonald states concerning the Amangoche.[2]

[1] Op. cit., vol. I, p. 106.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

For some years past, the type of grave made among the Yao has resembled that of the Anyanja,[3] a long pit with a chamber scooped out along the whole length of one side. In this, the corpse is placed in a fully extended position so that it lies on its back with the feet toward the east. With this exception, the account given above holds good for the present day. The method of suspending the corpse in a mat slung on forked sticks within the grave, mentioned in Africana,[4] is not found among the Amachinga Yao.

On the way back to the village, two mbile lead, followed by the men, the women, and lastly, by the other mbile. First, all wash, the men upstream, the women downstream; no one may wash another's back. The hoes used in digging the grave are also washed; hoes are never washed on any other occasion.

During the funeral, some responsible old man is left in charge of the village with several younger men to assist him. Just before the return of the funeral party is expected, the old man sends one of the younger men to set medicine at the side of the path along which the mourners will pass. This medicine is made from the bark of the mpingo tree and is used for purification; it is placed in a sherd. Each person as he arrives at the spot squats down, dips the little finger of each hand into the medicine, and passes the fingers between the little toe and the third toe of the corresponding foot. The last comer throws any remaining medicine into the bush. As they near the village, a gun is fired and wailing is resumed for a few minutes, after which it ceases altogether. The old man who has been left in charge of the village always inquires whether all has gone well at the interment.

That evening, the time is passed in singing chindimba.[5] All those who attended the burial, sleep in the village, and if the deceased's relatives can afford to provide the necessary food, all remain in the village for a number of days equal to the period which elapsed between death and burial. Sometimes, when burial was long delayed, the mourning party

[1] Op. cit., vol. I, p. 107.
[2] Ibid.
[3] Stannus, 'Notes on natives of British Central Africa,' op. cit., p. 313.
[4] Macdonald, op. cit., p. 106.
[5] Vide infra, p. 267, 270.

3: Stamnus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

then listens to an account of the circumstances attending the illness and death. The point 768 at issue is whether there is any evidence pointing to death from unnatural causes which 6a2 requires consulting a diviner. The chief practically always agrees with the relatives, and it is said that he will never press them to go to the uschisango unnecessarily. The case may end with this conference, or here may begin the long series of events described under usuwi.[1]

During the month subsequent to the funeral, certain taboos have to be observed. The 765 widow may not bathe, and with the exception of the uwile, all who attended must refrain 768 from sexual intercourse. At the expiration of this period, beer is brewed in the village, and all the friends and relatives are again summoned. This beer-drinking is called "the beer of rottenness," or "the beer of resignation." In addition to the beer, food is provided, and everyone helps himself without ceremony. Chindimba is sung and danced and at the present day, bands of trained dancers attend, including ching'wenyeng' wenye.[2] A pot of beer is sunk into the ground, marking the site of the dead man's house. The night of matapata[3] [833] sees husbands and wives reunited, and the widow may go through ceremonial intercourse with a man appointed for the purpose called lituwu or mbile. Sometimes the widow refuses lituwu, and is given medicine instead to cleanse her; her body is then no longer "hot" and likely to bring disease to those about her. A widow does not marry again for two or three 587 years. A young man who loses his wife has no longer any standing in her village after 768 matapata. He is usually given a present, with the suggestion that he go elsewhere. After the death of an infant, the mother is considered unclean. She sleeps on a mat apart from her husband till after the ceremony of shaving, and then undergoes a ceremonial coitus with her husband — in which case he is called lituwu — after which, ordinary cohabitation is resumed. If she has been a widow, or if the child was born "with disease,"[4] another man acts as lituwu.

The morning following matapata, all the fires in the village are extinguished. A fresh 769 blaze is then kindled with the fire-drill, lumangu, either in the chief's house or in some spot [372] nearby, and from there, fire is carried to all the houses. The ashes of the old fires, the stones supporting the cooking pots, and the porridge sticks are taken to the cross-roads, and there destroyed. Everyone then shaves all his own hair, head, axillae, and pubis. [302]
The custom of the second shaving by the uwile, described in Africana,[5] is, I think, an adaptation from the Anyanja. A year later, beer is again brewed, and all the relatives summoned to the village to partake of it. There is dancing, but no ceremony.

The Yao bury their dead in regular graveyards in wooded country, the thicker the 764 forest, the better, often two or three miles away from a group of villages. Different villages bury their dead in different parts of the burial ground; relatives are usually buried near one another. Graves are never revisited, and no one would enter a graveyard except at the 769 time of a funeral, and then only after obtaining permission from the chief. Such spots are

[1] Vide infra, p. 286.
[2] Vide infra, p. 279 and Pl. I.
[3] Beer-drinking.
[4] Vide infra, p. 286.
[5] Macdonald, op. cit., p. 111.

7: Hetherwick M-5 (ca. 1900) 1902 FT7 Yao FT7

775 present fortunes. But it is to the human soul after death, when it is considered as having an influence on the lives and fortunes of those it has left behind in the world and consequently as a power to be propitiated and honoured, that the term malungu is more strictly applied. Freed from the body it passes to malungu, and there is regarded as endowed with powers which it never possessed when alive on 769 earth. To pray to such a spirit is described as kulomba malungu, to worship malungu, never kimba in this case. Such malungu worship enters largely into Yao religious or social life. In almost every Yao village there will be found a shrine which is the centre of the worship of the inhabitants. It consists of a carefully 346 built hut enclosed within a strong grass fence or hedge of a species of cactus plant.
769 The hut itself is built of the usual native materials—the walls of wooden posts,
778 bamboos, and strong reed grass bound together with bark-rope and plastered over with clay or stiff mud. The roof is of grass laid on a framework of bamboos, and is generally covered with long strips of white or coloured calico. On the ridge or apex of the roof are fixed a couple of flags or an umbrella or two. One wall is usually left open so that the interior is easily seen. Within, from the bamboo rafters are suspended handkerchiefs, cloths, bunches of beads, etc., all offerings to the malungu of the dead headman or chief from his friends and relatives. The floor is of clay carefully smeared with sand in native fashion. A raised platform or mound of earth in the centre marks the spot where the grave was made. The 764 awile or officials who preside at the funeral obsequies, first dug for about 8 or 10 feet down in a perpendicular direction, and then on the western side of this well they hollowed out a shallow cave in the earth. In this the body was placed, laid on its side with the knees bent up under the chin, and the face turned towards the east. Various articles of personal property were next placed beside the corpse, clothes, ivory, guns, axes, hoes, etc., and the mouth of the cave closed up with wooden posts and a strong reed mat. The grave was then filled in and the surface
[768] carefully finished as we have seen. At the head of the mound a native pot was fixed in the ground for the reception of the offering of beer which is an almost invariable accompaniment of any act of worship paid to the malungu of the dead.

769 Such a shrine marks the grave of almost every Yao chief or headman, and is [775 regarded as the abode of his soul or the spot where his malungu is most accessible.
622] If his successor is about to undertake a long journey or enter on any warlike expedition against an enemy or neighbour, he must first kutopa mbepesi, place an offering here to secure the favour and assistance of the malungu of the dead. Should a long-continued drought endanger the prospects of the grain crop, the departed chief must be solicited to send the lacking rain. A feast is first prepared, almost always of beer, sometimes with the addition of native porridge, fowl, or game. The worshippers gather round the shrine bringing part of the food which they have prepared. Their priest for the occasion is the successor of the dead chief, sometimes one or other of the awile who placed the body in the grave, or it may be that any other near relation of the dead man is chosen to represent the people and act
[602] as their spokesman. The nearer the relationship the more influence will he have with the dead.

7: Hetherwick M-5 (ca. 1900) 1902 FT7 Yao FT7

with the dead. He approaches the shrine, opens the gate of the fence, takes a pot'ul of beer and pours it into the pot at the head of the grave. Next he places the basket of porridge and the plate of meat on the mound beside it and retires. Kneeling down outside the gate facing the shrine and a few yards in front of the people he chants his prayer in a monotone, each petition commencing with "Chonde, chonde," "Please, please." All the while the people clap their hands in unison with him and sing the responses as they do in a native case in the chief's court. 769

When the offering has been made at the grave, the rest of the beer or other food is consumed by the worshippers. Guns are fired as a token of respect to the dead, and the rest of the day is spent in dancing. [635]

Such shrines are to be seen in almost every Yao village where the inhabitants have been located for any length of time. They are regarded with awe—the little boys as they pass whisper to each other in a warning tone, "mawka." Should the village be moved to any other district, the old shrine is not forgotten. Periodical visits are made to it with the usual offerings. In cases where the old home has been occupied by a people hostile to the old inhabitants, such visits are usually made during the night, and the people awake in the morning to find that the old chief's grave in their midst has been newly repaired, and a fresh offering of food placed at its head. 778 769

Sometimes such shrines are found on the summits of hills which once may have been a refuge from the enemy in time of war, but which now lie bare and deserted. Thither in their need the people make their way with their offering of food and beer, and their prayer for rain or suitable weather for the crops. Near Blantyre such shrines are to be seen on the tops of Mount Sochi and Mount Michiru. The former is the abode of the spirit of Kankhonde, and the latter of Mpulale, both old Maravi or Mang'anja chiefs who doubtless fled there seeking safety from the war of the invading Yaos, and died leaving their wonde to be the mafungo or spirit of the mountain. Some years ago, during the fear of an Angoni invasion, the Yaos of Mount Sochi fled to the hill-top for refuge, and there the old chief Kapeni died. He was buried close to the grave of the old Kankhonde, and now, when the Yaos on Sochi make an offering, it is to the spirit of Kapeni that the homage is paid, and the shrine of Kankhonde lies neglected.

Only the graves of chiefs or headmen are thus treated as shrines of worship. The burying place of slaves and the common people lies away in the thick bush, where only the rank grass or the thicket of old trees marks the spot. No offerings are ever taken there, for such as are buried there can have no influence in the spirit world. The dead are buried, the broken pot or basket is left on the grave to mark the spot, and none ever seek to go there save to lay another in the same neglected ground. 554 764 769 778

II. But the word mafungo is used by the Yao with a wider application. Etymologically the word is connected with the root lufungwa, which in so many of the other branches of the Bantu tongue appears as lufu or kuru, and signifies "great" or "old." It is the same root which appears in the Kafir word for God, 776 197 192

10: Sanderson D-5 (ca. 1920)1922 FT7 Yao FT7

A Note on Ceremonial Purification among the WaYao, Nyasaland.

55

By Meredith Sanderson, M.R.C.S., F.R.G.S.

One of the effects of European influence in Africa is the breaking up of tribal organization and discipline. The rights of the individual being no longer subordinated to the common good, customs formerly observed by the village community as a whole die out, while those affecting the individual are still practised. 191

This tendency is well seen in the ancient ceremonies of purification among the WaYao which are now rarely performed collectively, though the native, however highly "educated," still goes to the doctor to obtain the necessary medicines for removing, for instance, the contamination caused by contact with a corpse. [75] [764]

These collective ceremonies have already been described by various writers in respect of both Nyasaland and elsewhere,* but the Yao rites have not, I think, been given in detail, and the following notes may not, therefore, be altogether valueless. 114

The Pyajila ceremony (kuppajila, "to sweep") is common to most Bantu tribes. In its simplest form it used to be performed annually by the WaYao, at the beginning of the twelfth month, outside of the months (lunar) being kept by means of a "calendar."‡ The whole village is thoroughly "spring-cleaned," all rubbish 796 [191] [805]

* At Sia, where the game is played on All Souls' night in the society, Father Barnabas Nyaw tells me, the song in Spanish runs:—

Yaso, yaso, quando te vengo, Yaso, yaso, hoy nada.

Yaso, yaso, where you come.
Yaso, yaso, I shall not be there any more.

Words imported, presumably, to the hidden hall.

† See Swanson, M. C., "The Sulu Archipelago," pp. 339 341, XXIII. Annual Report, Bureau American Ethnology, 1904. 000

‡ Fraser, "Golden Bough Bowdich," II., 170, 000

§ A "calendar" consists of a string tied to two pegs in the wall of the house, or between two poles, on which are threaded twelve pieces of reed, bamboo or cornstalk. One of these is moved to the other end of the string each time a new moon is seen. [211]

10: Sanderson D-5 (ca. 1920)1922 FT7 Yao FT7

The men and boys now pass through the arch in order of seniority; each splashes himself with the water in the trough, but neither speaks nor rinses the mouth. The women come next, led by the head-wife of the chief; the latter rinses her mouth and, instructed by the doctor, repeats a prayer similar to that offered by her husband. The remainder of the women merely splash themselves, like the men, before passing through the arch. All then return to the village, where the ppejile is continued. 751 796

Finally the doctor takes the hammer-head from the trough and hands it to the chief, who rubs the haft into it, and, a hoe having been placed on the ground, goes through the form of forging the latter by beating it with the hammer. He then scrapes the ground with the hoe as if clearing a piece overgrown with grass; he does not dig with it as in hoeing up the ground for planting seed. After this rite the chief again bathes in medicated water similar to that in the trough, and the ceremony is complete.

Whereas the ppejile ceremony and its adjunct, the rite of the arch, are now [178] but rarely performed, no Yao will omit the rite of purification after a death in his 751 family. This ceremony consists of two essential parts, both protective against 764 the ndoko, a disease characterized by dropsy and supposed to be contracted by 796 contact with a corpse, or by association, especially by sharing a meal, with those who 783 have been in such contact. The first of these parts is bathing in certain medicines, which protects the bather from ndoko, and the second consists of a sort of communion meal, shared by all friends and especially relatives with those who have been contaminated, and designed to protect these friends and relatives.

The decoction for bathing is made by soaking the roots of Impatiens and 751 Sanicula in water, together with the bark of mkwaru, one piece each from the 783 east and west aspects of the tree; the water assumes a reddish tint, and the whole 8251 body is bathed. 765

The communion meal consists of porridge made from any kind of flour or of [262] rice, and some squash beans. In the latter some scorched and powdered root of mtondongolelo is mixed, with a little salt. All near relatives of the deceased must partake of this meal, as well as their wives and their near relatives; part is carefully put aside for the use of any relative unable to be present at the ceremony.

Latterly, since the spread of Islam among the WaYao, this rite has become [177] confused with the distribution of food to the poor at the funeral of a Muslim, and [797] the Arabic word sadaqa ("charity") is now generally used for it, to the exclusion of its wider, correct meaning.

It may be mentioned here that after the death of a child the father is denied 765 access to his wife for a period of about three weeks, and the first act usual to one 797 of coitus interruptus.

MEREDITH SANDERSON.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

disease ndaka.[1] This disease, as we have seen, affects the sexually inactive when they are brought into contact with those who are sexually active. But the disease will only affect the members of the matrilineage of the errant person. For example, suppose a labour migrant is coming home from Southern Rhodesia and has, among other things, a few pounds of salt in his baggage for a gift to his relatives. Suppose also that while he is returning he has promiscuous intercourse. The salt becomes charged with sexual heat and if he gives it to any of his matrilineal relatives to cook with, they will contract this disease. He must therefore give the salt to members of another matrilineage, even if they live in the same village. 613 753

It is when the unity of the matrilineage is threatened, by either death or division, that its mystical value appears most clearly. When a member of the matrilineage dies the whole matrilineage is thrown into mourning and remains continent for three days. On the fourth day they perform a ritual purification and some members resume sexual relations, but the closest matrilineal relatives, such as the mother and uterine siblings, remain continent for the remainder of the mourning period, which is about 36 days. 613 765 834

It is tension within the lineage which is most closely attended by dire results. The most important reflex of this tension is accusations of sorcery. Good relationships among members of a matrilineage are adjured, mainly because friction opens the way to sorcerers. The Yao believe that sorcerers kill their matrilineal relatives so that they may share the flesh with other sorcerers. The sorcerer is fundamentally a wicked person and may kill any relative but is more likely to kill those whom he hates. Hence it is most important that relationships are kept amicable within a matrilineage for fear that sorcery ensues. 613 626 754

An interesting variation of the dangers of sorcery is the belief that sorcerers take the opportunity of squabbles within a matrilineage to kill one of the members. The rationale behind this is that the diviner's instruments are unable to detect the origin of the sorcery beyond the immediate cause. A diviner will indicate that the cause of death of, say, a child is sorcery, but that the witch is obscured behind the quarrelling words of some relative. Consequently, danger to a matrilineage ensues when one of its 613 754 578 626 person, he may also give a goat. The calico is to wrap up the body of the dead, the goat is for the undertakers, ausia.[1]

[1] See Chap. V, p. 111.

3:Stacks D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

764 203

764 [769]

Until eight or ten years ago, the Wayao buried their dead in a posture of complete flexion. The preparation of the body after death is carried out by friends from a neighboring village who volunteer for the service. They are known as ausia, (sing. ushia). Macdonald[2] thinks the word originally meant relatives; it has essentially the opposite meaning now. The corpse is washed in ordinary water and no anointment is made. The limbs, formerly, were then flexed on the body and at all the joints. The clenched hands were placed under the chin of the bent head or the hands were spread over the face of the flexed head, while the legs were tightly bent at the knees and brought up close against the abdomen. The corpse was securely bound in this position and adorned with a loin-cloth of bark. The body of a man found stiff and extended was a source of great trouble. Water was heated, and the body bathed until it was as relaxed as possible. As much force would then be applied as was necessary to gain the required degree of flexion, the bones often being broken in the process.

[769]

In the case of a woman, her female friends put on her bark-cloth loin covering, but the washing and trussing up of the body were usually done by men unless there were some women particularly skilled in the operation.

The flexed body was then set up on the deceased's sleeping mat within the hut, and from time to time, so long as it remained exposed, it was washed, people coming from other villages to offer their services for this task. Watchers sat continually by the body, the wife and perhaps a brother on either side, while others slept in the hut to take their turn later. The rest of the mourners sat on the veranda about the door.

765

As soon as the ausia had finished their work, wailing began, started by the wife and carried on by all the women of the village and the women relatives from elsewhere. Wailing continued all day until about ten in the evening, and then started again between two and three in the morning. This went on for three or four days or was intermittent for a longer time, always recommencing with the arrival of a party from another village. I have never heard of flour being put on the heads by Yao mourners, as mentioned in Africana.[3]

[769]

News of a death was always sent to all the relatives, and burial might be delayed to allow for the arrival of those from a distance. Under such circumstances, the body was enclosed in a casing of bark, the ends being closed by bamboo pegs. Exaggerated signs of grief were sometimes made by the mourners who beat their breasts with their hands while they knocked their heads against the ground or a wall, but the Yao did not indulge in the excesses of the Anyanja near Lake Chilwa who practised a kind of flagellation, the wailers within the house scolding any new-comers at the door and beating them with sticks. This treatment was not resented. Women alone did the wailing; a man indulging in such expression would be laughed at. His part in the old days when the natives possessed firearms was

[1] Vide infra, p. [illegible]. [2] Op. cit., vol. I, p. [illegible]. [3] Ibid.

765 [539] to fire off his gun as long as his powder lasted. During the period of mourning, drumming went on continuously, chindindo being played on the three small drums called ishoma.

With the exception of the final attitude of the body, the foregoing description is a correct account of what happens today. The body is now fully extended.

767 764 The ovile are two or four in number, although other friends may assist in all their services. On about the third day, the ovile sew up the body in bark cloth, completely enveloping it; a bamboo needle is used and left sticking in the cloth at the last stitch. The body is then enclosed in a mat slung on a pole, and carried from the hut to the grave. First, the procession makes a round of the village, passing by all the houses which the dead man used to visit, and over all the paths he used to cross. His children and those of his relatives under seven or eight years old gather in the village, and throw pieces of charcoal toward the body as it passes, "so that they shall forget the dead man," or run after the corpse, while some one sprinkles medicine over them.

764 [539] As the procession leaves the village, it is headed by the drums playing chindindo, but after a few hundred yards, only the ching'ongo drum, now called chimoda, beats time for a short distance; the procession then goes on quietly. Following the drums, walks the mother or another relative carrying flour with which the grave will be marked out. Behind this mourner, the body is borne by the ovile. The ovile are always the first to carry the body, but are later relieved by other friends of the deceased; no one would ever ask to be relieved.

[114] After the chief mourner, follow the other relatives and friends, the men first, the women behind. Boys just back from their unyago attend to learn the customs. All the relatives of the deceased go to the burial, contrary to Macdonald's account.[1]

In this order, the procession reaches some two thirty or forty yards from the place of burial where the corpse is put down in the shade, ntale, "resting place", and while the women and part of the men watch beside it, the ovile proceed to the burial place. They cut branches from a sacred tree, and strew them on the path. On approaching the appointed spot, they clap their hands in salutation, asking that the burial ground be opened to them.

The head ndole chooses the site where the grave shall be dug, after which the mourner marks out the limits with the flour she has brought. In the days when the body was buried in contracted posture, a circular grave was dug just big enough to allow two men to work in it. Eight feet was the usual depth but this was decided by the deceased's spouse, if he were living, otherwise, by his near relatives. In the east side of this circular well, a cave was excavated, just large enough to admit the contracted corpse. When all was prepared, the body accompanied by all the mourners, was brought from ntale to the graveside. The chief ndole with a friend of the man's family and one of his wife's, standing in the grave received the body and placed it in the cave, resting on a mat and covered with bark cloth. The body lay on its side with its back toward the well, and its face looking toward the east. After adjusting the body in its place, the adults would tear open the shroud over the ear, and pour on to the pinna some powdered beads to be used by the dead man as money in the hereafter. Except in the case of chiefs, no objects were buried with the dead, contrary to Macdonald's description[1] of the Amangoche. The pole on which the body had been carried to the grave was broken into bits and together with any stick that had been used to measure the body for the cave, was placed in the grave. The opening into the chamber was then closed by a mat fastened over it by pegs and supported by pieces of wood. The male chambering out of the well, pushed the first earth backward into the grave with their elbows, after which the rest of the earth was shovelled in quickly, and a heap made at the surface. The ground about this mound was swept clean with a bunch of leaves by some one walking backward so that no footprints were left; the bunch of leaves was thrown on top of the mound. No medicine was put in the grave, nor were the household utensils placed on the mound, as Macdonald states concerning the Amangoche.[2]

[1] Op. cit., vol. I, p. 188.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

764

[114]

[114]

For some years past, the type of grave made among the Yao has resembled that of the Anyanja,[3] a long pit with a chamber scooped out along the whole length of one side. In this, the corpse is placed in a fully extended position so that it lies on its back with the feet toward the east. With this exception, the account given above holds good for the present day. The method of suspending the corpse in a mat slung on forked sticks within the grave, mentioned in Africana,[4] is not found among the Amachinga Yao.

On the way back to the village, two male lead, followed by the men, the women, and lastly, by the other male. First, all wash, the men upstream, the women downstream; no one may wash another's back. The hoes used in digging the grave are also washed; hoes are never washed on any other occasion.

764
783

During the funeral, some responsible old man is left in charge of the village with several younger men to assist him. Just before the return of the funeral party is expected, the old man sends one of the younger men to set medicine at the side of the path along which the mourners will pass. This medicine is made from the bark of the mpingo tree and is used for purification; it is placed in a shard. Each person as he arrives at the spot squats down, dips the little finger of each hand into the medicine, and passes the fingers between the little toe and the third toe of the corresponding foot. The last comer throws any remaining medicine into the bush. As they near the village, a gun is fired and wailing is resumed for a few minutes, after which it ceases altogether. The old man who has been left in charge of the village always inquires whether all has gone well at the interment.

[834]

That evening, the time is passed in singing chinduindu.[5] All those who attended the burial, sleep in the village, and if the deceased's relatives can afford to provide the necessary food, all remain in the village for a number of days equal to the period which elapsed between death and burial. Sometimes, when burial was long delayed, the mourning party

765

[1] Op. cit., vol. I, p. 187.
[2] Ibid.
[3] Stannus, 'Notes on natives of British Central Africa,' op. cit., p. 313.
[4] Macdonald, op. cit., p. 186.
[5] Vide infra, p. 267, 270.

3: Stanzas D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

765 might not break up for a week, but the practice was often modified to some degree, people returning to their homes during the day and coming back each night to sleep in the deceased's village. At the present time, there is a tendency to cut the proceedings short, and the mourners generally disperse on the second day after the funeral. This period of waiting is usually whiled away by playing and singing chindimba.

768 On the day before the company leaves the village — now, often on the day after the 765 funeral — the ceremony of shaving the head takes place. The ausile, assisted in the case of a large party, by those who helped at the burial, shave the heads of all the dead man's relatives. When this is completed, they begin to tear down the deceased's house. The grass from the roof, with the hair removed from the heads of the relatives, is carried to the cross-roads and burned. The walls of earth are torn down and made into a heap; on the top, a stick is raised, and at its base is placed the dead man's snuff box. Sometimes a cactus euphorbia, upachi, is planted on the mound and cassava round about. The snuff box is kept replenished with snuff. This, with the cassava, is reserved for the ausile; no one else may partake of them.

While the house is being pulled down, the chief ubile ties around the neck of the widow a single string of beads or a small piece of calico, ng'enji. After the house has been demolished, the ausile return to their homes and on the following morning, everyone else departs.

767 The position of ubile is a strange one. Every man in the course of his life probably acts as undertaker for some friend; many have probably performed the service several times. He receives no regular payment, but beads, and, nowadays, coins are often thrown into the pot of water with which he wets the heads of those he shaves after the funeral, and he has the freedom of the village in which he has so acted forever afterward, the degree of freedom being determined by the distance which he has travelled to officiate. When Wandalama died, a headman named Chisui from Makanjila's on Lake Nyasa, over a hundred miles away, acted as one of the ausile. The occasions on which he revisited Malemya's village are [431] well remembered, as they were marked by much frolicking and some obscenity. He was the recipient of enormous presents of fowls, sheep, and anything else he cared to take, and having commandeered men from the village to carry these gifts for him, he would leave, accompanied by all the people, yelling and shouting their joy at seeing him again.

Any fowls or other provisions that friends may present to the deceased's relatives at the time of the funeral to help defray expenses are given to the ausile; no one else may eat them. Some may be kept against the next death in the family.

A few days after the funeral, recourse is had to the chief to settle whether any action 769 must be taken in regard to the cause of the death. Some near relative of the dead man will 622 be chosen for this purpose; he must not be shaved by the ausile at the time of the funeral. The consultation takes place at some secluded spot outside the village. The chief always brings some one with him to witness what is said. On arriving at the appointed place, the chief salutes the unshaven mourner who is probably accompanied by other relatives, and then listens to an account of the circumstances attending the illness and death. The point 768

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

at issue is whether there is any evidence pointing to death from unnatural causes which 622
requires consulting a diviner. The chief practically always agrees with the relatives, and it is said that he will never press them to go to the wachisanga unnecessarily. The case may end with this conference, or here may begin the long series of events described under usawi.[1]

During the month subsequent to the funeral, certain taboos have to be observed. The 765
widow may not bathe, and with the exception of the awilo, all who attended must refrain 768 from sexual intercourse. At the expiration of this period, beer is brewed in the village, and all the friends and relatives are again summoned. This beer-drinking is called "the beer of rottenness," or "the beer of resignation." In addition to the beer, food is provided, and everyone helps himself without ceremony. Chindimba is sung and danced and at the present day, bands of trained dancers attend, including ching'wenyeng' wenye.[2] A pot of beer is sunk into the ground, marking the site of the dead man's house. The night of matapata[3] [833]
sees husbands and wives reunited, and the widow may go through ceremonial intercourse with a man appointed for the purpose called lituna or mbilo. Sometimes the widow refuses lituna, and is given medicine instead to cleanse her; her body is then no longer "hot" and likely to bring disease to those about her. A widow does not marry again for two or three 587
years. A young man who loses his wife has no longer any standing in her village after 768
matapata. He is usually given a present, with the suggestion that he go elsewhere. After the death of an infant, the mother is considered unclean. She sleeps on a mat apart from her husband till after the ceremony of shaving, and then undergoes a ceremonial coitus with her husband — in which case he is called lituna — after which, ordinary cohabitation is resumed. If she has been a widow, or if the child was born "with disease,"[4] another man acts as lituna.

The morning following matapata, all the fires in the village are extinguished. A fresh 769 blaze is then kindled with the fire-drill, lumangu, either in the chief's house or in some spot [372]
nearby, and from there, fire is carried to all the houses. The ashes of the old fires, the stones supporting the cooking pots, and the porridge sticks are taken to the cross-roads, and there destroyed. Everyone then shaves all his own hair, head, axillae, and pubis. [302]
The custom of the second shaving by the awilo, described in Africana,[5] is, I think, an adaptation from the Anyanja. A year later, beer is again brewed, and all the relatives summoned to the village to partake of it. There is dancing, but no ceremony.

The Yao bury their dead in regular graveyards in wooded country, the thicker the 764 forest the better, often two or three miles away from a group of villages. Different villages bury their dead in different parts of the burial ground; relatives are usually buried near one another. Graves are never revisited, and no one would enter a graveyard except at the 769 time of a funeral, and then only after obtaining permission from the chief. Such spots are

[1] Vide infra, p. 268.
[2] Vide infra, p. 270 and Pl. I.
[3] Beer-drinking.
[4] Vide infra, p. 268.
[5] Macdonald, op. cit., p. 111.

10: Sanderson D-5 (ca. 1920)1922 FT7 Yao FT7

The man and boys now pass through the arch in order of seniority; each splashes himself with the water in the trough, but neither speaks nor rinses the mouth. The women come next, led by the head-wife of the chief; the latter rinses her mouth and, instructed by the doctor, repeats a prayer similar to that offered by her husband. The remainder of the women merely splash themselves, like the men, before passing through the arch. All then return to the village, where the pyajila is continued. 751 796

Finally the doctor takes the hammer-head from the trough and hands it to the chief, who refits the haft into it, and, a hoe having been placed on the ground, goes through the form of forging the latter by beating it with the hammer. He then scrapes the ground with the hoe as if clearing a place overgrown with grass; he does not dig with it as in hoeing up the ground for planting seed. After this rite the chief again bathes in medicated water similar to that in the trough, and the ceremony is complete.

Whereas the pyajila ceremony and its adjunct, the rite of the arch, are now but rarely performed, no Yao will omit the rite of purification after a death in his family. This ceremony consists of two essential parts, both protective against the ndaka, a disease characterised by dropsy and supposed to be contracted by contact with a corpse, or by association, especially by sharing a meal, with those who have been in such contact. The first of these parts is bathing in certain medicines, which protects the bather from ndaka, and the second consists of a sort of communion meal, shared by all friends and especially relatives with those who have been contaminated, and designed to protect those friends and relatives. [178] 751 764 796 783

The decoction for bathing is made by soaking the roots of lugulambuti and lumlemela in water, together with the bark of mkomaa, one piece each from the east and west aspects of the tree; the water assumes a reddish tint, and the whole body is bathed. 751 783 824 765 [262]

The communion-meal consists of porridge made from any kind of flour or of rice, and some ngunda beans. In the latter some scorched and powdered root of mandanyelele is mixed, with a little salt. All near relatives of the deceased must partake of this meal, as well as their wives and their near relatives; part is carefully put aside for the use of any relative unable to be present at the ceremony.

Latterly, since the spread of Islam among the WaYao, this rite has become confused with the distribution of food to the poor at the funeral of a Muslim, and the Arabic word sadaqa ("charity") is now generally used for it, to the exclusion of its wider, correct meaning. [77] [797]

It may be mentioned here that after the death of a child the father is denied access to his wife for a period of about three weeks, and the first act must be one of coitus interruptus. 765 784

MEREDITH SANDERSON.

1: Tew E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

never to have had any large-scale central political organization, and their history is full of occasions when one group of Yao has attacked another. Even within his own area the authority of the chief was not, apparently, sufficiently strong to prevent one village headman from raiding his neighbours; the chief maintained no standing army.[1] The chief held certain rights and privileges. He was entitled to the ground tusk of any elephant found in his territory (the finder was rewarded after it had been sold, with a cloth); he received tribute in food,[2] with which he entertained visitors. He took a share of the spoils of war and was also entitled to annual labour service and to a gift when he made a new burial place. Apart from his military and judicial responsibilities, he had authority to settle when and where initiation ceremonies should be held.[3] The right to hold these ceremonies was sought after by the village headmen as a mark of status.[4] The chiefs or headmen of certain families had the right to wear a white cloth bound round their temples as insignia of rank.[5]

In addition the chief had a certain ritual status. He was thought to incur mystical danger by contact with death, and so was not allowed to attend a funeral nor to eat a chicken brought by a messenger announcing a death, nor to accompany his military expeditions. He was supposed to have great power through special medicines. He had to make offerings to the ancestors, especially in affairs concerning the whole people, such as drought or epidemic. He was expected to give a burial cloth at the death of an important man. At his death a period of social disorganization was recognized, members of his village were allowed to pillage and rape, until he was buried.

Succession to the chiefly office was matrilineal. The chief's position was based partly on his status as the senior male of his own matrilineal kin group, partly on his wealth. His command over slaves, guns, and caravans to the coast was greater than that of others, and from these his military strength was derived, for a chief was powerless without his following of dependents. The chief of the area was also headman of his own village. In fact, the position and duties of a village headman (except that he could not exact tribute)[6] reproduced in small scale those of the chief. The headmen also were in mystical danger through contact with death and were the channel through which the ancestors were approached in affairs concerning the village. They, too, built up their prestige and wealth by slaving activities. They seem to have been largely independent of the chief, carrying on slave raids of their own, and if they could gain a sufficient following, they might break away from the chief, and set up their own chiefdoms.[7]

The chief ruled through a hierarchy of headmen. His councillors were superior headmen, placed over a number of village headmen. Commoners could approach the chief only through the councillor in whose area their village belonged. The councillor's special duties were to report daily to the chief on the affairs of his district, to advise, and to arbitrate in the chief's own domestic affairs, e.g. in conflicts between the chief and his brothers and nephews. The councillors were not necessarily relatives of the chief,[8] but were chosen on account of their general status in the community, and their

[1] Elmslie, 4, 1899, p. 105, says of the Yao in the Shire highlands: 'Every tenth man one met might be set down as a chief . . . petty quarrels of petty chiefs were abundant. . . .' See Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, pp. 169 and 154.

[2] Stannus, 4, 1922, says that only beer was owed to him.

[3] Ibid., p. 279.

[4] Duff, 1903, p. 312.

[5] Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, p. 16; Werner, 1906, p. 260.

[6] Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, p. 153.

[7] Ibid., pp. 32 and 156.

[8] Ibid., p. 156.

1: Tew E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

764 performed these services used to enter a special relationship of privileged familiarity with
767 the village of the dead. This has died out in Nyasaland, but accounts of Utani[1] among the Yao at Masasi and Songea suggest that something of the kind is still practised.

766 Chiefs and headmen are not buried outside the village, as are other persons. They used to be buried before their own huts, but now in the centre of the village. Shrines were raised over their graves, at which offerings of beer and flour were made. If the village was moved the pot of beer sunk into the ground at the chief's grave was also removed and reinstated at the new site. A dead slave was buried by his fellow slaves; normal rights of sepulture were denied to suicides and to persons who had died in taking the poison ordeal (that is, convicted sorcerers).[2]

OTHER DISTINCTIVE CULTURAL FEATURES

301 The Yao have a tribal mark of two short cuts on each side of the face between the
304 eye and the ear.[3] Their women did not wear the pelele, lip-ring, although their neighbours the Makua and Makonde did;[4] the fashion seems to have spread to south Nyasa
[171] in the 1880's, as many travellers commented on it, without distinguishing whether the wearers were Yao, Nyanja, or Lomwe.[5] The women used to pierce the left ala nasi and insert a metal or lead stud, cipini.[6]

MAKUA-LOMWE

TRIBAL AND SUB-TRIBAL GROUPINGS AND DEMOGRAPHY

000

NOMENCLATURE

The Ma- in Makua is not a prefix, but part of the name, Variant spellings are Makwa, Mahoa, Mahoane. They are sometimes referred to by the name of one subdivision, the Medo Makua, and called Ameto or Meto.[7]

The Lomwe (also spelt Lomuei) are called Alolo by the Yao, and are also frequently called Anguru (Nguru) which is an old name for the people of the region.[8] Any of the Makua-Lomwe peoples who have migrated into south Nyasaland are collectively termed Nguru in official reports; Nguru is a hill in the region of Portuguese East Africa, whence they come, but they should not be confused with the Nguru of Tanganyika.[9] Another name for them is Acilowe.[10] Alolo is incorrectly applied to all the Lomwe; it has a stricter application to the Cuabo from Quilimano.

[1] Scrivenor, 1937; Moreau, 1941; Spies, 1943.
[2] Main sources for burial are: Johnson, 5, 1922, pp. 28–30; Stannus, 4, 1922, pp. 240–6; Abdullah, 1919, pp. 19–21; Duff, 1903, pp. 322–4; Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, pp. 110–12.
[3] Murray, 1932, p. 153.
[4] Thompson, 1882, pp. 77–8, writing of the Yao of the Ruvuma valley.
[5] Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, pp. 16–17; 'around Blantyre hardly any woman is without it'.
[6] Stannus, 1, 1910, p. 316.
[7] Handbook of Portuguese Nyasaland, 1921, p. 39; Murray, 1922, p. 56; Weule, 1, 1909, p. 259; Livingstone, 1874, p. 32.
[8] Theal, 1899, pp. 415–17; Gaspar Bocarro passed through Manguro country. Burton, 1873 (Lacerda's Journey, 1798), mentions Manguros.
[9] Abraham, 1931, p. 15; Murray, 1922, p. 46.
[10] Johnson, W. P., 4, 1894.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

of the ancestors of the chief are supposed to affect the welfare of the initiands. Though some village headmen may conduct initiation ceremonies they are unable to offer rain-prayers. These are offered by a chief on two occasions. The first is in November, before the rains have started. The chief's wife and some women from the bigger villages in the near vicinity of the chief's village gather at his hut. They brew beer—ukana wacisoka, the beer of the spirits—to be used as a libation. At sunset on the appointed day the chief goes to the shrine tree where some headmen have gathered, and pours some of the beer into a pot, partly buried at the root of the tree, while he invokes all the spirits of his departed ancestors—mainly matrilineal but occasionally some patrilateral. He then entreats the spirits to send some rain and to look after their 'children' in the land. Sometimes a length of calico is hung on the tree as an extra offering. Should no rain fall the chief will have to repeat the offering until it does fall. When the rains have ended in March he makes a second offering 'of thanks'.

In the context of the present discussion, the important point is that it is only the chief who can make this libation and offer this prayer. If his plea fails the whole area starves, and no headman may supplicate his ancestors on his own behalf or approach the chief's ancestors through his own ancestors. The grain for the beer comes from the various villages, but not on a fixed rate of levy. Some villages never contribute. The chief buys the offered cloth on behalf of his people. When in 1948 the cloth on the shrine tree was stolen, Chiwalo imposed a levy on the village headmen in the area so that a new cloth could be bought. Here the boundaries of the chiefdoms are important, and no headman outside Chiwalo's area was approached. A village headman from Jalasi's area, though geographically much closer to Chiwalo, relies on Jalasi's rain-offerings and may not approach Chiwalo or plead with him to offer a rain-prayer to his ancestors.

Another ritual situation in which the limits of the chiefdom appear is during the institutionalized pillage on the death of a chief. I have not been in any area when the chief has died, so that I rely here on the tales of informants. During the mourning rites certain feasts are held. The food for the mourning feast of a commoner or village headman is provided from his estate

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

766 by his relatives. For the feasts during the mourning at a chief's death the food is acquired by institutionalized pillage (cipinimbe).
661 The villagers in a chiefdom are often first informed of the death of a chief by the appearance of men from his village. These men are by custom allowed to take from a village any article of food they can find—flour, a goat, some chickens, prepared relish, or whatever is lying around in the village. The owners of the food may not charge them with theft. This food is used in the funeral feast. The excesses to which the chief's men may go became circumscribed after the White conquest. Previously, almost any crime short of murder could be committed under the guise of cipinimbe. More recently, owing to Government opposition, it has been restricted to the taking of smaller articles of food, such as flour and chickens. Some people are beginning to object even to this. The chief's funeral is a public affair and all his subjects may attend it. The effect of the cipinimbe is to bring together enough food for the chief's funeral feast. Here, as before, the chief's men may not cross the boundary for fear of reprisals, and the effect is to impose a levy in an informal way over most of the villages in the chief's area.

The Chief as a Symbol of Unity

643 The chief is a representative of his people and it is his particular duty to ensure their welfare and that of the chiefdom as
579 a whole. His symbolic representation of the unity of his people is brought out clearly by his right to fines in cases involving bloodshed and arson. Strife and division in a chiefdom in the old days were likely to end in spilt blood and burnt huts so that the Yao associate bloodshed and hut-burning with dissension within the chiefdom.

684 Most other offences are against the individual and not the chiefdom as a whole: the case is brought to the chief so that
685 compensation may be awarded. Adultery and theft thus are definitely civil offences. Nowadays, a fine is imposed, but this is seen to be a White innovation, and the money from it is looked upon as 'Boma' money.[1] In disputes where blood has been shed, however, the chief is entitled to fine the guilty party
682 on his own account. The chief is said to be 'blinded' by the 683 blood and a payment must be made to him before he may 'see'

[1] i.e. Government money.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

173 8a1 crop failures. Also I was told that important village headmen [166] are buried with their heads pointing to the east.

The Yao concept of the past is reflected in the principles of 173 political organization of these Machinga chiefdoms. The in- 554 vasion is the datum point from which rank mainly stems. We 622 may classify modern headmen into: those who were in the area before the Yao invasion, i.e. the Aborigines; the Invaders; and those who have come in since the invasion and have had to submit themselves to the Machinga chief, i.e. the Newcomers. The principle behind this classification of headmen is fundamental to Yao political structure. Stated most simply it is the rule that MacDonald quoted in describing the development of local organization: 'However large the settlement may become the man that is first in is the chief or headman.'[1] This is, of course, somewhat of a simplification, but the rule contains the essence of the principle. It was reversed for the Aboriginal Nyanja because the Yao subjugated them. But the claims of the Nyanja chiefs to rank because they had occupied the land first were recognized by the Yao who absorbed them into the social structure in positions of high rank.

425 But the principle holds among the Yao themselves, and for 554 the Nguru in their movements after the White conquest. The 622 operation of the principle is clearest in the structure of small local areas such as Chiwalo's. When Chiwalo's area was first settled, just after World War I, there were large tracts of unoccupied land. The first headmen to move into this region were Cigwaja, Kapaloma, Nyanje, Makata and Mumbwa. The local chief Chiwalo followed Cigwaja, but as Cigwaja was one of the Invader headmen under Chiwalo during the period of invasion, he now recognized Chiwalo as the chief. The area that is now Chiwalo's chiefdom was divided out among these five headmen. As other headmen came into the area they had to approach one of these five for land rights. These, when granted, were granted irrevocably in a block to the new village headman who then had sole rights to distribute the land afterwards. If he had the land to spare, he may have granted a portion of it to yet another village headman, and this action was also irrevocable. The land occupation pattern in any particular area is therefore extremely complex, because in addition to the village garden areas, indivi-

[1] MacDonald, Africana, i, 147. See p. 35 above.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

Arabic greeting to their seniors. This is done by placing the 622 left hand on the chest and bending slightly forward to the village 554 headman, saying, 'Subaye'. The senior should then respond, 557
'Alaye'. Also, important headmen are usually buried in the 766 centre of the village, not in the common graveyard. The tomb of an important headman or personage, usually built of stones, concrete or brick, is called nsati. The right to bury in the village must be obtained from the chief 'because the land is his', and in Kawinga's area a fee of 6*s*. must be paid to him.

The Struggle for Government Recognition

Thus far, I have been discussing the ways in which the rank of 622 village headmen may be expressed. I now describe the way in 554 which these marks of prestige are associated in the three cate- 643 gories of headmen we have distinguished, and in what way the 648 competition between them is phrased. I have already described how all the chiefs in the areas to which I am referring are all successors of the original leaders of the invasions, and are usually the present Government representatives or Native Authorities.

The people must recognize the rank of chief because mystical beliefs prescribe activities in one direction, and because the limiting structure of the White Administration does so in another. A village headman cannot hold initiation ceremonies without the permission of the chief because of the mystical sanction, but the chief also has legal authority over his subject headmen. He as Native Authority is recognized by the Government and is its representative to his people. The Native Authority Ordinance (1933) specifically imposes penalties on those who do not recognize the authority of the chief. Under Section 12 of the Ordinance, the Native Authority may arrest without warrant any person who is accused of failing to obey his order or direction, interferes with his lawful duties, professes to be a chief or assumes the duties of a chief without Government approval. Under Section 13(i) severe penalties are imposed on any person who conspires against or in any way attempts to undermine the lawful power and authority of any chief or Native Authority. His position is therefore greatly strengthened against the village headmen and I have been told of one or two prosecutions by chiefs under this section. Nowadays, the mere threat of

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

or a girl who has just returned from Chiputa must not touch the child, as it is said, "Her body is hot and would give fever to the child." To guard against such a happening, some "clean" woman, after handing some beads to the mother, will ask to be allowed to take the infant. This indicates that should it sicken, the beads will pay the medicine-woman who comes to cure it. The mother and baby are simply washed in water and are not treated with medicine, unless meconium has been voided before the child was delivered.[1] If the infant dies before it is presented to the outside world, it is disposed of in the same way as a stillborn child, i.e. buried in the ash-heap. About the tenth day, the baby is adorned with a girdle of beads and two little pieces of stick obtained from a medicine-woman to make the infant grow fat. 846 [845 766] [856]

The length of time during which the father and mother refrain from cohabitation after the birth of a baby varies greatly according to circumstance. Four months is probably a minimum, while two years, during which the woman suckles the child, is the common interval. After the first coitus, the man and woman wash themselves and the baby is bathed in the same water to prevent any ill coming to it. 833

Suckling often continues much longer than two years. If the mother dies, the child may be suckled by the grandmother, an aunt, or some other woman, but the breasts must first be treated with medicine or the child would die 853

A child born breech first is called salanga, a word which is also used to denote a variety of domestic fowl which always has the appearance of having its feathers ruffled. A child who dies before the father and mother have resumed sexual relations is buried in a graveyard apart from that of adults. The grave, dug with sticks, not hoes, is very shallow, and when it is filled in, a heap of stones is made above it. Only women attend the burial. A deep grave would cause the mother to go on losing children at an early age. The body of such a child is called hiwau, "hyaena." 845 766

A woman dying undelivered is placed in the grave in the usual way and then, before filling in the earth, one of the grave-diggers descends into the pit, cuts through the enveloping shroud, and incises the abdomen. One end of a long bamboo stick or reed is inserted in the incision and the other end is brought out to the surface of the grave. If this were not done, "many would die in childbirth." 844 766

Twins are not killed by the Yao but are well treated and always cared for equally. They are given similar clothing and food.[2] There is a story that the mother of Nkwamba, 845

[1] Chinguru, vide infra, p. 286.

[2] H. A. Werner, 'Among the Congo Cannibals, by John H. Weeks, London, 1913, a review,' (Man, vol. 14, no. 18, 1914, p. 18).

I take this opportunity of referring to Miss Werner's review in which, speaking of twins, she says, "They are always among the Anyanja given the names Mapali and Nyama." Mapali in Chinyanja refers to a kind of musical instrument and the Chiyao meaning is "successive pulse." Nyama is a Chiyao word which certainly means "the back." It is sometimes used of the second born twin but does not occur in Chinyanja. I have never heard of twins either among the Wayao or the Anyanja spoken of by these names. A mother carries the first born on the right arm and the second born on the left, but, so far as I know, she does not give a duplicate greeting nor make a habit of eating equally with both hands. [114]

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

769 supposed to be the abode of spirits. Except in the case of chiefs, the Wayao never make any erections over their graves, like the Anyanja grass shelters, and the present-day Mohammedan earth imitations of Swahili tombs.

766 Chiefs, and the more important headmen, are usually buried in their own villages. Over the grave, a grass hut with a veranda is erected; the hut is covered with calico, and guns were formerly set in as veranda posts. Guns and ivory used to be buried with the corpse [567] but these Yao, I am told, never practiced the barbarous custom of burying slaves with their chiefs. Information of the death of a chief was always conveyed to other chiefs by slaves who were kept by the recipient of the message.

Since the time of the old Malemya, the corpse of a chief always lies with its head in the direction of the old chief's grave. The grave is swept around, and the house pulled down as in the case of an ordinary man, but the grave-hut is rebuilt every year and never forgotten.

Since the burial of the dead is more or less correlated with the idea of planting seed from which progeny will spring, the natives will not bury a leper, believing that if they did so, leprosy would spring up all around them. Persons dying of an epidemic disease such as small-pox are dealt with in the same way. In these cases and in that of a man dying of ordeal poison, the body is enclosed in a mat and put up in a tree, a manner of disposing of the dead common among the Anguru and some Anyanja. Concerning death from dropsy, similar precautions are taken to those in the instance of a woman dying in childbirth,[1] and a tube is put down to the body from the surface of the ground.

A leper feeling that the end is near, will ask to be put in a hut built outside the limits of the burial ground. Here, provided with water and food for a few days, he will wait to die near the graveyard wherein he knows he cannot be buried.

Anyone who is wounded with a spear or any other weapon is not taken into the village, [752] but is kept in a hut in the bush. If death results, the mourning ceremonies differ somewhat from the ordinary rites and are much curtailed.

Initiation Ceremonies. Under this heading I propose to deal with the three ceremonies, 881 Lupanda, Chiputu and Litiwo. They are occasions of great importance in the life of the native and their educative effect for the good of the tribe is far reaching.

At Lupanda (Ndapala) the young boys attend; at Chiputu the young girls go through their initiation and a side ceremony for young married men takes place, while Litiwo celebrates the first quickening with child. All the ceremonies are included in the word Unyago. Macdonald in Africana while referring to "the mysteries"[2] gives scant information about the ceremonies and has, presumably, without much knowledge of what goes on, condemned these customs like many others as furthering "absurd superstitions." He has failed to recognise that they are occasions when a large amount of useful advice is imparted, good manners are insisted on, and tribal custom is made known. Sexual questions are dealt with in these mysteries, and, though mixed up with a large amount of superstition, a

[1] Vide supra, p. 238. [2] Op. cit., vol. 2, ch. 7.

3:Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

against all evils — witchcraft, attack by lions, etc. The akuwasi then set about building 881 shelters in which the wali will remain during their term of instruction. According to the number of the wali so the number of places where shelters are built may vary from one, two, or three, to as many as eight. Each of these places is called Ndapula. They may be many [346] miles apart and are so placed for the convenience of the mothers in various groups of villages who bring the food daily to the group of boys from those villages.

The boys when they originally left the village were wearing a large bark-cloth covering, with beads and calico, which latter articles have been taken by the m'mikila and his assistants. At Ndapula they wear simply a loin-cloth of bark.

During their stay at Ndapula, the wali are given animal names by the akuwasi who [553] carry on the instruction of the boys until their return to Lupanda, the m'mikila having gone back to his village immediately after the circumcision. The names given to the boys [551] are commonly names of beasts of prey such as Alikule (likule = the jackal), Achimwai (chimwai = the leopard), etc.

Certain restrictions as to diet are laid upon the wali by the m'mikila, e.g. no meat of 881 an animal killed by a beast of prey, no mudfish, likwabale. He will not allow any villager 262 to visit Ndapula after seven P.M. and visitors may only be men who have been through the ceremony. An uncircumcised man is called mbulale, one who has not been to his Usapu.

Other restrictions as to foodstuffs may be made by the akuwasi, generally in connection with the mythical origin of such food substances. A finger-shaped yam called lipete is taboo, as it is said to have first sprung from the grave of a leper, the inference being obvious.
After the Usapu, the boys have to undergo a special doctoring before they may partake of them. Bananas and rice are similarly refused them, the latter on account of a story to the effect that rice grew from the nostrils of a dead man, the idea doubtless having relation to the resemblance of rice grains to maggots. Fish is denied them by some masters of ceremonies, as it is said to have originated from the diaper of a woman which she threw away [825] while bathing.

Each m'mikila may have special observances of his own. One near Zomba caused all cassava to be roasted in a certain way. Rows of pieces of cassava were placed in split bamboo spits and so roasted before the fire in the manner of fish. If roasted in the ordinary [252] way, the cassava would split and show the white floury material inside, signified by the verb ku-lapala. If this is eaten by the wali, it is said that the prepuital wound would reopen.

The length of time spent at Ndapula varies from four weeks to as long as three or four 881 months. In the first place they must wait till the circumcision wounds of all are completely healed. Delay may be occasioned by complications having arisen in some cases.
Again, permission to return may be withheld by the chief for some reason or other.
Should one of the wali die at Ndapula, the body is buried out in the bush and nothing [766] is said to the parents until after the ceremonies are over and all have returned to the village.

3: Stanna D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

village had its regular place of torture and mumi drinking, two or three miles from the village. Those used by Makanya, the old Ngoni chief, may still be seen. 754

A clear way is made two feet broad and fourteen feet long in the bush and here the accused takes up his position attended on either side by the two pleaders, the defending pleader on the right, the prosecuting on the left. Facing east or west or following the directions originally given by the caster-of-lots, that is, taking up the position in which the accused is supposed to take a midnight bath, or practise some rite under a tree or an ant hill, etc., he is given a decoction of mumi to drink from a gourd. This decoction is made on the spot, the bark being pounded up on a stone by one of the prosecutors. The accused must have had no food that day. He then starts to walk up and down the short cleared path with the two men, one on either side of him, the one saying, "Now you have drunk mumi, you shall die as you deserve; you did in fo-and-fo," the other denying the accusations, saying, "He shall vomit the poison." He is watched by the assembled crowd who note the various symptoms of which vomiting is the first and said to be the most characteristic. After this has gone on for some time, they watch for what is called the ngungu which is said to be "a ball of bile formed in the mouth and expelled by vomiting so that it bursts on reaching the ground but not before", followed often by a second ball, twenty minutes later. Should this be expelled, recovery may be expected, foreshadowed by clearing of the vision. If he recovers, he is indeed a wonderful man and is hailed on all sides. The women trill with their tongues and shout, and he is carried back in triumph; the defending pleader will swagger about and demand anything he wants for his client. 695

A fatal termination is characterized by little and non-forcible vomiting. Purging is common but said to be painless. Vision is affected and as time goes on, the spectators ask what he can see, "Do you see that over there?" indicating a hill. If he makes mistakes, then they say, "Ah, he is going to die!"

The poison may not take full effect for three or four hours. The end is ushered in by a last stage when the legs become weak; he staggers, then unable to stand any longer, falls to the ground dead, executed by the onlookers who rush in and hurl stones upon the body, crushing it. The relatives take the mangled corpse and lay it on logs covered with grass in the bush. No other covering is permitted. It may be placed in a tree by people acting as ants. Burial is forbidden. [764]

In some cases mumi used to be burned, not being given the chance of the poison trial. This took place at a recognized spot like ndono. The last man to be burned by Mainnya was Mtubula in 1892. Burning was also a punishment in some bad cases of murder. Such was the fate of Chingale. The man was put in a stave-stick, a pile of logs was built round him and then set on fire. [683]

Witch-finder. In addition to ordeal poison, another method of discovering a mumi is by "smelling out." If a number of people have died in a certain village, the inhabitants may begin to think that there is a mumi among them, and procure the services of a witch-finder. 754 695 791 ndembo, a woman who is pregnant for the first time;[1] kawembere, a woman who has one or two children; ajembere, a woman who has three or four children, and lastly, ndabwa, a woman who is past child-bearing age.

The information which I have been able to collect on abortifacients and contraceptives suggests that they are not used by married people merely to prevent their having more children, but that they are used by people who wish to avoid pregnancies which would be embarrassing, for example, by a woman whose husband is a labour migrant. To what extent the abortifacients and contraceptives are efficacious I cannot say; some, I know for certain, rely on a magical principle, for example, the medicated cord worn by a man during intercourse. On the other hand, the abortifacients taken orally may have some active ingredient.

A barren woman or an impotent man is regarded with some embarrassment and the marriage sureties (ninumangwe) of a childless couple will go to considerable trouble and expense consulting diviners and leeches in an attempt to make their wards productive. Childless couples are regarded as not fully adult and are treated in a patronizing way by those who have borne children. Since a man may marry other wives, barrenness in a woman is a cause of sorrow to her husband, but is not in itself a ground for divorce. Where the man is impotent, however, the woman may divorce him on this ground, though she usually takes a paramour and forces her husband to an action for damages which automatically leads to a divorce because it is the usual practice in these cases for the court to ask the woman if she wants to be divorced from her husband.

In contrast to the satisfaction shown at the birth of a child is the sense of sorrow evinced when a child is still-born or the woman miscarries. The Yao do not distinguish between still-births and abortions, both events being known by the word kwanga. This is a verb and refers to the process of abortion; there is no term for the dead foetus itself. I made no attempt to enumerate miscarriages and still-births because they are supposed to be due to breaches of sexual taboos on the part of the husband and wife, and interviewees were naturally reluctant to mention them. Miscarriages and still-births are greatly feared, and the woman is considered to be in a very dangerous condition until she and her husband have carried out a ritual purification. Should a man have intercourse with a woman who has miscarried and not yet been purified he will contract a disease called kwaw which is believed to be invariably fatal. Still-born children or aborted foetuses are buried in a hole dug with sharpened sticks in the bush by the women, whereas children who are born alive and die afterwards are buried in the graveyard in graves dug by men with hoes. The burial spots of still-born babies or aborted foetuses are marked with a stone or broken pottery, since it is believed that to step on them will induce an illness.

The contents of the innermost kin-groups is shown in the child-birth procedure. Birth normally takes place in a hut in the presence of the older female relatives of the woman and the female representatives of the man. The husband's representatives are necessary because the Yao, like many other Central African peoples, believe that an adulterine child will not be born to the woman unless she confesses (kupwa) the name of the genitor. If she persists in concealing the identity of the genitor, they cipute yearly in the great initiation festival for boys and girls. Consequently as they repeat each year the lessons of their own initiation, the ceremonies are the main vehicle of Yao culture.[1]

[1] ndembo = elephant, hence ivory. The names ndembo and ndembo have both refer to the ivory bracelets traditionally worn by the woman in the pregnancy initiation ceremony.

There are also two Moslem ceremonies:

(1) Jande, the boys' Moslem baptism, which takes about seven days, and is usually worked in with lupande:

(2) Nande, the girls' Moslem baptism, which is the same as jande, but usually quite separate from cipute. It is important that the wife of a Moslem should have her nande so that she knows how to prepare the food properly at Ramadan.

Menstrual and Other Taboos

Menstruation is held to be dangerous. A special mat is used by the woman during this time, and is rolled up and kept during the rest of the cycle. The hut is completely replastered after menstruation. Intercourse during menses leads to disease of the man. Sexual contact is dangerous to persons at certain other periods: during initiation ceremonies, during mourning, and for babies who have not been through the protective rite. The danger is thought to lie in ndaba, a dread disease characterised by swelling. This may be transmitted by salt in the food. Deaths are often attributed to 'salt'. Much of the significance of the mourning is that medicines are prepared which protect the mourners against the dangers attendant on sexual activity.

Burial Rites

News of a death must be sent to the chief by a messenger carrying a single fowl. The chief gives a present of calico for wrapping the body, and a goat for the burial men. These are called amilo, neighbours unrelated to the dead, who volunteer for certain duties. They prepare the body for burial and carry it in procession to the graveyard outside the village. No uninitiated person is allowed to see the funeral. All who attend the burial are prohibited from sexual intercourse for one month. After this time the prohibition is lifted by a ceremony of beer drinking and feasting, and on the following day all fires in the village are extinguished, and then relit, and the mourners are shaved. A year later beer is brewed for a final ceremony.

For a period after her husband's death a widow is unclean, and has to be purified by ritual intercourse with a man who is paid. The widow is not allowed to remarry for two or three years. A widower leaves his wife's village, after receiving a parting gift. The widows of ordinary persons are not inherited. If a man has himself a 'name' (rank and social position), he has an heir, who inherits also the wives of his predecessor. But if the heir (the maternal nephew) has married a cross-cousin (mother's brother's daughter) he would not consider the wife's mother as his inherited wife.

Before the burial the dead man's hut used to be destroyed, together with his possessions. Immediately afterwards a consultation is held as to whether retaliatory action against sorcerers is called for. The amilo's duties include not only the conducting of the burial, but also the subsequent inquiry and the conduct of the second ceremony, the beer drinking, at which they shave the mourners. A man who has performed these services used to enter a special relationship of privileged familiarity with the village of the dead. This has died out in Nyasaland, but accounts of Utani[1] among the Yao at Masasi and Songea suggest that something of the kind is still practised.

[1] Main sources for girls' initiation: Hechel, 1935, p. 19; Stannus, 1, 1910, pp. 184–7; 4, 1911, pp. 265–74; Stannus and Dewey, 1913; Duff, 1903, pp. 312–15; Abdullah, 1915, pp. 16–17; Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, pp. 125–30; Werner, 1906, pp. 126–7; Johnston, 1897, p. 410.

1: Tew E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

Chiefs and headmen are not buried outside the village, as are other persons. They used to be buried before their own huts, but now in the centre of the village. Shrines were raised over their graves, at which offerings of beer and flour were made. If the village was moved the pot of beer sunk into the ground at the chief's grave was also removed and reinstated at the new site. A dead slave was buried by his fellow slaves; normal rights of sepulture were denied to suicides and to persons who had died in taking the poison ordeal (that is, convicted sorcerers).[2]

OTHER DISTINCTIVE CULTURAL FEATURES

The Yao have a tribal mark of two short cuts on each side of the face between the eye and the ear.[3] Their women did not wear the pelele, lip-ring, although their neighbours the Makua and Makonde did;[4] the fashion seems to have spread to south Nyasa in the 1880's, as many travellers commented on it, without distinguishing whether the wearers were Yao, Nyanja, or Lomwe.[5] The women used to pierce the left ala nasi and insert a metal or lead stud, cipini.[6]

MAKUA-LOMWE

TRIBAL AND SUB-TRIBAL GROUPINGS AND DEMOGRAPHY

Nomenclature

The Ma- in Makua is not a prefix, but part of the name. Variant spellings are Makoa, Makua, Makuaa. They are sometimes referred to by the name of one subdivision, the Modo Makua, and called Amoto ni Moto.[7]

The Lomwe (also spelt Lomwi) are called Alolo by the Yao, and are also frequently called Angoni (Ngoni) which is an old name for the people of the region.[8] Any of the Makua-Lomwe peoples who have migrated into south Nyasaland are collectively termed Ngoni in official reports; Ngoni is a hill in the region of Portuguese East Africa, whence they come, but they should not be confused with the Ngoni of Tanganyika.[9] Another name for them is Arikoma.[10] Alolo is incorrectly applied to all the Lomwe; it has a stricter application to the Cuabo from Quilimane.

[1] Swinnow, 1937; Mawson, 1941; Spire, 1945.
[2] Main sources for burial are: Johnston, J., 1902, pp. 28–30; Swinnow, c. 1900, pp. 140–4; Abdullah, 1919, pp. 19–21; Duff, 1905, pp. 320–1; Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, pp. 210–12.
[3] Murray, 1931, p. 133.
[4] Thompson, 1882, pp. 37–8, writing of the Yao of the Ruvuma valley.
[5] Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, pp. 16–17; 'around Blantyre hardly any woman is without it'.
[6] Swinnow, c. 1900, p. 326.
[7] Handbook of Portuguese Nyasaland, 1901, p. 30; Murray, 1902, p. 56; Weule, c. 1909, p. 239; Livingstone, 1874, p. 30.
[8] Thomson, 1890, pp. 272–77; Cooper Bonsero passed through Mangoro country. Burton, 1873 (Lacerda's journey, 1798), mentions Mangoro.
[9] Abraham, 1951, p. 13; Murray, 1929, p. 48.
[10] Johnston, W. P., c. 1894.

3:Stanner D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

 764 person, he may also give a goat. The office is to wrap up the body of the dead, the goat 203 is for the undertaker, mulu.[1]

Until eight or ten years ago, the Wayao buried their dead in a posture of complete 764 flexion. The preparation of the body after death is carried out by friends from a neighboring village who volunteer for the service. They are known as mulu, (ding. mbilu). [767]
Macdonald[2] thinks the word originally meant relatives; it has essentially the opposite meaning now. The corpse is washed in ordinary water and no anointment is made. The limbs, formerly, were then flexed on the body and at all the joints. The clenched hands were placed under the chin of the bent head or the hands were spread over the face of the flexed head, while the legs were tightly bent at the knees and brought up close against the abdomen. The corpse was securely bound in this position and adorned with a loin-cloth of bark. The body of a man found stiff and extended was a source of great trouble. Water was heated, and the body bathed until it was as relaxed as possible. As much force would then be applied as was necessary to gain the required degree of flexion, the bones often being broken in the process.

In the case of a woman, her female friends put on her bark-cloth loin covering, but the [767] washing and trussing up of the body were usually done by men unless there were some women particularly skilled in the operation.

The flexed body was then set up on the dormant[3] sleeping mat within the hut, and from time to time, so long as it remained exposed, it was washed, people coming from other villages to offer their services for this task. Watchers sat continually by the body, the wife and perhaps a brother on either side, while others slept in the hut to take their turn later. The rest of the mourners sat on the veranda about the door.

As soon as the mulu had finished their work, wailing began, started by the wife and car- 765 ried on by all the women of the village and the women relatives from elsewhere. Wailing continued all day until about ten in the evening, and then started again between two and three in the morning. This went on for three or four days or was intermittent for a longer time, always recommencing with the arrival of a party from another village. I have never heard of flour being put on the heads by Yao mourners, as mentioned in Africanus.[1]

News of a death was always sent to all the relatives, and burial might be delayed to [764] allow for the arrival of those from a distance. Under such circumstances, the body was enclosed in a casing of bark, the ends being closed by bamboo pegs. Exaggerated signs of grief were sometimes made by the mourners who beat their breasts with their hands while they knocked their heads against the ground or a wall, but the Yao did not indulge in the excesses of the Anyawiza near Lake Chilwa who practised a kind of flagellation, the relatives within the house meeting any new-comers at the door and beating them with sticks. This treatment was not resented. Women alone did the wailing; a man indulging in such expression would be laughed at. His part in the old days when the natives possessed firearms was [1] Vide infra, p. 264. [2] Op. cit., vol. I, p. 395. [3] Ibid.

765 to fire off his gun as long as his powder lasted. During the period of mourning, drumming
[539] went on continuously, chindinda being played on the three small drums called ikawa.

With the exception of the flexed attitude of the body, the foregoing description is a correct account of what happens today. The body is now fully extended.

767 The ewele are two or four in number, although other friends may assist in all their services. On about the third day, the ewele sew up the body in bark cloth, completely enveloping 764 it; a bamboo needle is used and left sticking in the cloth at the last stitch. The body is then enclosed in a mat slung on a pole, and carried from the hut to the grave. First, the procession makes a round of the village, passing by all the houses which the dead man used to visit, and over all the paths he used to cross. His children and those of his relatives under seven or eight years old gather in the village, and throw pieces of charcoal toward the body as it passes, "so that they shall forget the dead man," or run after the corpse, while some use sprinkles medicine over them.

764 As the procession leaves the village, it is headed by the drums playing chindinda, but [539] after a few hundred yards, only the ching'ongo drum, now called chitenda, beats time for a short distance; the procession then goes on quietly. Following the drums, walks the mother or another relative carrying four with which the grave will be marked out. Behind this mourner, the body is borne by the ewele. The ewele are always the first to carry the body, but are later relieved by other friends of the deceased; no one would ever ask to be relieved.
[114] After the chief mourner, follow the other relatives and friends, the men first, the women behind. Boys just back from their wapogo attend to learn the customs. All the relatives of the deceased go to the burial, contrary to Macdonald's account.[1]

In this order, the procession reaches some two thirty or forty yards from the place of burial where the corpse is put down in the shade, ntulo, "resting place", and while the women and part of the men watch beside it, the ewele proceed to the burial place. They cut branches from a mawel tree, and strew them on the path. On approaching the appointed spot, they clap their hands in salutation, asking that the burial ground be opened to them.

The head ndola chooses the site where the grave shall be dug, after which the mourner marks out the limits with the flour she has brought. In the days when the body was buried in contracted posture, a circular grave was dug just big enough to allow two men to work in it. Eight feet was the usual depth but this was decided by the deceased's spouse, if he were living, otherwise, by his near relatives. In the east side of this circular well, a cave was excavated, just large enough to admit the contracted corpse. When all was prepared, the body accompanied by all the mourners, was brought from ntulo to the graveside. The chief ndola with a friend of the man's family and one of his wife's, standing in the grave received the body and placed it in the cave, resting on a mat and covered with bark cloth. The body lay on its side with its back toward the well, and its face looking

[1] Op. cit., vol. I, p. 108.

765 night not break up for a week, but the practice was often modified to some degree, people returning to their homes during the day and coming back each night to sleep in the deceased's village. At the present time, there is a tendency to cut the proceedings short, and the mourners generally dispose on the second day after the funeral. This period of waiting is usually whiled away by playing and singing chimlinda.

768 On the day before the company leaves the village — now, often on the day after the 765 funeral — the ceremony of shaving the head takes place. The ambi, assisted in the case of a large party, by those who helped at the burial, shaves the heads of all the dead man's relatives. When this is completed, they begin to tear down the deceased's house. The grass from the roof, with the hair removed from the heads of the relatives, is carried to the cross-roads and burned. The walls of earth are torn down and made into a heap; on the top, a stick is raised, and at its base is placed the dead man's snuff box. Sometimes a cactus euphorbia, upuchi, is planted on the mound and remains round about. The snuff box is kept replenished with snuff. This, with the cassava, is reserved for the ambi; no one else may partake of them.

While the house is being pulled down, the chief ties around the neck of the widow a single string of beads or a small piece of calico, ng'anji. After the house has been demolished, the ambi return to their homes and on the following morning, everyone else departs.

767 The position of ambi is a strange one. Every man in the course of his life probably acts as undertaker for some friend; many have probably participated the service several times. He receives no regular payment, but beads, and, nowadays, coins are often thrown into the pot of water with which he wets the heads of those he shaves after the funeral, and he has the freedom of the village in which he has so acted forever afterward, the degree of freedom being determined by the distance which he has travelled to officiate. When Wandalama died, a headman named Chimi from Makanjila's on Lake Nyasa, over a hundred miles away, acted as one of the ambi. The occasions on which he revisited Malenya's village are [431] well remembered, as they were marked by much frolicking and some obscenity. He was the recipient of enormous presents of fowls, sheep, and anything else he cared to take, and having commandeered men from the village to carry these gifts for him, he would leave, accompanied by all the people, yelling and shouting their joy at seeing him again.

Any fowls or other provisions that friends may present to the deceased's relatives at the time of the funeral to help defray expenses are given to the ambi; no one else may eat them. Some may be kept against the next death in the family.

769 A few days after the funeral, recourse is had to the chief to settle whether any action
622 must be taken in regard to the cause of the death. Some near relative of the dead man will be chosen for this purpose; he must not be shaved by the ambi at the time of the funeral. The consultation takes place at some secluded spot outside the village. The chief always brings some one with him to witness what is said. On arriving at the appointed place, the chief salutes the unshaven mourner who is probably accompanied by other relatives, and

1: Tew E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

cipate yearly in the great initiation festival for boys and girls. Consequently as they repeat each year the lessons of their own initiation, the ceremonies are the main vehicle of Yao culture.[1]

There are also two Moslem ceremonies:

(1) Jandu, the boys' Moslem baptism, which takes about seven days, and is usually worked in with hupanda:

(2) Nsondo, the girls' Moslem baptism, which is the same as jandu, but usually quite separate from ciputu. It is important that the wife of a Moslem should have her nsondo so that she knows how to prepare the food properly at Ramadan.

Menstrual and Other Taboos

Menstruation is held to be dangerous. A special mat is used by the woman during this time, and is rolled up and kept during the rest of the cycle. The hut is completely replastered after menstruation. Intercourse during menses leads to disease of the man. Sexual contact is dangerous to persons at certain other periods: during initiation ceremonies, during mourning, and for babies who have not been through the protective rite. The danger is thought to lie in ndaka, a dread disease characterized by swelling. This may be transmitted by salt in the food. Deaths are often attributed to 'salt'. Much of the significance of the mourning is that medicines are prepared which protect the mourners against the dangers attendant on sexual activity.

Burial Rites

News of a death must be sent to the chief by a messenger carrying a single fowl. The chief gives a present of calico for wrapping the body, and a goat for the burial men. These are called awilo, neighbours unrelated to the dead, who volunteer for certain duties. They prepare the body for burial and carry it in procession to the graveyard outside the village. No uninitiated person is allowed to see the funeral. All who attend the burial are prohibited from sexual intercourse for one month. After this time the prohibition is lifted by a ceremony of beer drinking and feasting, and on the following day all fires in the village are extinguished, and then relit, and the mourners are shaved. A year later beer is brewed for a final ceremony.

For a period after her husband's death a widow is unclean, and has to be purified by ritual intercourse with a man who is paid. The widow is not allowed to remarry for two or three years. A widower leaves his wife's village, after receiving a parting gift. The widows of ordinary persons are not inherited. If a man has himself a 'name' (rank and social position), he has an heir, who inherits also the wives of his predecessor. But if the heir (the maternal nephew) has married a cross-cousin (mother's brother's daughter) he would not consider the wife's mother as his inherited wife.

Before the burial the dead man's hut used to be destroyed, together with his possessions. Immediately afterwards a consultation is held as to whether retaliatory action against sorcerers is called for. The awilo's duties include not only the conducting of the burial, but also the subsequent inquiry and the conduct of the second ceremony, the beer drinking, at which they shave the mourners. A man who has

[1] Main sources for girls' initiation: Heckel, 1935, p. 19; Stannus, 1, 1910, pp. 184–7; 4, 1922, pp. 269–74; Stannus and Dovey, 1913; Duff, 1903, pp. 312–15; Abdullah, 1919, pp. 16–17; Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, pp. 125–30; Werner, 1906, pp. 126–7; Johnston, 1897, p. 410.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

621 When a villager died in pre-White days, the hut and personal effects were destroyed. Nowadays, with the improving type of [768] dwelling, which frequently includes well-timbered doors and glass-windows, huts are treated with medicine to cleanse them of the harmful effects of the death and they are used again. But [356] all houses must be repaired continually if they are to remain habitable. Eventually most houses fall beyond repair and new houses must be built. The women pull the poles out of the ground and use them for firewood and the site is planted with pumpkins or maize by the nearest relative.[1] A new hut site is then chosen according to the wishes of the owners. As a rule outsiders are neutral about this, and a village member selects a site in accordance with his or her social position in the village. The women still stay near their mother, but they may build on the outside fringe of a group of huts. When the mother's house collapses she may in turn build her hut on the outside fringe of the group near her daughter's hut. In this way the spatial distribution of the huts gradually comes to reflect the segmentation of the lineage.

621 As the woman's daughter's children grow up and marry, the woman's son persuades his wife's relatives to allow him to take 591 his wife to live in his home village. If he is a polygynist he usually takes the senior wife, but he may take the other or others as well. His own daughters now marry uxorilocally in the village if their mother is still alive. If the parents live long enough their daughter's daughters in turn marry and build their huts there. A crisis comes when either the man or his wife dies. The children have to decide whether to stay where they are or to move back to their own matrilineal village. If they do stay at their father's village they form the nucleus of a patrilaterally-linked group. As they grow older the senior male of their matrilineage may come to live with them. Through the years while this internal differentiation is developing within the village, the huts are decaying and being rebuilt. While new hut sites are being selected the physical form of the village is reflecting the continuing social differentiation.

621 At the same time gardens are being planted and crops reaped 361 each year. The soil in the first garden sites has probably been 166 depleted already and is either lying fallow or is under cassava.

[1] Usually the name-heir of a woman, i.e. her daughter's daughter.

3:Stanzus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

765 might not break up for a week, but the practice was often modified to some degree, people returning to their homes during the day and coming back each night to sleep in the deceased's village. At the present time, there is a tendency to cut the proceedings short, and the mourners generally disperse on the second day after the funeral. This period of waiting is usually whiled away by playing and singing ndindimba.

● 768 765 On the day before the company leaves the village — now, often on the day after the funeral — the ceremony of shaving the head takes place. The ewile, assisted in the case of a large party, by those who helped at the burial, shave the heads of all the dead man's relatives. When this is completed, they begin to tear down the deceased's house. The grass from the roof, with the hair removed from the heads of the relatives, is carried to the cross-roads and burned. The walls of earth are torn down and made into a heap; on the top, a stick is raised, and at its base is placed the dead man's snuff box. Sometimes a cactus euphorbia, ngochi, is planted on the mound and cassava round about. The snuff box is kept replenished with snuff. This, with the cassava, is reserved for the ewile; no one else may partake of them.

While the house is being pulled down, the chief mbile ties around the neck of the widow a single string of beads or a small piece of calico, ng'onji. After the house has been demolished, the ewile return to their homes and on the following morning, everyone else departs.

767 The position of mbile is a strange one. Every man in the course of his life probably acts as undertaker for some friend; many have probably performed the service several times. He receives no regular payment, but beads, and, nowadays, coins are often thrown into the pot of water with which he wets the heads of those he shaves after the funeral, and he has the freedom of the village in which he has so acted forever afterward, the degree of freedom being determined by the distance which he has travelled to officiate. When Wandalama died, a headman named Chisui from Makanjila's on Lake Nyasa, over a hundred miles away, acted as one of the ewile. The occasions on which he revisited Malemya's village are well remembered, as they were marked by much frolicking and some obscenity. He was the recipient of enormous presents of fowls, sheep, and anything else he cared to take, and having commandeered men from the village to carry these gifts for him, he would leave, accompanied by all the people, yelling and shouting their joy at seeing him again. [431]

Any fowls or other provisions that friends may present to the deceased's relatives at the time of the funeral to help defray expenses are given to the ewile; no one else may eat them. Some may be kept against the next death in the family.

A few days after the funeral, recourse is had to the chief to settle whether any action 768 must be taken in regard to the cause of the death. Some near relative of the dead man will 622 be chosen for this purpose; he must not be shaved by the ewile at the time of the funeral. The consultation takes place at some secluded spot outside the village. The chief always brings some one with him to witness what is said. On arriving at the appointed place, the chief salutes the unshaven mourner who is probably accompanied by other relatives, and

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

them listens to an account of the circumstances attending the illness and death. The point at issue is whether there is any evidence pointing to death from unnatural causes which requires consulting a diviner. The chief practically always agrees with the relatives, and it is said that he will never press them to go to the wachisanga unnecessarily. The case may end with this conference, or here may begin the long series of events described under usuwi.[1] 768 6a2

During the month subsequent to the funeral, certain taboos have to be observed. The widow may not bathe, and with the exception of the awilo, all who attended must refrain from sexual intercourse. At the expiration of this period, beer is brewed in the village, and all the friends and relatives are again summoned. This beer-drinking is called "the beer of rottenness," or "the beer of resignation." In addition to the beer, food is provided, and everyone helps himself without ceremony. Chindimba is sung and danced and at the present day, bands of trained dancers attend, including ching'ponpong' wenye.[2] A pot of beer is sunk into the ground, marking the site of the dead man's house. The night of mutapata[3] sees husbands and wives reunited, and the widow may go through ceremonial intercourse with a man appointed for the purpose called litunu or mbilo. Sometimes the widow refuses litunu, and is given medicine instead to cleanse her; her body is then no longer "hot" and likely to bring disease to those about her. A widow does not marry again for two or three years. A young man who loses his wife has no longer any standing in her village after mutapata. He is usually given a present, with the suggestion that he go elsewhere. After the death of an infant, the mother is considered unclean. She sleeps on a mat apart from her husband till after the ceremony of shaving, and then undergoes a ceremonial coitus with her husband — in which case he is called litunu — after which, ordinary cohabitation is resumed. If she has been a widow, or if the child was born "with disease,"[4] another man acts as litunu. 765 768 [833] 587 768

The morning following mutapata, all the fires in the village are extinguished. A fresh blaze is then kindled with the fire-drill, lumangu, either in the chief's house or in some spot nearby, and from there, fire is carried to all the houses. The ashes of the old fires, the stones supporting the cooking pots, and the porridge sticks are taken to the cross-roads, and there destroyed. Everyone then shaves all his own hair, head, axillae, and pubis. The custom of the second shaving by the awilo, described in Africana,[5] is, I think, an adaptation from the Anyanja. A year later, beer is again brewed, and all the relatives summoned to the village to partake of it. There is dancing, but no ceremony. 769 [372] [302]

The Yao bury their dead in regular graveyards in wooded country, the thicker the forest the better, often two or three miles away from a group of villages. Different villages bury their dead in different parts of the burial ground; relatives are usually buried near one another. Graves are never revisited, and no one would enter a graveyard except at the time of a funeral, and then only after obtaining permission from the chief. Such spots are 764 769

[1] Vide infra, p. 286.
[2] Vide infra, p. 370 and Pl. I.
[3] Beer-drinking.
[4] Vide infra, p. 288.
[5] Macdonald, op. cit., p. 111.

1: Tew E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

Land Tenure

The rules governing land tenure were those which would be expected of a society which suffered from no land shortage. A man was entitled to as much land as he could cultivate, the limitation being that he should consult the headman as to his neighbours' boundaries. Abandoned gardens could only be taken up with the permission of the original cultivator.[1] 423

MAIN CULTURAL FEATURES

Religion

The Yao are largely Islamized. Codrington remarked that the perpetuation of this faith was distinctly antagonistic to British influence, and it received considerable attention from chiefs and headmen. Schools for the instruction of youth in reading and writing Swahili in Arabic characters were established in nearly every village, where also prayers were made at regular intervals in the day. The Moslem fasts and feasts were also observed, and the Yao were not inclined to embrace Christianity.[2] Their conversion to Islam did not take place till the nineteenth century, long after their first introduction to the Arab traders at Kilwa and Zanzibar, although they had adopted Swahili modes of dress much earlier.[3] 771 787

According to Hetherwick, Islam is strongest on the lake shore and on the east border of Nyasaland, chiefly round the old slave-trade centres. Makanjira's on the south-east side of the lake, and Domira Bay on the west, were the centres of Moslem propaganda. The Moslem population around Zomba and Blantyre consists mainly of Yao men, who have built themselves mosques in their own villages, or use the large mosques of Indian Moslem merchants. In the west districts, lower Shire, Ruo, central Shire, Lilongwe, Fort Manning, the Moslem population does not total more than 732. In the districts round Fort Johnston and Kotakota, the Moslems are one-ninth of the total population, while in Zomba district they number one-fifth.[4]

The Yao pagan religion was a form of ancestor worship. Apart from diviners and medicine men, there was no regular priestly profession. Intercession with the ancestors was performed by the chief, on behalf of the chiefdom, by the headman on behalf of the village, and by the head of the matrilineal kin for his dependents.[5] A man was qualified to approach his ancestors individually only if he had been initiated and had a house of his own.[6] 771 769

Some of the ritual duties of the chief have already been mentioned. When his people were visited by drought or epidemic, or when he fixed the day for the beginning of the millet harvest, he made an offering of flour and of beer poured into a pot in the ground at the grave of a dead chief. The village headman made similar offerings to the spirit of his dead predecessor. The spirits of the dead Nyanja chiefs, ousted by the Yao invasion, were regarded as still powerful in the homeland of their people. For instance, Kangomba, whose shrine was on Mount Soche, used to be appealed to for rain, and on the principle that the most appropriate mediator between a dead man and the living is a descendant of the former, the Yao chief, Kapeni, when he wished to propitiate 771 631 622 775 782

[1] Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, pp. 177–9; Stannus, 2, 1923, p. 28e.
[2] Codrington, 1898, p. 516; see also Maples, 3, 1893.
[3] Young, T. C., 4, 1932, p. 37.
[4] Hetherwick, 4, 1927, p. 127.
[5] Werner, 1906, p. 270; Stannus, 4, 1922, p. 311.
[6] Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, p. 63.

1: Tew . E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

775 Kangomba, used to persuade Nyanja to help in the sacrificial rite. When Kapeni in 782 turn fled to Mount Soche from the Ngoni, and died there, the Yao addressed their offerings to him, not to Kangomba.[1] The word Mulungu has sometimes been interpreted to mean Supreme Being, God, Creator, but among the Yao it seems not to have
[776] a personal connotation. It was used to describe the agent in any mysterious event,[2] or the place where the ancestor spirits (masoka) were supposed to dwell. Daily life was [769] full of acts of respect towards the ancestors, who were regarded as jealous of the living, and requiring constant propitiation.[3]

Sorcery

754 Accusations of witchcraft and measures for dealing with it play a dominant role in Yao social life. With certain exceptions nearly all diseases and deaths are thought to be caused by sorcery. The exceptional causes are: the hand of God, old age, the transgression of certain taboos, and battle wounds. If sorcery is suspected the relatives of the sick or dead man consult the diviner to identify the offender.

Yao (in common with the Maravi and many peoples of Central Africa) believe that sorcerers have a craving for human flesh, which they satisfy by killing with magic the [835] victims of their malice and hatred. They acquire their magical powers by an apprenticeship, which might include incestuous relations with mother, sister, or mother-in-law, or sleeping on the grave of the mother for one night. The sorcerer then learns the medicines and finally demonstrates his power by killing a young relative by magic;
[266] he waits till the victim is buried, and then magically exhumes him for the secret feast with his fellow sorcerers. Each sorcerer who shares the flesh owes a debt to the one who secured the victim.

[755] Charms are used as preventive measures against sorcery. When a diviner has 754 diagnosed the cause of death as sorcery, retaliatory measures are taken. The headmen
683 of the village could either call in the witchfinder to identify the offender or he could call in the diviner to take action against all the sorcerers in the village. After the [695] diviner, Mabisalila, had revealed the guilty ones, they were challenged to take the poison ordeal to prove their innocence. If they died, the proof and the punishment were simultaneously accomplished. If they survived, the diviner was held to have been at fault and they were acquitted. The witch doctor was supposed to entice sorcerers to the graveside, and slay them with magic more powerful than their own.

[695] The diviner's findings are to-day checked by the poison ordeal administered to a chicken. A sorcerer detected in this way might be asked to provide medicine for the man whose sickness he had caused, or after a death he might be compelled to pay compensation. If the accused is a village headman, he will not be summoned before a chief, but his brother will take the villagers away from the sphere of his influence, or he may be chased away from the district. Accusations of sorcery follow certain regular lines. Nearly all accusations fall on relatives. Diviners are consulted by matrilineal relatives of the sick or dead person, and the man most usually accused is the brother of the accuser, or the husband of his sister. Witchcraft is therefore a manner of expressing the hostilities latent in these relations, which are, in the Yao social system, full of tension.

[1] Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, p. 70.
[2] Hetherwick, 3, 1902.
[3] Heckel, 1935, pp. 14–15; Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, pp. 58–75, 204–13.

631 advocates the more orthodox type of Islamic devotion in which 643 a quiet restrained manner is emphasized. As far as I know the 745 twaliki sect are confined entirely to Jalasi's chiefdom and the sukutu to Kawinga and Liwonde. In this matter, Nyambi's people side with Kawinga's and Liwonde's.

On the other hand, local informal organization is well de-631 veloped so that Chiwalo who is at the point of juxtaposition of 643 Kawinga, Liwonde, Nyambi and Jalasi chiefdoms, may try cases
692 involving headmen from any of these areas, and they usually accept his arbitration. His is the nearest court house. The actual boundaries of the four areas, however, are very clearly recognized and Chiwalo realizes the limits of his jurisdiction. Though he may arbitrate in a difference between headmen, he would not dare to apportion land outside his area. Headmen living on the boundaries of two chiefdoms arbitrate in each other's cases; the villagers under them intermarry. A village in Chiwalo's may
621 procure garden lands in Jalasi's area, and children may be initiated
631 at ceremonies held by headmen in other chiefdoms. There is no
643 clear break in the normal social relationships of people across the boundaries of chiefdoms, and their members interact as freely with each other as members of two villages of the same chiefdom. The cleavage between the villages on different sides of the boundary of a chiefdom becomes apparent only in special situations.

631 The formal relationships of the chiefs, set by the history of their conquests and their kinship, and incorporated in and slightly
643 modified by the Administrative framework, are overlaid by an informal local organization where the interaction of village headmen only conforms to the formal pattern when no agreement can be reached.

The Position of the Modern Chief

643 In ritual situations a chiefdom is clearly differentiated from its neighbours, and many of these situations arise in the cult of
769 tendence on the ancestor spirits. The ancestor cult has fallen
782 away almost completely among village headmen, but among the chiefs it is still strong, and appears particularly in the rain-prayers and the initiation ceremonies. Later, I shall discuss at length the importance of the chief's sanction before headmen may conduct initiation ceremonies. This is because the spirits of the ancestors of the chief are supposed to affect the welfare of the initiands. Though some village headmen may conduct initiation ceremonies they are unable to offer rain-prayers. These are offered by a chief on two occasions. The first is in November, before the rains have started. The chief's wife and some women from the bigger villages in the near vicinity of the chief's village gather at his hut. They brew beer—ukana wacisoka, the beer of the spirits—to be used as a libation. At sunset on the appointed day the chief goes to the shrine tree where some headmen have gathered, and pours some of the beer into a pot, partly buried at the root of the tree, while he invokes all the spirits of his departed ancestors—mainly matrilineal but occasionally some patrilateral. He then entreats the spirits to send some rain and to look after their 'children' in the land. Sometimes a length of calico is hung on the tree as an extra offering. Should no rain fall the chief will have to repeat the offering until it does fall. When the rains have ended in March he makes a second offering 'of thanks'.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

In the context of the present discussion, the important point is that it is only the chief who can make this libation and offer this prayer. If his plea fails the whole area starves, and no headman may supplicate his ancestors on his own behalf or approach the chief's ancestors through his own ancestors. The grain for the beer comes from the various villages, but not on a fixed rate of levy. Some villages never contribute. The chief buys the offered cloth on behalf of his people. When in 1948 the cloth on the shrine tree was stolen, Chiwalo imposed a levy on the village headmen in the area so that a new cloth could be bought. Here the boundaries of the chiefdoms are important, and no headman outside Chiwalo's area was approached. A village headman from Jalasi's area, though geographically much closer to Chiwalo, relies on Jalasi's rain-offerings and may not approach Chiwalo or plead with him to offer a rain-prayer to his ancestors.

Another ritual situation in which the limits of the chiefdom appear is during the institutionalized pillage on the death of a chief. I have not been in any area when the chief has died, so that I rely here on the tales of informants. During the mourning rites certain feasts are held. The food for the mourning feast of a commoner or village headman is provided from his estate

622 554 648 annuity. This recognition publicly announced their superior status, because not all headmen could be Administrative headmen. We do not know exactly how the Administrative headmen were appointed when the Ordinance was introduced. The observable results, however, are that no headman, as far as I am aware, who was of superior status in the indigenous ranking system, is not an Administrative headman to-day. Being an Administrative headman is then in itself an indicator of rank.

622 554 643 415 969 881 Rather more important than this is the right to hold initiation ceremonies. MacDonald says that these rights were held by the chief only, but it is not clear whether the word 'chief' used here refers to the village headmen or the 'chief of the land'. Nowadays, the rights are held by village headmen as well as the chief. The right to hold initiation ceremonies is signified by the possession of a small flat basket (ciselo) in which the oblational flour for the ceremonies is carried. When a chief grants a ciselo or oblational basket to a village headman, what in fact he does is to grant him permission to approach the spirits of his ancestors. The headman uses the basket on three occasions during the initiation ceremonies. First, before the ceremony is announced he pours a little cone of sorghum meal at the root of a special tree in or near the village. This tree is known as the nsolo, or the shrine-tree where all offerings to the ancestors are made. While he works the flour through his fingers to allow it to fall in a cone, he calls on his ancestral spirits and asks them to intercede on his behalf with the spirits of the chief's ancestors. He then formally requests permission to hold the initiation ceremony. This cone is left intact through the night. Should it collapse the interpretation is that the spirits are not willing that the ceremony should take place and it is postponed for some days. Offerings are made until eventually the cone, by remaining intact through the night, indicates that all propitious for the ceremony to be conducted. The second occasion when the oblational basket is used is when the village headman or chief goes down to the grass sheds where the rites of segregation and aggregation take place. Here he pours flour over a twig and begs the safe conduct of the initiands through this physically and mystically dangerous period. Third, each individual initiand, and his or her mother, is touched on the forehead and forearm with the flour on the evening that the initiands leave for the grass sheds. During who are sexually inactive from contracting ndaka.[1] At the same time the headman gives each household a piece of the fire which has been newly kindled in the traditional way by rubbing two sticks together.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

The mystical danger inherent in the act of setting up a new village is well brought out in the propitiatory prayer and the abstinence from sexual intercourse. Once again it is the village headman who must make the offering to his ancestors; and it is the village headman who has intercourse with his wife so that the effluvium from his sexual activity may permeate the medicine in the hut and so protect the villagers from ndaka. Lastly, it is very important that the whole village cooks and is warmed by one fire. 'We are of one fire' expresses the common origin of two villages; though in fact every time a new village is founded a new fire should be kindled. To bring fire from the village of origin is to bring sorcery, since the Yao believe that sorcery can operate between persons closely linked by kinship only. To have one's own fire is to be autonomous from other groups.

The Burdens and Rewards of Headmanship

MacDonald had the perspicuity to see not only that the village headman was the representative of a corporate group and that he represented this group to outsiders, but also that he represented external authority to his villagers. The village headman who in his person stood for the unity of the group, performed certain ritual acts which emphasized this, such as praying to the village ancestors. In spite of the decline of the ritual his position is still regarded as exceptional. Much, however, depends on the rank of the village headman. There may not be much difference in ritual observances and mystical dangers between a headman who has in his charge a meagre three or four huts, and a commoner. In the larger and more important

[1] This is one of the most important mystical concepts of the Yao. I have described this condition and its implications more fully in Marriage among the Machinga Yao of Southern Nyasaland (R.-L.I. Paper), forthcoming. Briefly it is a disease characterized by œdema which affects those who are sexually inactive when they are suddenly brought into contact with a person, or an object which he has touched, after having intercourse. The people most affected are the young and the old, i.e. those who cannot have sexual intercourse. Those who are capable of intercourse are expected to have ritual intercourse with a stranger, and so fortify themselves against this dread disease.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

Among the relatives of the largest order of kinship (cipapo) there is a bond only slightly more intimate than that among people who have the same clan-name. There are none of the jural and moral obligations which characterize membership of a matrilineage which is a part of a village. The larger group, for which there is no exact Yao term, may be looked upon as a maximal lineage. It is characterized by a relationship of a more definite bond than that of having a common clan-name, but the members may still marry.

The Matrilineage

It is within the village that the matrilineage operates most clearly. The distant matrilineal link which connects villages such as Cikoja, Mbande and Cibwana Kawinga, is set in a context of inter-village relationships and is therefore part of the political system. Within the village the matrilineage becomes a corporately acting group of a different dimension. It is in this order of lineage within the village that we have the set of relationships described by Professor Fortes as applying to the inner lineage[1] among the Gold Coast Tallensi.

The depth of a matrilineage within a village is seldom more than five or six generations from the founding ancestress to the new-born children. The name of the founding ancestress is remembered and the descent of each member of the matrilineage can easily be recounted. The ancestress is known as the likolo or lipata, words which also refer to the trunk of a tree. We have seen how at a headman's installation ceremony the image of a tree was invoked in describing the lineage.[2] We find it once again here, where the founding ancestress is seen as the stem or root from which all members of the lineage have sprung, and the various sections of the matrilineage are seen as the branches (nyambi). This symbol of the lineage appears also during offerings to the ancestors. The chief, or headman, in [1] See Fortes, M., Dynamics of Clanship among the Tallensi, Oxford University Press (London, 1945), and The Web of Kinship among the Tallensi, Oxford University Press (London, 1948). The Yao system of lineages is not the clearly segmented type of structure characteristic of the Tallensi. I hesitate, therefore, to use Fortes's terms, and use matrilineage for the localized unit which is usually a component of a village.

[2] See Chap. V, p. 119.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

621 making the oblation, pours the beer or sprinkles the flour at the 613 root (lipata) of a shrine-tree. As would be consistent with this 769 way of looking at the lineage, genealogically-distant ancestors are said to be 'below' (pasi), so that if a Yao wishes to say that a certain person was a matrilineal ancestor many generations back, he would say that he was 'very much below'.

The Concept of 'The Mother'

613 The matrilineal descendants of the founder look upon them-
562 selves as having been fed from the same breast and may express this by saying 'we are of one breast'.[1] Deep sentiment is 843 attached to the idea of the mother among the Yao. There is, for example, a sharp distinction drawn between those women who have had children and those who have not. When a woman becomes pregnant for the first time, she is given instruction in child welfare when she undergoes a special ceremony (litiwo). This is a ceremony which is publicly announced and attended by most of her matrilineal and other kinswomen and acquaintances. No woman may attend this ceremony if she has not herself had a baby. Thus her change in status in the community is clearly shown by the public recognition of her condition, and the fact that she is initiated into secrets which are shared by other mothers only. Her position in the lineage is much enhanced when she becomes a mother. It is the most important step towards becoming a village founder herself.

562 The concept of 'the mother', in general, also appears in the 601 boys' initiation ceremonies. Certain phases of ceremonies may be conducted only with the help of the women. They have to
881 clap the rhythm to which the 'tailmen'[2] do their dances. Here all women are classified as 'mothers' and without their co-operation the ceremonies could not be conducted. During the same ceremonies three women appear with baskets of food on their heads. The tailmen remove the baskets and sacralize the

[1] Tuli pelele pamo. The word nlango, a doorway, is also commonly used. The idea in essence is exactly the same. It is the concept of the children who come to settle around a woman's hut door. It is used as lisondo pamlango pao, the people of his lineage section.

[2] The m'mchim. These are the functionaries in the initiation ceremonies. They carry medicated zebra tails during these ceremonies, and this gives them their names. See especially Seamon, 'The Wayao of Nyasaland', 229 ff.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

contents. Here once again the women, though they may have no boys in the initiation ceremony, are called 'the mothers'. The ritual co-operation of the mothers in the initiation ceremonies is paralleled by that of mothers and sons in political affairs: here sons are in charge of the villages, while their mothers and sisters form the nucleus of the localized kinship group, which in turn is the core of the village.

The ritual importance of the mother is nowhere more clearly seen than in the curse. The Yao believe that a mother may curse her child if he or she is disobedient or otherwise beyond control. Not many mothers do curse their children; the threat to curse seems to be more often used. Informants have told me of some mothers who have cursed their children, and the procedure and the wording of the curse have always been very similar. It is usually not applied to young children who could be punished by other means, but to adults and particularly adolescents. Usually the mother lifts her breast and points the nipple upwards saying, 'If you have never sucked from this breast nothing dreadful will happen to you.' The consequences of this are greatly feared. Where I have been told of curses, each time the child has either died suddenly shortly after the curse, or at least it has gone mad. The curse is vaguely supposed to operate through the ancestor spirits, but I could get no clear statement on how this happens.[1] Whatever the cause, however, the symbolic action of lifting the breast and the dire effects which are supposed to follow from this, indicate the importance of the mother in the lineage.

The Yao attach this sentiment, in general, not only to the mother, but also to all senior matrilineal female relatives. In general speech all female members of the matrilineage in ascending generations are 'mothers', and all members in the descending generations are 'children'. This fundamental relation of mother and child extends throughout the lineage. The Yao term ninamgolo, used for the senior female members of the matrilineage, embodies this idea of 'the mothers'. More specifically, as far as men are concerned, the matrilineage is classified into

[1] Further evidence that the ancestor spirits are involved in the curse may be that madness is called nambo—spirits—and that it may be said of a madman that the spirits are beating him (pikumpere nambo). A curse may be revoked by blowing water out of the mouth, an act which is also vaguely connected with the ancestor spirits.

613 members goes to an outsider and grumbles to him about the 754 family squabbles[1] and quarrels. The outsider then takes the 578 opportunity of using this squabble to introduce his sorcery into 626 the lineage. The Yao greatly fear backbiting because of their dread of sorcery and none dreads it more than a village headman, a warden of a sorority-group,[2] or a person in the position of having to keep a matrilineage or section together. These people are continually adjuring the women under them—for it is the women who are believed to be the main culprits—not to fight among themselves; and if they do, not to take their complaints to an outsider but to the senior member of the matrilineage. The significance of this in relation to lineage unity is plain enough.

613 Apart from sorcery, strained relationships between members of 578 a matrilineage are believed to be dangerous for other reasons.
843 Malice may adversely affect people who are in mystically danger-
224 ous states. The most common of these states is pregnancy. If a woman has a quarrel with a matrilineage member while she is pregnant she is likely to have a difficult labour. The Yao say 'the womb has heard these bad words'. Another situation where malice or quarrelling will cause difficulties is in hunting. The luck of the chase is capricious and malice may easily bring bad fortune to an otherwise good hunter. For example, a successful hunter once gave each of his two sisters a piece of venison. Each complained that the other had been given the larger piece and quarrelled vehemently about it for weeks. The hunter now found that no game fell into his traps. He went to a diviner who indicated the quarrel of the sisters as the cause of his failure and told the hunter to get them to 'blow water' (kuperye). He did this; good relationships were restored and his traps were filled once more.

613 These deleterious effects, like the curse, are connected in some 578 way with the ancestor spirits. This is sometimes expressed quite 761 clearly when a person is called upon to 'blow water'. A
755 mother who wishes to revoke a curse, a woman who wishes to recant her malice towards her matrilineal relative who is suffering in childbirth, or a man whose sister's son is ill supposedly because of his malice towards him, might equally be called upon to do this. The person makes a statement to the effect that he bears no malice and hopes that the sufferer will be well. For example, a woman in Cikoja village who was called upon to 'blow water' during the labour pains of her mother's younger sister's daughter's daughter,[1] because they had quarrelled over a sifting basket, put some water in her mouth, spat it out and said: 'Those words I spoke: the basket is mine. This is my child. Both are mine. When I spoke and asked my child about it, they were not words to place in my heart, so that to-day we should have to go to the diviner because my child is hitched[2] and be accused because of the sifting basket. These words I push aside. I do not know whether there are other words that we fought about, but if they are these, my daughter's child come out!'[3] Sometimes the ancestors are specifically invoked, 'Conde, conde ŵamasoka . . .' 'Please, please, O spirits . . .' This is a public confession of the tension within the lineage and it allows the lineage leaders to attempt to straighten out the difficulties, as they did in this case.[4]

[1] This is called mimi, which I have translated as 'backbiting'. This idea is extremely important, as we shall see later.

[2] i.e. those men who are responsible for their sisters and their descendants. See p. 143 ff.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

These beliefs in mystical dangers of one sort or another which beset the matrilineage as the result of bad feelings within it, have the effect of constraining matrilineage members to maintain peaceable relations among themselves and are, therefore, conducive to maximum solidarity.

It is clear from MacDonald's writings that in earlier times the periodic offerings to the spirits of the ancestors was a valuable way in which the solidarity of the matrilineage was expressed. With the introduction of Islam and Christianity these sacrifices have disappeared. I have not worked in Christian areas long enough to be able to say whether the ancestor cult still persists. In the northern area, however, I can say that the ancestor cult survives as part of the practice of Islam. Periodically, feasts are held in

[1] See the history of the division in Cikoja lineage, pp. 165-6.

[2] Kukolekwa, i.e. the child cannot be born.

[3] Une malolegala cicle cila cangwe. Aje mwamanga. Yenge pangwe. Pinawerenga nilunaya, hambaya mwamanga, nginiwe malolo gakwika hantima, gati ngaka kilo nilwenda hantanga cakolekwa mwamanga nilumkumula ma ligenga lya cicle. Cekge ngatatako. Kwalisi nagapili gati gwawe hangatile nambo nagapaga malolo gakwe, cimbala cangwe cikapoa.

[4] I have drawn attention to the cathartic effect of accusations of sorcery and public confession of guilt in a paper, 'A Note on the African Conception of Causality', The Nyasaland Journal, v, 2 (July 1952), 57-8.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

613 memory of the ancestors. These are called sadaka[1] and are similar to those held at the end of the mourning period. They 769 are usually held when one of the lineage members has had a 178 dream about an ancestor. The senior members are told of this and interpret it to mean that a feast in his memory should be held. The women cook a meal of mush and relish and on an appointed day the members of the matrilineage who live within a reasonable distance gather at the village of the senior section and share the feast. During this feast Islamic texts are chanted in Arabic. It is clear that in this situation the context of the meeting is exactly the same as that of the old offerings made by the lineage leader at the shrine-tree. The common ancestor is recalled and the matrilineage by meeting reaffirms its solidarity.

The Localized Matrilineage

613 The matrilineage may itself be localized in the form of a 621 hamlet or small village, as in Ali Kasunka village. It has 9 huts situated about half a mile from Chiwalo's court house in Kawinga's area. The genealogy, hut plan and census are set out in Appendix B. I summarize the genealogy here to show how the hut owners in the village are related. The village is about 300 yards across and about a quarter of a mile from the main road.

Ali Kasunka (C6),[2] the warden of the village, formerly lived in a village known by his mother's brother's name Mailo (B1). Ali Kasunka is the son of the chieftain Mposa in Kawinga's area. The village of Mailo still exists in Mposa area. Ali Kasunka and his sisters moved out of Mailo village and established a hamlet in Malemia's area near Zomba township. While they were there Ali Kasunka went to work as a domestic servant in Zomba. One day the sister of the cook in the household in which he was 595 working came down to visit her brother. She became Ali Kasunka's second wife (he was already married to a woman from Malemia area) and lived with him in Zomba. She was the daughter of the present chief Chiwalo, and was living at her

[1] Sanderson says that this is derived from the Arabic word sadaqa which means 'alms'. Sanderson, M., on 'Ceremonial Purification among the Wayao, Nyasaland', Man, xxii, 55 (June 1922), 92-5.

[2] The reference number is to assist the reader to identify the person on the genealogy in Appendix B.

3: Seamus D-6 (on. 1912) 1922 F77 Tan F77

then listens to an account of the circumstances attending the illness and death. The point at issue is whether there is any evidence pointing to death from unnatural causes which requires consulting a diviner. The chief practically always agrees with the relatives, and it is said that he will never press them to go to the medicine-ceremonially. The ceremony ends with this conference, or here may begin the long series of events described under ushiri.[1] 768 632

During the month subsequent to the funeral, certain taboos have to be observed. The widow may not bathe, and with the exception of the mulu, all who attended must refrain from sexual intercourse. At the expiration of this period, beer is brewed in the village, and all the friends and relatives are again summoned. This beer-drinking is called "the beer of mourning," or "the beer of resignation." In addition to the beer, food is provided, and everyone helps himself without ceremony. Chindimba is sung and danced and at the present day, bands of trained dancers attend, including ching'ungung'ungu.[2] A pot of beer is sunk into the ground, marking the site of the dead man's house. The night of mutopola[3] sees husbands and wives reunited, and the widow may go through ceremonial intercourse with a man appointed for the purpose called lituwa or mbili. Sometimes the widow refuses lituwa, and is given medicine instead to cleanse her; her body is then no longer "hot" and likely to bring disease to those about her. A widow does not marry again for two or three years. A young man who loses his wife has no longer any standing in her village after mutopola. He is usually given a present, with the suggestion that he go elsewhere. After the death of an infant, the mother is considered unclean. She sleeps on a mat apart from her husband till after the ceremony of shaving, and then undergoes a ceremonial coitus with her husband — in which case he is called lituwa — after which, ordinary cohabitation is resumed. If she has been a widow, or if the child was born "with disease,"[4] another man acts as lituwa. 765 763 [833] 587 768

The morning following mutopola, all the fires in the village are extinguished. A fresh blaze is then kindled with the fire-drill, kumuya, either in the chief's house or in some spot nearby, and from there, fire is carried to all the houses. The ashes of the old fires, the stones supporting the cooking pots, and the porridge sticks are taken to the cross-roads, and there destroyed. Everyone then shaves all his own hair, head, axillae, and pubis. The custom of the second shaving by the mulu, described in Africana,[5] is, I think, an importation from the Anyanja. A year later, beer is again brewed, and all the relatives summoned to the village to partake of it. There is dancing, but no ceremony. 769 ● [372] [302]

The Yao bury their dead in regular graveyards in wooded country, the thicker the forest the better, often two or three miles away from a group of villages. Different villages bury their dead in different parts of the burial ground; relatives are usually buried near one another. Graves are never revisited, and no one would enter a graveyard except at the time of a funeral, and then only after obtaining permission from the chief. Such spots are 764 769 supposed to be the abode of spirits. Except in the case of chiefs, the Wayao never make any structures over their graves, like the Anyanja grass shelters, and the present-day Mohammedan earth imitations of Swahili tombs.

[1] Vide infra, p. [illegible]. [2] Beer-drinking. [3] Murdoch, op. cit., p. 111.
[4] Vide infra, p. [illegible] and Pl. I. [5] Vide infra, p. [illegible].

3:Sudan D-5 (ca. 1912) 1932 FT7 Yao FT7

Chiefs, and the more important headmen, are usually buried in their own villages. Over the grave, a grass hut with a veranda is erected; the hut is covered with calico, and guns were formerly set in as veranda posts. Guns and ivory used to be buried with the corpse but these Yao, I am told, never practised the barbarous custom of burying slaves with their chiefs. Information of the death of a chief was always conveyed to other chiefs by slaves who were kept by the recipient of the message.

Since the time of the old Makanjira, the corpse of a chief always lies with its head in the direction of the old chief's grave. The grave is swept around, and the house pulled down as in the case of an ordinary man, but the grave-hut is rebuilt every year and never forgotten.

Since the burial of the dead is more or less correlated with the idea of planting seed from which progeny will spring, the natives will not bury a leper, believing that if they did so, leprosy would spring up all around them. Persons dying of an epidemic disease such as small-pox are dealt with in the same way. In these cases and in that of a man dying of ordeal poison, the body is enclosed in a mat and put up in a tree, a manner of disposing of the dead common among the Angoni and some Anyanja. Concerning death from dropsy, similar precautions are taken to those in the instance of a woman dying in childbirth,[1] and a tube is put down to the body from the surface of the ground.

A leper feeling that the end is near, will ask to be put in a hut built outside the limits of the burial ground. Here, provided with water and food for a few days, he will wait to die near the graveyard wherein he knows he cannot be buried.

Anyone who is wounded with a spear or any other weapon is not taken into the village, but is kept in a hut in the bush. If death results, the mourning ceremonies differ somewhat from the ordinary rites and are much curtailed.

Initiation Ceremonies. Under this heading I propose to deal with the three ceremonies, Lupondo, Chipale and Litiso. They are ceremonies of great importance in the life of the native and their educative effect for the good of the tribe is far reaching.

At Lupondo (Wilapula) the young boys attend; at Chipale the young girls go through their initiation and a side ceremony for young married men takes place, while Litiso celebrates the first quickening with child. All the ceremonies are included in the word Unyago. Macdonald in Africana while referring to "the mysteries"[2] gives scant information about the ceremonies and has, presumably, without much knowledge of what goes on, condemned these customs like many others as furthering "absurd superstitions." He has failed to recognize that they are occasions when a large amount of useful advice is imparted, good manners are insisted on, and tribal custom is made known. Sexual questions are dealt with in these mysteries, and, though mixed up with a large amount of superstition, a

[1] This myth, p. 256. [2] Op. cit., vol. 2, ch. 2.

3: Stanner D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Tao FT7

There has never been any shortage of land and therefore the planting out of gardens was a matter which caused little trouble. A man wishing to make a new garden the next season simply marked the site in the bush by cutting some trees or leaving around some patches of grass and tying the grass ends into a knot. If anyone else came along and heard this plot, the man who had marked it out still claimed it and need not pay for the losing down. Whenever a man was doubtful about a piece of land, he would ask advice of the headman of the village. 423

When an abandoned garden had become overgrown, anyone wishing to take it up applied to the headman who sent him to ask the original owners whether they wished to take it up again. The newcomer could take possession only with their permission. 361

Often if a village were moved, during the first season the people simply put up shelters in their gardens. Later, the site of the village was chosen and around it a medicine was sprinkled medicine to insure happiness and prosperity. The tree from which this medicine was made became sacred to the village and might not be used for firewood, or was subject to any other taboo the medicine man might care to make. He might also say, "In this village there shall be no pounding of grain at night," etc. 423 [189] [178]

If a village were to be built near a spot previously inhabited, medicine and offerings were made to the departed spirits of the former occupants to put them at rest and "open" the place to the newcomers. The bone got from the grave of some former chief or headman, who was supposed to have directed the destinies of the old village, was brought to the new location and bone placed in it to insure his continued guidance. [361]

In the case of a village into which a number of men had married, the spouses of the wives went to the spouses of the husbands and asked permission to move the village. Later, beer was brewed in the new village and the spouses invited to come and drink and "put feet in the new village." [203]

Relationship. Family relationship among native presents certain difficulties to the European unaccustomed to equivalent relationship of males and females on both sides of the family. In the diagram below (Fig. 1) the relationship of the two children (C 8) will be found. The mother and father (B 10 and 9) are the mihlolo and mwa but are addressed as mwa and atati. The maternal males older and younger than the mother (B 11 and 16) are called ahombwa and their wives (B 12 and 15) ahongwa. The maternal aunts are addressed as mwa, mother, anyone older than the mother being distinguished as mwa mahokongwa, "the bigger" (B 13), a younger aunt as mwa nanondi, "the lesser" (B 17); their respective husbands are addressed atati, atati mahokongwa (B 14), and atati nanondi (B 18). On the father's side the males are called atati mahokongwa (B 1) and atati nanondi (B 5), respectively, for those older and younger than the father, and their wives mwa mahokongwa (B 2) and mwa nanondi (B 6). The paternal aunts are called atati mahongwa (female mother) (B 3 and 7), their husbands (B 4 and 8) atati. 593 601

* Vide supra, p. 200.

one is he "God the creator," of man or earth. He, however, receives the spirits of the dead. Should he refuse to do so, a man continues to live. When a man has recovered from some commonly fatal disease, the natives say, "Mulungu unkanile (refused him)!" or if he has been very near to death and then recovers, they say "Mulungu unamile (spat him out)". 776

It would thus appear that among the spirit hosts there is a regular law of precedence, and presiding over all is a supreme being, but all this is so remote as to have little importance for the living. The vagueness concerning Mulungu, I must admit, has given rise to some doubt in my own mind as to how far he was a deity with an entity of his own in their religion of a little time ago.

Ancestors tend to be forgotten in proportion to the length of time which has elapsed since their death, unless they played some important part during their lives: then some particular one may be remembered to the exclusion of others, and to him prayers of intercession are offered. In the case of chiefs, the names of a long line of rulers may be remembered on occasions when all else about them has fallen into oblivion. It seems possible originally Mulungu was the oldest ancestral chief who was raised up as a supreme being but who, in the process, has lost all other attributes. On the other hand, the word often refers only to the place where the spirits dwell; this may have been the original meaning. 769 776

There is no religious worship in the proper sense of the term but only propitiation, prayer for intercession, and return of thanks for favors granted. The keynote of this ancestor worship, the sum total of their religion to the exclusion of the belief in a supreme being, is fear. We have seen at the funeral that everything is done to lay the spirit at rest. The people wish never to hear of the spirit again. It is chiefly with a view of averting some evil that worship takes place or with a view of expiating some crime that sacrifice is made or to alleviate some suffering that communication is sought with the spirits. It is a question of, "Do us no harm, do not vent your wrath upon us for what we have left undone," rather than "Keep us from doing evil, save us from being our own enemies." It would appear to be a religion of spite, not of love and kindness, though there are glimmerings of a search after "a hand to guide and protect," as in the prayer given below and also in the action taken when removing a village. 769 [771]

As a corollary of this system of ancestor worship, there is no real priesthood. A man asks for favors for himself; the head of a family petitions a deceased father or some more remote ancestor of greater importance; the headman intercedes on behalf of the village with the spirit of a predecessor; a chief takes the place of high priest on the occasion of a tribal supplication to a former ruler, though he may be replaced by some one of his wives who acts as intermediary. [773]

Some form of sacrifice is offered with the prayer, and often some omen is sought as a sign that the prayer is granted. For this purpose, flour made from millet called ulupani (ucuzile, Chin.) is commonly used. The word ulupani probably includes any sacrificial offerings.

769 484 787 A man leaving his village on some expedition and wishing to be assured of safe conduct will procure some millet flour. Going quietly into his house, he squats down in one corner and gently sifts the flour through his hand so that it falls on the floor in the form of a little cone, repeating as he does so, his prayer for safe conduct beginning and ending with the word chonde! please!

[539] "Chonde! chonde! wa-ku-mdanga ambaje mlungwaje nawa gwaje nilinawa
"Please, please! those at above ancestor chief eyes mine that I may see lilole, ngwiche 'chawaw kungwije, chonde! chonde! chowonde!"
the path, may I arrive well where I go, please, please, please!"

He then covers the cone of flour with a basket. On the morrow, he will uncover it to see what has happened. According as the cone has remained intact or has fallen to one side or the other, the omen indicates whether or not the journey should be undertaken, the reaction being caused by the spirits to whom his supplication was addressed.

769 Again, there may have occurred much sickness in a village and the people conclude that the pest has come to remind them that they have not been attentive to their deceased chief. "His grave-house in the village has been allowed to fall into decay," and so on. They will decide that his spirit must be propitiated. The grave-house is rebuilt, a pot is sunk in the ground, and beer is poured in, and round about heaps of flour are placed. Prayer is made to the chief at whose grave they are worshipping, supplicating him in person and "all others who are with you at Mlungu," asking that he will no longer cause ill to befall the village.

When a village is moved, the beer-pot from the grave of the old chief is taken to the new village and a ceremony similar to that just described takes place, with the prayer that he will come to the new village and continue to exercise his benevolent care over his people.

731 769 In 1890 when there was a threatened famine on account of long drought in Ecuba district, Malemya decided that supplication for rain must be made to the spirits of his illustrious predecessors. Kasunga, one of Malemya's wise men, acted as high priest. A large amount of beer was brewed and the night before the ceremony, twenty sheep and fifty goats were slaughtered. Plates of the meat, of rice and porridge were then placed on the ground round the grave-house of the old Malemya, and pots of beer set into the ground at intervals. At the head of the grave, little heaps of mbopai flour were arranged. This flour had been prepared by such of Malemya's wives as were not near a menstrual period. The following morning, a fence was built round the grave, outside which all the people collected, while beyond them again was a second fence. Kasunga, accompanied by an assistant then appeared, and amid absolute silence entered the inner enclosure. He addressed to the old Malemya, at whose grave they were all assembled, a prayer for rain. He then repeated the prayer, invoking the aid of all the past line of chiefs down to the reigning Malemya, repeating their names. Returning to the outer enclosure, he again uttered the prayers, all the assembled multitude repeating them after him while lying face down, resting on their knees and elbows, at intervals swaying their bodies from side to side and clapping their hands. Kasunga then ordered all to go and bathe, men and women separately. As they returned from the stream, rain began to fall.

[546]

3:Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

516 731 769

755 769

Intercession on behalf of the sick may be made, especially by anyone who is likely to be accused of causing the illness by witchcraft.[1] The man standing with arms outstretched, downwards and a little in front of his body, the hands supine, takes some water in his mouth and discharges it in a stream on the ground, (probably as a sign of purification of his tongue), and then invoking "all the spirits above," asks that they will intercede to restore health to the sick man and bear witness to his own innocence of any wish to do the sick man injury. Ku-penga is the word meaning to offer sacrifice and prayer.

769 241 782

Harvesting and hunting are occasions when sacrifices may be offered. It was formerly the custom for the chief to determine the day on which harvesting of millet should begin. On the day appointed, a big drum was beaten in the village and word passed round; then everyone would go down to his garden, gather a head of millet, and bring it back to the village where it was all handed over to the chief's headwife. After drying and threshing, a little of the grain was laid at the grave of an old chief by one of the reigning chief's advisers, the remainder being again distributed to all the people gathered together in the village meeting-place, who ate it raw. After this ceremony, harvesting began.

In passing through a millet garden, if a child asks his mother to give him some to eat, she plucks a bunch or two and reverently laying one at the foot of a mawo tree for the spirits or at the base of some other tree, if she cannot see a mawo, she gives the rest to the child.

782 224

When a hunting expedition makes its first killing, part of the flesh of the animal is laid at the base of a tree as a thank offering to the spirits and in anticipation of further favors to be conferred. All such offerings are supposed by the natives to be partaken of by the spirits, though they are well aware that they do not actually diminish in quantity. There is an interesting point in this connection: any man who has acted as ubile (undertaker) to some well-known man may appropriate these offerings. In the case of the hunting offering, he will run round the tree, saying, "I am a hyæna, the spirits will not mind me," and will then take part of the flesh-offering and eat it.

In the same way, a ubile may drink from a grave beer-pot after three days, when the spirits are supposed to have taken what they want.

824 778

With the exception of the mawo tree above mentioned (mkwa, Chin.), and possibly another called mulo-ngoma (Chin.), which is never used as firewood and which is supposed to be used by nsumi, I do not think there are any sacred trees properly so-called. Miss Warner supposes that many of the big trees (often a species of Ficus) in villages are sacred.[2] The truth is, I believe, simply that a village is made naturally round a big tree which conveniently offers its shade for the village meeting place. The spirits of deceased chiefs may

[1] Vide supra, p. 300.

[2] The natives of British Central Africa, op. cit., p. 40.

3:Stanner D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

539

18. Chambuge, wetile ngunga ndisi!
Chambuge, they ate guinea-fowl raw!

An expression depending for its meaning on the story given below, used by a husband to his wife or by one woman to another, intimating that the woman has delegated her work to some one else and is not looking after things properly. A man killed a guinea-fowl and gave it to his wife to cook. She, however, gave it to her servant, Chambuge, to cook in the house while she sat doing nothing on the veranda, calling from time to time to know whether it was cooking well, to which always came answer in the affirmative, "eh." When the meal of porridge was ready in the evening, and she went to get the guinea-fowl from the pot in the kitchen, she found that it lay in the pot in cold water as her servant had only put one handful of grass to make the fire under the pot and then left it.

19. Ku-n'mdike nungule akunapusi
By holding a torch shift (to see if the hare was asleep) before it had lain down!

An expression used to a man who by precipitate action without due caution loses that which he seeks to gain as in the following case: If a man seeks a girl in marriage whom he wants to take to live with him far away in his own village, instead of himself settling in her village according to custom, he must not let this be known or he would be refused.

20. Walonjo mtile!
(Your wife) she is showing the porridge stick!

An expression used to a man who is henpeck.

21. Mtu wa kalumbale!
(He has or you have) the perseverance of a mitar!

An expression used to anyone who keeps on asking for something and is a nuisance.

22. Mkapusi kapulungu ka mwa ni ku ndunya kumbusi!
The flour (ought) to be painted on the forehead and on the back of the head also!

Mkapusi is the offering of millet flour to the departed spirits, or as here, the sacrificial flour used by the chief to smear the front and back of the head of each boy at the end of the initiation ceremonies. The meaning of the expression is that "one should not only look forward to the good things of the future but also remember all the help that has been given one in the past." [769]

23. Mkwajingle mwa'wenile ngumbu pa tuku!
He who comes and goes and comes again they shot him with an arrow in the buttocks!

Of which the meaning is "a man may do wrong once but if he continues to do so, he will suffer for it."

24. Lipulume kpumbile ulula!
The pig was made a scapegoat (on account of) the gleanings!

A pig who was found picking up the remnants of a crop in a field which had been reaped, was thought to be the thief and killed.

7: Hetherwick M-5 (ca. 1900) 1902 FT7 Yao FT7

present fortunes. But it is to the human soul after death, when it is considered as having an influence on the lives and fortunes of those it has left behind in the world and consequently as a power to be propitiated and honoured, that the term mulungu is more strictly applied. Freed from the body it passes to mulungu, and there is regarded as endowed with powers which it never possessed when alive on earth. To pray to such a spirit is described as kulomba mulungu, to worship mulungu, never kuabo in this case. Such mulungu worship enters largely into Yao religious or social life. In almost every Yao village there will be found a shrine which is the centre of the worship of the inhabitants. It consists of a carefully built hut enclosed within a strong grass fence or hedge of a species of cactus plant. The hut itself is built of the usual native materials—the walls of wooden posts, bamboos, and strong reed grass bound together with bark-rope and plastered over with clay or stiff mud. The roof is of grass laid on a framework of bamboos, and is generally covered with long strips of white or coloured calico. On the ridge or apex of the roof are fixed a couple of flags or an umbrella or two. One wall is usually left open so that the interior is easily seen. Within, from the bamboo rafters are suspended handkerchiefs, cloths, bunches of beads, etc., all offerings to the mulungu of the dead headman or chief from his friends and relatives. The floor is of clay carefully smoothed with sand in native fashion. A raised platform or mound of earth in the centre marks the spot where the grave was made. The ambo or officials who preside at the funeral obsequies, first dug for about 8 or 10 feet down in a perpendicular direction, and then on the western side of this well they hollowed out a shallow cave in the earth. In this the body was placed, laid on its side with the knees bent up under the chin, and the face turned towards the east. Various articles of personal property were next placed beside the corpse, clothes, ivory, guns, axes, hoes, etc., and the mouth of the cave closed up with wooden posts and a strong reed mat. The grave was then filled in and the surface carefully finished as we have seen. At the head of the mound a native pot was fixed in the ground for the reception of the offering of beer which is an almost invariable accompaniment of any act of worship paid to the mulungu of the dead.

Such a shrine marks the grave of almost every Yao chief or headman, and is regarded as the abode of his soul or the spot where his mulungu is most accessible. If his successor is about to undertake a long journey or enter on any warlike expedition against an enemy or neighbour, he must first kutopa mlopwi, place an offering here to secure the favour and assistance of the mulungu of the dead. Should a long-continued drought endanger the prospects of the grain crop, the departed chief must be solicited to send the lacking rain. A feast is first prepared, almost always of beer, sometimes with the addition of native porridge, fowl, or goats. The worshippers gather round the shrine bringing part of the food which they have prepared. Their priest for the occasion is the successor of the dead chief, sometimes one or other of the ambo who placed the body in the grave, or it may be that any other near relation of the dead man is chosen to represent the people and act as their spokesman. The nearer the relationship the more influence will he have with the dead.

7: Hetherwick M-S (ca. 1900) 1902 FT7 Yao FT7

with the dead. He approaches the shrine, opens the gate of the fence, takes a 769 pottful of beer and pours it into the pot at the head of the grave. Next he places the basket of porridge and the plate of meat on the mound beside it and retires. Kneeling down outside the gate facing the shrine and a few yards in front of the people he chants his prayer in a monotone, each petition commencing with "Chonde, chonde," "Please, please." All the while the people clap their hands in unison with him and sing the responses as they do in a native case in the chief's court.

When the offering has been made at the grave, the rest of the beer or other food is consumed by the worshippers. Guns are fired as a token of respect to the [535] dead, and the rest of the day is spent in dancing.

Such shrines are to be seen in almost every Yao village where the inhabitants 778 have been located for any length of time. They are regarded with awe—the little 769 boys as they pass whisper to each other in a warning tone, "masoka." Should the village be moved to any other district, the old shrine is not forgotten. Periodical visits are made to it with the usual offerings. In cases where the old home has been occupied by a people hostile to the old inhabitants, such visits are usually made during the night, and the people awake in the morning to find that the old chief's grave in their midst has been newly repaired, and a fresh offering of food placed at its head.

Sometimes such shrines are found on the summits of hills which once may have been a refuge from the enemy in times of war, but which now lie lone and deserted. Thither in their need the people make their way with their offering of food and beer, and their prayer for rain or suitable weather for the crops. Near Blantyre such shrines are to be seen on the tops of Mount Sochi and Mount Michiru. The former is the abode of the spirit of Kankomba, and the latter of Mpalale, both old Mawri or Mang'anja chiefs who doubtless fled there seeking safety from the war of the invading Yaos, and died leaving their mizimu to be the mulungu or spirit of the mountain. Some years ago, during the fear of an Angoni invasion, the Yaos of Mount Sochi fled to the hill-top for refuge, and there the old chief Kapeni died. He was buried close to the grave of the old Kankhomba, and now, when the Yaos on Sochi make an offering, it is to the spirit of Kapeni that the homage is paid, and the shrine of Kankhomba lies neglected.

Only the graves of chiefs or headmen are thus treated as shrines of worship 554
The burying places of slaves and the common people lies away in the thick bush, 764 where only the rank grass or the thicker of old trees marks the spot. No offerings 769 are ever taken there, for such as are buried there can have no influence in the 778 spirit world. The dead are buried, the broken pot or basket is left on the grave to mark the spot, and none ever seek to go there save to lay another in the same neglected ground.

II. But the word mulungu is used by the Yao with a wider application. 776
Etymologically the word is connected with the root kulungwa, which in so many 197 of the other branches of the Bantu tongue appears as kulu or kuru, and signifies 192
"great" or "old." It is the same root which appears in the Kafir word for God,

7: Hetherwick M-5 (ca. 1900) 1902 FT7 Yao FT7

Unkulunkulu, which may therefore be rendered as "The old, old One," or "The great, great One." A like rendering may be given of the Yao form mulungu, the "Old One," or the "Great One." In this or a modified form mungu (Swahili) it appears in all the Eastern group of the Bantu tongues as the equivalent for "God" (see Father Torrend's Comparative Grammar of South African Bantu Languages). To trace it as Father Torrend does to any connection with Moloch, the god of the Phœnicians, is to attach undue weight to a chance coincidence of sounds.

As we have already seen, the word mulungu is applied to the human kuolo when regarded as an object of worship, or as an inhabitant of the spirit world. But it is also used to denote that spirit world in general, or more properly speaking, the aggregate of the spirits of all the dead. The plural form of the word is rarely heard, unless when the allusion is made to the souls in their individualities. In its native use and form the word does not imply personality, for it does not belong to the personal class of nouns. Etymologically it is classed with the leg, heart, arm, head, etc., of the human frame. Its form denotes rather a state or property inhering in something, as the life or health inherent in the body. Among the various tribes where the word is in use as we have described, the missionaries have adopted it as the term for "God." But the untaught Yao refuses to assign to it any idea of being or personality. It is to him more a quality or faculty of the human nature whose signification he has extended so as to embrace the whole spirit world. Once after I had endeavoured to impress an old Yao headman with the personality of the Godhead in the Christian sense of the term, using the term Mulungu, my listener began to talk of "Che Mulungu," "Mr. God," showing that originally to him the word conveyed no idea of the personality I was ascribing to it.

And yet the Yao approaches closely to the idea of personality and a personal being, when he speaks of what mulungu has done and is doing. It is mulungu who made the world, and man, and animals. Far in the interior of the continent, toward the north-west, beyond the plains and swamps of the Lengwe River and Lake Bangwelo, there lies, in Yao legend, an island in the midst of a lake called Kapirilimya. On that island there is to be seen a large flat rock marked by the footprints of men and animals of all kinds. When that rock was once a heap of moist clay, mulungu created all living things and sent them across the soft mass, where their footprints remained to be afterwards hardened into the imperishable rock. Such is the Yao legend of the creation of the world, and mulungu is always the Great Creator.

Mulungu is also regarded as the agent in anything mysterious. "It's mulungu," is the Yao exclamation on being shown anything that is beyond the range of his understanding. The rainbow is always "mulungu," although some Yaos have begun to use the Mang'anja term "uta wa Lowe," bow of Lowe.

Offerings are made to the spirit world or to mulungu as the great agency in the affairs of human life. Outside the village, or beside the headman's hut, may often be seen a rough shed. In this are placed the first-fruits of the new crop, green maize, beans, pumpkins, peas, etc., as a thankoffering from the villagers for their harvest. This is described as kulomba malungu, to worship malungu. At the foot of the tree in the village courtyard, where the men sit and talk or work, an occasional small offering of flour or beer is placed on any special occasion in the life of the village or any of its inhabitants. This also is kulomba malungu. A devout native sitting down to a meal will, before beginning to eat, take out a small morsel of the food before him and throw it at the root of the nearest tree as an offering to malungu. On a journey a traveller will sometimes stop and lay a little flour in a pyramidal heap at the foot of a tree by the wayside or at an angle where two roads meet. This, like the others, is for malungu, the spirit world, the guardian of the wayfarer on his journey.

7: Hetherwick M-5 (ca.1900) 1902 FT7 Yao FT7

Thus the Yao presents us with three stages of animistic belief :—

(1) The human lisoka or shade, the agent in dreams, delirium, etc.

(2) This lisoka regarded as malungu, and an object of worship and reverence, the controller of the affairs of this life, the active agent in the fortunes of the human race.

(3) And lastly, malungu as expressing the great spirit agency, the creator of the world and all life, the source of all things animate and inanimate.

And yet between these three conceptions of the spirit nature no definite boundary line can be drawn. The distinction in the native mind is ever of the haziest. No one will give you a dogmatic statement of his belief on such points.

It is only through long association with them in their daily life noting actual expressions of opinion or hearing of definite acts in relation to their worship or their dead, that one can get behind the reserve with which every Yao man or woman approaches or alludes to the spirit world which lies beyond and after this.

643 782 fice to the ancestors. The other public occasion was at initiation ceremonies. A successful initiation, i.e. one in which the initiates were not beset by misfortune, depended upon the goodwill of the ancestors of the chief. Initiates therefore gathered at the chief's court-village before the initiation, when the sanction of the spirits was asked and the initiates severally blessed. After this they scattered to the bush-schools near their villages only to return when initiation was completed and the chief received them into tribal society.

643 769 The people who had submitted themselves, willingly or unwillingly, to the rule of a chief, in turn expected certain services from him. He provided them, as we saw, with mystical protection through his ancestors. On a more pragmatic plane he was able to arm and co-ordinate military forces thereby giving his people protection from attack. Within his area of rule he was a common person of final appeal in the regulation of relationships of his subjects.

In these various ways, by propitiating his ancestor's spirits on behalf of his subjects, by settling differences between subjects, by co-ordinating defence and in fact by being a unique personality in the area, the chief became the symbol of unity of his tribal group. The symbolism was clearly noticeable on the death of a chief when a short period of social disorganisation called cipinimbe followed. The members of the chief's village were allowed to pillage and to commit rape and other criminal acts without suffering legal action. The demise of the symbol of unity was followed by a period of disunity before the appointment of a successor restored the status quo.

622 [769] At the same time much of what has been said about the chief was true also of important village headmen. Village headmen also made sacrifices to their ancestors but only in domestic or village affairs. They too built up their prestige by slaving. Many villages in Southern Nyasaland to-day swept up, the ground round the houses is hoed clean, and the interiors remodelled. (364) Ceremonial beer is brewed by the head-wife of the chief, and after this has been drunk the ashes of the fire used in the brewing are carefully collected and taken to a mulabana ("cross-roads," or "diverging of paths") where they are deposited. (763) The chief, as representative of his people, bathes in special medicated water, a (627) decoction made from the bark of ng'ungu and mbuna, and the root of ngungu. (622) This completes the ordinary annual ceremony, at which new fire is not made.

10: Sanderson D-5 (ca. 1920)1922 FT7 Yao FT7

796 THE WHOLE VILLAGE IS THOROUGHLY 'SPRING-CLEANED', ALL RUBBISH

On certain special occasions a more elaborate ritual is carried out; such occasions are the death of a chief, a threatened epidemic of infectious disease, a murder (especially by shooting) and the frequent occurrence of quarrels in the village.

In such circumstances, in addition to the ordinary pupila ceremony described above, the porridge sticks of the whole village are renewed and all fires extinguished. The discarded sticks and all ashes of the old fires are carried to the meeting of paths, where the former are stuck upright in the ground and the ashes piled together; (372) this is done in procession, all the people taking part. On their return to the village new fire is made by friction by either the chief or his younger brother—usually the latter; fire procured in any other way would nullify the proceedings. Finally (763) all the people bathe in the medicated water used only by the chief at the ordinary ceremony.

951 796 In addition to this special form of the pupila ceremony, another rite is sometimes performed after the occurrence of a murder or as prophylactic against the spread of epidemic disease. The doctor first makes a kind of trough (lukungwa) from the bark of mtondwendo or mpupu, and procures a chichiliko (or chipungulu) basket—used as a strainer in salt-making. Having collected his medicines he proceeds to the bank of the stream near the usual bathing-place of the village and digs a shallow hole, in which he places the basket; in this he puts the leaves of a certain thorny shrub and covers the whole with the trough, which is banked up with earth so as to be perfectly firm. He then puts his "medicines" into the trough; these are, first, the head of an iron hammer and a piece of slag, both from a smelting furnace. On top of these he puts pieces of the root of a certain tree which has many and particularly sharp thorns, and bits of bark from two trees peculiar for having very straight stems. Having distributed these evenly along the floor of the trough, he fills it with water and then proceeds to construct an arch over the end of the trough farthest from the stream. Two long poles, cut from a kind of tree particularly rich in sap, are planted in the ground, one at each side of the trough and close to it; these are bent over towards each other, and fastened together by means of a strip of their own bark. A bamboo is now planted alongside each, and similarly tied to its fellow. During all these preparations and throughout the ceremony it is essential that the doctor tie no knots in any part of his clothing.

The preparations are now complete, and when all the fires in the village have been extinguished the people go in procession to the spot where the doctor awaits them. All must be purely clad and must have no metal about them.

(622) The chief opens the ceremony. He steps into the trough and taking some of the medicated water therefrom in his hands he rinses his mouth with it. He then (763) offers a prayer to the spirits of his ancestors, first stating the emergency and detailing the measures which are to be taken to deal with it (new fires, sweeping, discard of porridge-sticks and shaving). The prayer over, he splashes the water in the trough over his body and passes through the arch, first throwing some gifts (beads or, in more modern times, money) into the trough. These gifts, presumably intended as an offering to the spirits, are the perquisites of the doctor, and everybody (765) is supposed to contribute in turn.

1: Tew E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

LAND TENURE

The rules governing land tenure were those which would be expected of a society which suffered from no land shortage. A man was entitled to as much land as he could cultivate, the limitation being that he should consult the headman as to his neighbours' boundaries. Abandoned gardens could only be taken up with the permission of the original cultivator.[1] 423

MAIN CULTURAL FEATURES

RELIGION

The Yao are largely Islamized. Codrington remarked that the perpetuation of this faith was distinctly antagonistic to British influence, and it received considerable attention from chiefs and headmen. Schools for the instruction of youth in reading and writing Swahili in Arabic characters were established in nearly every village, where also prayers were made at regular intervals in the day. The Moslem fasts and feasts were also observed, and the Yao were not inclined to embrace Christianity.[2] Their conversion to Islam did not take place till the nineteenth century, long after their first introduction to the Arab traders at Kilwa and Zanzibar, although they had adopted Swahili modes of dress much earlier.[3] 771 717

According to Hetherwick, Islam is strongest on the lake shore and on the east border of Nyasaland, chiefly round the old slave-trade centres. Makanjira's on the south-east side of the lake, and Domira Bay on the west, were the centres of Moslem propaganda. The Moslem population around Zomba and Blantyre consists mainly of Yao men, who have built themselves mosques in their own villages, or use the large mosques of Indian Moslem merchants. In the west districts, lower Shire, Ruo, central Shire, Lilongwe, Fort Manning, the Moslem population does not total more than 732. In the districts round Fort Johnston and Kotakota, the Moslems are one-ninth of the total population, while in Zomba district they number one-fifth.[4]

The Yao pagan religion was a form of ancestor worship. Apart from diviners and medicine men, there was no regular priestly profession. Intercession with the ancestors was performed by the chief, on behalf of the chiefdom, by the headman on behalf of the village, and by the head of the matrilineal kin for his dependents.[5] A man was qualified to approach his ancestors individually only if he had been initiated and had a house of his own.[6] 771 769

Some of the ritual duties of the chief have already been mentioned. When his people were visited by drought or epidemic, or when he fixed the day for the beginning of the millet harvest, he made an offering of flour and of beer poured into a pot in the ground at the grave of a dead chief. The village headman made similar offerings to the spirit of his dead predecessor. The spirits of the dead Nyanja chiefs, ousted by the Yao invasion, were regarded as still powerful in the homeland of their people. For instance, Kangumba, whose shrine was on Mount Soche, used to be appealed to for rain, and on the principle that the most appropriate mediator between a dead man and the living is a descendant of the former, the Yao chief, Kapeni, when he wished to propitiate 771 631 622 775 769

[1] Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, pp. 177-9; Sanson, 2, 1903, p. 180.
[2] Codrington, 1898, p. 316; see also Maples, 3, 1893.
[3] Young, T. C., 4, 1932, p. 37.
[4] Hetherwick, 4, 1922, p. 120.
[5] Watson, 1908, p. 270; Sanson, 4, 1910, p. 311.
[6] Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, p. 83.

3:Stanner D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

Tingilinga was another well-known performer; he used to do the same tricks as Kambanje. He also was possessed of an shuttle skin still is said to have been able "to tie his ears together behind the back of his head."

Mpachetula, a Yao of Mkanda, is a man with considerable renown. He is said to be able to produce a lion at will from a lion's tail and claw. He would offer to show this if there were any brave enough to go through with it. On a moonlight night, he would sprinkle on the ground in a cleared space near a village the tail of a lion held cross-wise in a piece of split bamboo. At the split end of the bamboo, he would place a lion's claw and round this, a woman's belt held in position by three bamboo pegs, around which he would draw a circle of mkapasi flour. Everyone would then withdraw to a hut in which the séance was to take place. After an hour or so, Mpachetula would send some one out to inspect the lion's tail where probably all would be found intact. He might then pretend to be uninterested and sleepy and suggest that some one should go out again in half an hour. Sooner or later, a man would come back, having found the tail gone; then everyone would go out to see what had happened. The pegs would be found in place but the tail and claw gone. A little way off, the split piece of bamboo would be found and further still a head or two from the woman's belt. These, Mpachetula would pick up, and leaving a little trail of flour on their way, all returned to the hut, while he whistled as if calling some one. Suddenly they would be aroused by the sound as of a lion brushing against the hut walls, as the beast-sign known to do, and next, a loud roar. Mpachetula would immediately open the door half-way so that the people could look out into the moonlight and there, a little way off, would be the lion. It would immediately advance towards the house and then, as it prepared to spring for the door, Mpachetula would offer it some of the flour in his left hand, armed with a stirring-stick, mtiko, in his right hand. As the lion landed, he would strike it on the head with the stick and lo and behold! the lion would vanish and the tail and claw would be found in his hand.

Superstitions. Scattered throughout these notes, particularly under Umwi and Dimwa, mention is made of practices which show a strong belief in superstition. Below are given a number of minor beliefs, and it is interesting to compare them with many well-known superstitions in other parts of the world.

1. A child who cuts the upper incisor teeth first will be unlucky. Such children used to be killed by the Yao. (Other tribes make medicine against the threatened ill-luck.)

2. A woman with polydactylism may not take food out of a corn-store. Otherwise the stock of corn will not last long. (Rudimentary sixth fingers are not uncommon.)

3. An insect called chiqaru mwi which lives in the mud at the bottom of pools, if killed causes the water to dry up.

4. If a boy puts a water-spider in the armpit when learning to swim, he will learn quickly.

5. A man wishing to prevent rain falling on a day he is making a journey, will wrap some of the leaves of the mimwani tree in his hair cloth and go without drinking.

1:Dilamma D-5 (ca. 1912) 1952 FT7 Tea FT7

6. It is believed that signs of guilt are visible in the eye of a murderer; medicine is procured in the hope of getting rid of these signs.

7. The possession of the hair of another person is supposed to give the possessor power over that person, hence a malicious man, when the patient he has been treating is cured, shaves the patient and keeps the hair until payment is made.

8. A native with light greenish-gray eyes is not to be trusted. He is said to have eyes like a cat and is called mojo-jiri; these eyes are rare among natives.

9. It is unlucky for a child to get into a basket; he may be burned.

10. Should a woman turn the porridge pot upside down, every one who has eaten will become constipated. For the same reason, a woman, after turning out the porridge from the pot, just touches the top of the mass of porridge with the bottom of the pot.

11. A woman will never leave the pounding stick in the grain-mortar. Should she do so the heavens would fall.

12. When a snake is killed, a knot is tied in its tail so that eating of the meat shall not cause indigestion.

13. It is unlucky to sit upon a basket, the mawale. The person would surely be bitten by a snake.

14. If a man committs murder, and his wife is pregnant at the time, she must sleep on the spear used.

15. Children are told that they must not eat at night; that if they are hungry, they must be quiet and try to go to sleep again. If they don't sleep and sit up eating porridge, a long hairy arm will come through the fastened door and beg for some, the voice of the woman saying:

> "Ngwa shimbwa'shwai swapa ni mjiwa!"
> "Give me that which you put to your mouth and throw away."

the repeated movements of the hand to the mouth (swa) and back to the pot being supposed to make the "hungry" think that they are not really eating but merely smelling and throwing away the food.

16. A male should not scrape the porridge off the porridge stick; this is only allowed to the woman. Should a man do so, it is supposed that when he goes hunting, he will hit anything he shoots at, only in the tail.

17. There is a saying that the men and boys may eat little pieces of porridge which fall out of the pot, while cooking, on to the supporting stones and it will give them power to escape unhurt from battle. The fragments are called upakyulu, (from ku-kyula "to escape").

18. Children are instructed to take their food sitting down instead of being in a hurry and standing to take it. They are told that if they do not obey, their porridge will not go into their stomachs but into their legs and swell out their knee-joints.

18. That portion of the gut of animals having folds of mucous membrane inside, may be eaten only by old people past the child-propagating age. If a young woman should eat it, she would have difficulty in labor.

19. It is believed that people who eat too freely of a little fish like whitebait called [illegible] get obstruction of the bowel by the wedging together of the bones. The treatment adopted is to pass up the rectum a smooth stick with a pad of rag at the end. This cannot be done by the person himself and so the aid of another has to be called in; only an intimacy, such as the relationship of brother-in-law gives, will warrant this service being asked.

20. The Tao believe that there is a little insect which lives in the ear, called shiyuwu hyihsuda, which tells the person what is said to him, the ear being its resort. The pupil is called mamuda jua kin, the child of the eye.

21. Among women, the uterus is called nawan (naw = eyes); it is supposed to be a little person who holds the foetus. When the child is born, nawan cannot find it and starts looking about, the movements causing the afterpains.

22. A man making his first journey to the coast used to sprinkle himself with water from every stream he crossed to give him a safe journey. In the same way, women at the present day going between Kotiba and Bhaiyyo sprinkle their babies with water from each stream.

23. An ant-like insect called wahyantuda (bwahtuwuda, Chin.) bhaghdiwa mayhuang is lucky. On seeing it a native pats his belly and then rubs his own, wishing for plenty of food that day. If he is embarking on a journey or beginning some enterprise, he will wrap one of these insects in a fold of his bila cloth and take it with him for luck.

24. When a native hears the wanja bird call (its call is like the mew of a cat), if he wants something, he immediately says, "Oh wanja, I want so-and-so. Be quiet and I will then be quiet, too!" If the bird ceases calling, he knows the wish will be granted. The female bird is said to be the more certain prophet.

25. The snake, nahshahat, which lives in trees and is of a buff clay color with green markings, is said by natives to pierce the chest and tie a knot in itself on each side so that it can only be withdrawn by cutting off one knot. When the snake is thus withdrawn, its blood mixes with that of the man and he will die.

27. Hajiwa have a habit of marking the spot where any event takes place by a stone by the side of the path, and every passer-by will add a stone for luck. In this way some large piles of stones have been made.

28. A man resting on his way home from a long journey places a stone in the fork between the branches of a nearby tree, so that on his arrival he may find his wife has put by some food for him and has not used up the day's stock of flour.

29. A shamadwa found digging in the path is said to presage the death of the Sultan's nearest relative.

30. If a chameleon is found holding on to the grass at both sides of the path, the path is "closed" and a man will turn back to his home and not proceed on his journey. It would be unlucky to continue.

31. Snakes seen in coils are a bad omen.

32. The slow-worm known as Shendula mungulu ("the entire open of not kills"), and the scaly ostrichs, if seen on the path, are of bad import.

33. To knock the toes against a stone on a journey is bad luck; if blood flows from the big toe, it points to good luck.

34. A man knocking the side of his foot against a stone knows that some one is speaking ill of him.

35. A person whose hands itch knows he will receive a present.

36. Tremor of the circumorbital muscles of the right eye indicates that something good will be seen. When the left eye is affected, the outcome is less sure.

37. The cry of the bird ngulubulu (the green turaco), indicates to the hearer that he is about to meet some one, either friend or enemy.

38. Anyone who kills one of the large ulule-lumeto (Phacochoerus) knows no chikuse chinjiga, will always be breaking the cooking pots afterwards.

39. The natives believe that the caterpillar of the Hippotion osiris moth will jump at the breast. It is called chiwombola mawele, "that which jumps at the breasts," and children seeing it will cover up their nipples with their hands.

40. Of Lizulu, the Mangoyoni, there is a saying:

"Lizulu gapwelelangwa ushiki"
"The hundred mangoyoni relieve each other (at) the meal"

It is said that mangoyoni assist one another when being hunted. When one is tired, a fresh one runs in so close to the pursuer that he goes after this one and leaves the tired one, and so they keep it up till the pursuer is exhausted.

41. Chiula, the frog. Children are told they must never kill a frog, or its spirit will come at night with porridge made of cassavaseed and make them eat it. If a small child playing with a frog kills it by mischance, he will tear off a small piece of his yellow cloth and place it by the frog as an offering.

42. Chinalinali (Mangoyoni, Chin.) the wound. It is said that the wound hides its body and leaves exposed its nose, so that a chicken seeing it, goes up to peck at it, whereupon the wound turns round quickly and catches the chicken with its mouth.

43. Chinyawa, the skunk (from ku-nya, to go to stool), so named on account of its odor, is said to apply the nose to a rat-hole and make wind. This will render inaccessible all the rats in the burrow and he can then dig them out at leisure.

44. Mlinzi, the honey badger, when hunted is always said to attack a man by attempting to seize the testicles. Natives when they hunt this animal, tie stones in their kilts clothes so that they hang down between the legs to defeat the badger.

3:Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT? Yao FT?

771 774 826 539

65. A child, when one of its milk teeth drops out, stands some five yards away facing the door of the hut and throws the tooth over the roof of the hut, saying:

"Al Mungulu kwe kwere ulye, ndewi kwenye kwalikwa 'ya"
"Oh! over tooth your there is, give me my of good one!"

Religion. The matter of the religious beliefs professed by natives of East Central Africa is one beset with many difficulties to the student of today. It has been the subject of many essays by workers in the missionary field, but the wide contact of the natives of Nyasaland with missionary effort during the past thirty years has done much to confuse the problem, and one feels that many missionaries in their writings rather color the picture with their own feelings. 771

I think probably the Yao with whom I am now concerned have a truer conception of their own beliefs than many of the subject tribes among whom mission teaching has more easily taken root. The religious beliefs of a people are to a large extent the reflection of the circumstances under which that people lives. The outstanding event to all natives is death. At death, something is lost to the body, without which life is impossible. This is the mzimu which may be translated "soul" or "spirit." The mzimu is said to leave the body of the dying man when he becomes moribund or unconscious. It appears that this same mzimu may leave the body during unconscious states unassociated with death, as when a man faints, in epilepsy, and during sleep. 771 761 774

Apart from this evidence of the dissociation of the mzimu from the living body, the Yao believe that a man's shadow is an objective manifestation of the soul and they will say "the shadow is the mzimu." Fear is experienced if a man jumps on the shadow of his fellow. Light is also thrown on the constitution of the mzimu by the belief in a certain evil-spirit which dwells in deep pools. It is called chimale-mzui, which means "one who may finish (drink up) all the water." The superstition regarding this evil spirit is that it can suck the blood from your shadow as you stand at the edge of the pool, till you become so weak that you fall in and are drowned. 774 774 776

After leaving the body at death, the mzimu goes to take up its place in the spirit-world, occupying a position corresponding to that held by the man during his life. With a truly materialistic conception, the soul is supposed to have all the attributes of the dead man, to be wealthy in proportion as the man was so on earth, and its relative position will be identical with that which he held among the living. The tribal chief becomes a paramount chief in the spirit world, the lesser chief holds sway in his lesser capacity, etc. We shall see that in intercession, when the tribe is threatened with calamities, it is the late paramount chief who is appealed to for help, and when one feudal chief is at war with another, the chief's dead predecessor will be called upon for aid. When a village is moved, it is from the spirit of the dead headman of the village that success in the enterprise is sought. Similarly, in family trouble, some dead ancestor is entreated to set things right, while a native 775

nor is he "God the creator," of man or earth. He, however, receives the spirits of the dead. Should he refuse to do so, a man continues to live. When a man has recovered from some commonly fatal disease, the natives say, "Mulungu wakanda (refused him)!" or if he has been very near to death and then recovers, they say "Mulungu wamenda (spat him out)".

It would thus appear that among the spirit beats there is a regular law of precedence, and presiding over all is a supreme being, but all this is so remote as to have little importance for the living. The vagueness concerning Mulungu, I must admit, has given rise to some doubt in my own mind as to how far he was a deity with an entity of his own in their religion of a little time ago.

Ancestors tend to be forgotten in proportion to the length of time which has elapsed since their death, unless they played some important part during their lives; then some particular one may be remembered to the exclusion of others and to him prayers of intercession are offered. In the case of chiefs, the names of a long line of rulers may be remembered on occasions when all else about them has fallen into oblivion. It seems possible originally Mulungu was the oldest ancestral chief who was raised up as a supreme being but who, in the process, has lost all other attributes. On the other hand, the word often refers only to the place where the spirits dwell; this may have been the original meaning.

There is no religious worship in the proper sense of the term but only propitiation, prayer for intercession, and return of thanks for favors granted. The keystone of this ancestor worship, the sum total of their religion to the exclusion of the belief in a supreme being, is fear. We have seen at the funeral that everything is done to lay the spirit at rest. The people wish never to hear of the spirit again. It is chiefly with a view of averting some evil that worship takes place or with a view of expecting some crime that sacrifice is made or to alleviate some suffering that communication is sought with the spirits. It is a question of, "Do as we have, do not vent your wrath upon us for what we have left undone," rather than "Keep us from doing evil, save us from being our own enemies." It would appear to be a religion of spite, not of love and kindness, though there are glimmerings of a search after "a friend to guide and protect," as in the prayer given below and also in the action taken when removing a village.

As a corollary of this system of ancestor worship, there is no real priesthood. A man asks for favors for himself; the head of a family petitions a deceased father or some more remote ancestor of greater importance; the headmen intercede on behalf of the village with the spirit of a predecessor; a chief takes the place of high priest on the occasion of a tribal supplication to a former ruler, though he may be replaced by some one of his wives who acts as intermediary.

Some form of sacrifice is offered with the prayer, and often some cause is sought as a sign that the prayer is granted. For this purpose, flour made from millet called ulupani (ucuzu, Chin.) is commonly used. The word ulupani probably includes any sacrificial offerings.

776 origin of mankind is explained in a story given elsewhere; Mulungu takes no part, nor is 773 the supernatural even invoked in explanation.

●791 The religion of the Tao may then be summed up as monotonic worship plus an ill-defined, uncertain belief in a supreme being. Their religion is not animistic. There are certain spirits of evil, demons, fairies and supernatural beings and animals which, however, do not play any real part in their religious beliefs.

531 Native Sayings. Natives are very fond of sayings, many of which are of the same nature as our own proverbs. The meaning of many of them is, however, not always self-evident but depends on some little story with a moral.

The following are some of those which I have collected among the Tao near Zomba:

1. Ahemula khumbule! (to Spoiler)
   Ho ungile a lak, (to mount)

An expression meaning "He slipped down." The variations being used when wet or when dry under foot.

2. Ciwoko ali m'maso!
   Crossing is in the eye (witches).

An expression meaning "Look out; some one is after us!"

   Kalulu chagawe!
   Rabbit be skinned!

This is a Mang'anja equivalent to the above.

3. Chenyerekwe mwakhalakhala mwiyowaki!
   A thing that did not listen they cooked in among the herbs!

An insect which had not listened to advice about the dangers of stirring on herbs used as vegetables, was gathered up by a woman and cooked with them.

An expression used with the sense "If you do not take advice and anything happens to you, it will be your own fault."

4. Mala ali m'maphewoka!
   Medicine is in the mat!

Meaning "You are forewarned; it is your own look out!"

5. Kangakwawa wamkulu akhalakhala!
   Mr Would-Be-Clever they left with the skull!

Ka-kakwawa, to be clever (to show off); an expression made to a newcomer who unbidden joins in a discussion. It has reference to the following story and means that anyone joining a party unbidden may find himself in an awkward situation. Some strangers came to a village, and after being given food and quarters, all retired for the night. One of them, however, Mr. Would-Be-Clever, hearing something going on outside crept out of the house to find out what was happening. Seeing some people playing at ninth-ball, he grass mats, beans, pumpkins, peas, etc., as a thanksoffering from the villagers for their harvest. This is described as kalombo mulungu, or worship mulungu. At the foot of the tree in the village courtyard, where the men sit and talk or work, an occasional small offering of flour or beer is placed on any special occasion in the life of the village or any of its inhabitants. This also is kalombo mulungu. A decent native sitting down to a meal will, before beginning to eat, take out a small morsel of the food before him and throw it at the root of the nearest tree as an offering to mulungu. On a journey a traveller will sometimes stop and lay a little flour in a pyramidal heap at the foot of a tree by the wayside or at an angle where two roads meet. This, like the others, is for mulungu, the spirit world, the guardian of the wayfarer on his journey.

T: Hetherwick M-S (ca.1900) 1902 FT7 Tao FT7

Thus the Tonga presents us with three stages of animistic belief :—

(1) The human kaulo or shade, the agent in dreams, delusions, etc.

(2) This kaulo regarded as mulungu, and an object of worship and reverence, the controller of the affairs of this life, the active agent in the fortunes of the human race.

(3) And lastly, mulungu as expressing the great spirit agency, the creator of the world and all life, the source of all things animate and inanimate.

And yet between these three conceptions of the spirit nature no definite boundary line can be drawn. The distinction in the native mind is over of the broadest. No man Will give you a dogmatic statement of his belief on such points.

It is only through long association with them in their daily life noting actual expressions of opinion or hearing of definite acts in relation to their worship or their dead, that one can get behind the reserve with which every Tonga man or woman approaches or alludes to the spirit world which lies beyond and after this.

to be initiated according to the Tao custom (kpanda). In general, the Nguru headmen are village headmen in the same way as the Tao are and they follow the same pattern in political behaviour.

At the moment, throughout the area, the various tribal groups live in kinship clusters so that under one Tao administrative headman there may be two or three unrelated Tao kin-groups and possibly one or two Nguru groups living quite separately. Though the population in the area as a whole is mixed, usually the village groups are tribally homogeneous. So far little inter-marriage has taken place. I shall not here analyse this situation, though it is politically pregnant. In many ways the Nguru immigrants are more progressive than the Tao. Most Tao in this area are professed Moslems and do not attend the local schools which are Christian. However, the missions have been more successful among the Nguru and they are becoming more educated and advanced. A good proportion of the Government posts in the area is filled by Nguru for this reason. This is more significant in the context of the general situation as will become apparent in the description below. For the rest of the paper I shall consider the political structure as I see it, in terms of the social personalities in the structure, and the presence of these non-Tao groups is implicit in the rest of this analysis.

V. The Political Structure

the Administration has persuaded the chief to pass and the full significance of which lies in a system of European values. These systems of values are foreign to each other in many features. Opposition between the two groups, White and Black, must arise if their behaviour is affected by different sets of values. The Tao, for example, believe that most deaths are caused by sorcery and claim the right to take punitive measures against the sorcerers. The Whites do not believe in this and prevent punitive action against people

11: Sanderson D-5 (ca. 1920) 1920 FT7 Yao FT7

RELATIONSHIPS AMONG THE WAYAO.

By Meredith Sanderson,
Medical Officer, Nyasaland Protectorate.

Introductory.—Various writers have attempted to give English equivalents to the Yao terms denoting relationship, or have alluded to the outstanding features of the system, but I am not aware that anybody has hitherto worked out the whole system. [12]

Although it is very similar to other classificatory systems, I feel that a description of it may not be quite valueless, more especially on account of the evolutionary changes that are taking place.

The WaYao are a Bantu tribe, exogamous but not totemic, which until the middle of the last century inhabited that part of Central Africa lying to the East of Lake Nyasa, particularly in the valleys of the Lujenda and Ruvuma rivers. Up to that time the tribe had not extended far from the area inhabited except perhaps in a southerly direction, but owing to constant intermecine war in their own territory the Yaos then invaded and conquered a large part of the neighbouring territories, especially to the south, in what is now called Nyasaland. [10] [3]

I have said that the WaYao are not totemic, and that statement is correct at the present time. Opinions differ, however, as to how recent their loss of totemism is; though their initiation ceremonies are generally regarded as totemic, even there, in my opinion, the evidence is not conclusive, and there remains no suspicion of totemism outside those ceremonies. [9] [11]

It should be mentioned that Islam is much more prevalent among the Yaos than among their neighbours, but its influence is not yet so deep-rooted as greatly to obscure the pure tribal customs, except to a certain extent among the rising generation. [19]

To facilitate description the relationships are given in tabular form, the relationship being given with reference to one man or woman. [18]

In Table I, Column 1 describes the relationship, Column 2 gives either the nearest equivalent of the Yao term, or, if none, the actual terms. Columns 3-6 give the various relations of the person named in Column 1, as they would be named by the man or woman under consideration. [6]

For example, the brother of (x)'s father (Column 1) is regarded as (x)'s father (Column 3), the wife of (x)'s father's brother is (x)'s alongo (Column 5), their child a his "brother" or "sister" (Column 6), and so on (see Table I).

Lwembe Mtungu is the prophet of Isoma, a man of great height who walks the round of the country, stepping from hill-top to hill-top along "the fairy way," the "Mlire wa Lwembe Mtungu," which is supposed to run right around Nyasaland and never to cross a river, starting and ending somewhere near the junction of the Shiré with the Zambezi river. As he goes, he can be seen from a hundred miles away. He carries the kalimba instrument and plays as he walks, singing:

"Kalimba [illegible] wapa [illegible] Indipa wanje [illegible] mutundu wamisha ndai"
"Two my wet (in trouble) with the midges therefore I must call up the wapa, this source of hunter!"

which might be rendered, "Two people grumble about small troubles, so I will teach you to know better by inflicting great ones." When he is seen, there will be famine.

It will be convenient here to allude briefly to some of the beliefs connected with meteorological phenomena, as some of them have a bearing on native religious beliefs. The remarks made under this heading for the Anyanja hold good for the Yao. The morning and evening stars are called Kwanidzo and Mwanyalenge, the good cook and the bad cook. They are looked upon as the two wives of the moon, one of whom feeds him so well that he grows fat, the other who does not, so he wastes away. The constellation of the Pleiades is called Nindu; the Milky Way, Lichinga mulu, "the watcher of the night," when high in the heavens, down in south. When shooting stars are seen, natives exclaim "mapolo ndajo!" Mapolo is a many-pointed arrow. Eclipses are recognized but no explanation is vouchsafed. Thunder is supposed to be the noise of rain falling in the heavens before it reaches the earth. The rain is sometimes supposed to be the condensing steam from an enormous pot of water boiling over a furnace fire in heaven. The lightning is conceived as a lizard-like animal which dwells in the clouds and darts out from behind them and comes to earth and breaks up trees and may kill a man. Mire is supposed by the Yao to be its excrement. The animal is called Njoci, and is the same as Mpondo of the Achipeta who consider the mire to be the broken egg-shell of the lightning dragons' eggs. There is a large red compound lily, a species of Hamanthus also called Njoci, which is in some way connected with the lightning. No Yao child would ever touch this flower. Children are always advised never to seek shelter under a big tree but always to cuddle for a bamboo thicket, for if the lightning strikes the bamboo and splits it, it will get caught inside the hollow stem.

Gales of wind are said to emanate from a plant called Chanpala. It is described as having two proboscis like an elephant's trunk and others like two fingers. It is found on the tops of very high mountains, growing alone and surrounded by bare rock. This plant is used by medicine men to gain supernatural powers. Chanpala is also the name of a parasitic plant on the charcoal trees in Nyasaland.

The world is taken by the natives as they find it; to them no explanation for its being is necessary. So far as I can find out, there is no idea among the Yao of a Creator. The 776 religion of mankind is explained in a story given elsewhere; Mulungu takes no part, nor is 775 the supernatural even invoked in explanation.

The religion of the Tsa may then be summed up as amounting to a vague, ill-defined, uncertain belief in a supreme being. Their religion is not animistic. There are certain spirits of evil, demons, fairies and supernatural beings and animals which, however, do not play any real part in their religious beliefs.

791

Native Sayings. Natives are very fond of sayings, many of which are of the same nature as our own proverbs. The meaning of many of them is, however, not always self-evident but depends on some little story with a moral.

The following are some of those which I have collected among the Tsa near Zomba:

1. Ahomuzile khumbata! (or kpuka!)
   He caught a fish, (or monkey)

An expression meaning "He slipped down." The exclamation being used when wet or when dry under foot.

2. Chenda ali w'mwa!
   Cunning is in the eye (evident).

An expression meaning "Look out; some one is after us!"

   Kalulu dangwa!
   Rabbit be clever!

This is a Mang'anja equivalent to the above.

3. Changwilowa wachikhulukhulu wanyanda!
   A thing that did not know they ended in among the herbs!

An hoax which had not listened to advice about the dangers of eating on herbs used as vegetables, was gathered up by a woman and cooked with them.

An expression used with the sense "If you do not take advice and anything happens to you, it will be your own fault."

4. Wisle ali w'mapilondo!
   Medicine is in the cast!

Meaning "You are forewarned, it is your own fault cast!"

5. Fungulowale wamkulu chikulukuwa!
   Mr Would-Be-Clever they left with the draft!

Ku-kulumuka, to be clever (to show off); an expression made to a newcomer who exhibits jokes in a discussion. It has reference to the following story and means that anyone joining a party unknown may find himself in an awkward situation. Some strangers came to a village, and after being given food and quarters, all retired for the night. One of them, however, Mr. Would-Be-Clever, hearing something going on outside crept out of the house to find out what was happening. Seeing some people playing at match-ball, he Udzimkulu, which may therefore be rendered as "The old, old One," or "The great, great One." A like rendering may be given of the Yao form mulungu, the "Old One," or the "Great One." In this or a modified form mungu (Swahili) is apparent in all the Eastern group of the Bantu tongues as the equivalent for "God" (see Father Torrend's Comparative Grammar of South African Bantu Languages). To trace it as Father Torrend does to any connection with Moloch, the god of the Phoenicians, is to attach undue weight to a chance coincidence of sounds.

As we have already seen, the word mulungu is applied to the human kalu when regarded as an object of worship, or as an inhabitant of the spirit world. But it is also used to denote that spirit world in general, or more properly speaking, the aggregate of the spirits of all the dead. The plural form of the word is rarely heard, unless when the allusion is made to the souls in their individualities. In its native use and form the word does not imply personality, for it does not belong to the personal class of nouns. Etymologically it is closest with the leg, heart, arm, hand, etc., of the human frame. In form denotes rather a state or property inhering in something, as the life or health inherent in the body. Among the various tribes where the word is in use as we have described, the missionaries have adopted it as the term for "God." But the untaught Yao refuses to assign to it any idea of being or personality. It is to him more a quality or family of the human nature whose signification he has extended so as to embrace the whole spirit world. Even after I had endeavoured to impress on old Yao Imbuwa with the personality of the Godhead in the Christian sense of the term, using the term Mulungu, my listener began to talk of "Che Mulungu," "Mr. God," showing that originally to him the word conveyed no idea of the personality I was searching to it.

And yet the Yao approaches closely to the idea of personality and a personal being, when he speaks of what mulungu has done and is doing. It is mulungu who made the world, and men, and animals. Far in the interior of the continent, toward the north-west, beyond the plains and swamps of the Lungwa River and Lake Bangweulu, there lies, in Yao legend, an island in the midst of a lake called Kapitinjya. On that island there is to be seen a large flat rock marked by the footprints of men and animals of all kinds. When that rock was once a lump of moist clay, mulungu created all living things and sent them across the soft mass, where their footprints remained to be afterwards hardened into the impressible rock. Such is the Yao legend of the creation of the world, and mulungu is always the Great Creator.

Mulungu is also regarded as the agent in anything mysterious. "It's mulungu," is the Yao exclamation on being shown anything that is beyond the range of his understanding. The rainbow is always "mulungu," although some Yao have begun to use the Mangwanja term "ula wa Lungu," bow of Lungu.

Offerings are made to the spirit world or to mulungu as the great agency in the affairs of human life. Outside the village, or beside the headman's hut, may often be seen a rough shed. In this are placed the first-fruits of the new crop,

3:Swanne D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 F77 Tao F77

771
784
826
539

68. A child, when one of its milk teeth drops out, stands some five yards away facing the door of the hut and throws the tooth over the roof of the hut, saying:

"Ai Mungulu [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]
"Ohi [illegible] tooth your there is, give me my of good [illegible]"

771

Religion. The matter of the religious beliefs professed by natives of East Central Africa is one beset with many difficulties to the student of today. It has been the subject of many essays by workers in the missionary field, but the wide contact of the natives of Nyasaland with missionary effort during the past thirty years has done much to resolve the problem, and one finds that many missionaries in their writings rather solve the picture with their own feelings.

771
761
774

I think probably the Yao with whom I am now concerned have a truer conception of their own beliefs than many of the subject tribes among whom mission teaching has more easily taken root. The religious beliefs of a people are to a large extent the reflection of the circumstances under which that people lives. The outstanding event to all natives is death. At death, something is lost to the body, without which life is impossible. This is the mzimu which may be translated "soul" or "spirit." The mzimu is said to leave the body of the dying man when he becomes mentally or unconscious. It appears that the same mzimu may leave the body during unconscious states unassociated with death, as when a man faints, in epilepsy, and during sleep.

774

Apart from this evidence of the dissociation of the mzimu from the living body, the Yao believe that a man's shadow is an objective manifestation of the soul and they will say "the shadow is the mzimu." Fear is experienced if a man jumps on the shadow of his fellow. Light is also thrown on the constitution of the mzimu by the belief in a certain evil-spirit which dwells in deep pools. It is called shimalo-mwi, which means "one who may finish (drink up) all the water." The superstition regarding this evil spirit is that it can suck the blood from your shadow as you stand at the edge of the pool, till you become so weak that you fall in and are drowned.

774
774
776

After leaving the body at death, the mzimu goes to take up its place in the spirit-world, occupying a position corresponding to that held by the man during his life. With a truly materialistic conception, the soul is supposed to have all the attributes of the dead man, to be wealthy in proportion as the man was so on earth, and its relative position will be identical with that which he held among the living. The tribal chief becomes a paramount chief in the spirit world, the lesser chief holds sway in his lesser capacity, etc. We shall see that in intercession, when the tribe is threatened with calamities, it is the late paramount chief who is appealed to for help, and when one headed chief is at war with another, the chief's dead predecessor will be called upon for aid. When a village is moved, it is from the spirit of the dead headman of the village that success in the enterprise is sought. Similarly, in family trouble, some dead ancestor is entreated to set things right, while a native

775

be supposed to live in such trees. They are convenient natural objects for them to occupy, in fact practically the only ones to be found in villages. Trees may accordingly, therefore, be looked upon as in some degree sacred. About such trees strips or pieces of calico may be placed as an offering to the spirits of the departed. But the Yao do not erect little huts in their vicinity, hung about with strips of calico as is the custom among the Anyanja.

Macdonald[1] mentions the spirits in connection with Sinke and other hills round Mwaiyaya and supposes them to be the spirits of the places themselves. This I think is unlikely; they would probably turn out to be spirits bearing the names of long departed Anyanja chiefs whom the immigrant Amangoche Yao venerated just "to be on the safe side," when they had come and taken the country which long ago belonged to the former tribe. When approaching or passing any spot held to be the dwelling place of spirits, salutation is made by clapping the hands.

Spirits of the departed may enter into animals or may take the form of animals, commonly lions and sometimes large snakes (python), but this belief is not so general among the Yao as among other tribes, in my opinion. An animal which is so possessed is called lipindo, from ku-pindo, "to be transformed."

Apart from this habitation of inanimate objects above mentioned by natives, there is nothing that points to a belief in Animism among the Yao, so far as I know. Neither hills, rocks, streams, lakes, nor trees have their own spirits, nor are they endowed by the native mind with life.

Deceased persons appear to the living in dreams, the native apparently believing that the deceased appears in his material body.

They believe also in revelation of wishes of the deceased through the medium of the living. The spirit of the deceased is supposed to enter into the medium. The medium, I am informed, is always a woman, never a man. From the descriptions of some of these revelations shown, there can be no doubt that they are manifestations of le grande hystérie. The medium works herself up into a frenzy of excitement and in her delirium gives out the name of the deceased, the voice which speaks being that of the spirit within her. She rolls on the ground and froths at the mouth, uttering the word of revelation which is generally to the effect that some deceased chief's spirit is being neglected at the neglect of his tomb; the voice may go on to say that certain practices are forbidden, or demand that certain rites be observed by the people. The spirits which possess her are generally spoken of as mzimu, a word which, though sometimes used as equivalent to mulungu, usually seems to have rather a sinister significance. Insane persons are called mzimu and are thought to be possessed by a spirit, and vapor baths with exorcisms may be practised for their cure. In the case of the death of anyone who is possessed, in answer to my interrogation, I have been told that both the spirit which has entered into the case and his own mzimu leave his body.

[1] Op. cit., vol. i, p. 76.

7: Hetherwick M-5 (ca.1900) 1962 F77 Yao F77

SOME ANIMISTIC BELIEFS AMONG THE YAOS OF BRITISH CENTRAL AFRICA.

By the Rev. Alexander Hetherwick, M.A., F.R.G.S., of the Blantyre Mission, British Central Africa.

The original home of the Yao tribe may be roughly described as the large and lofty plateau which lies to the east of Lake Nyasa, and is bounded by the Rivers Revuma and Lujenda. Forty years ago, about the time that Livingstone first entered the country, they began to be pressed on the north by the Magwangwara, and on the east by the Makoa tribes. These invasions caused them to move, some westward down to the shores of Lake Nyasa or the banks of the Upper Shire River, and others southward to the Shire Highlands, Mount Zomba and the eastern slopes of Mount Mlanje. In every case they succeeded in either subjugating or expelling the original Mawri or Manganja inhabitants of those districts, and in no case have they lost their own independence.

Till about fifty or sixty years ago the Yao were untouched by any external influences, and when at that time the Arab and east coast traders from Kilwa and Zanzibar began to meet and trade with them they appear to have been little affected by contact with these visitors. Only a few of the younger men used to following Makonde traders, and these they only grafted on to their still cherished belief in the old faiths of their fathers. The Koran, or a few of its texts, was added to the many other charms they had already hung about their necks. The faith which the first missionaries found them in possession of when they entered the country twenty-five years ago may therefore be held to be the unadulterated creed of the tribe from time immemorial.

The foundation of the Yao religion is to be found in the Sadze, the soul, shade or spirit which every human being possesses, and which is the inspiring agent in his life. They profess to give no definite description of the nature or characteristics of this soul. In their minds however it is allied with the shadow, and would seem to bear to the body the relation which a picture has to the reality. Their word for a shadow is chiwili, which is also the term that they use to denote a picture, and pictures they associate with the shades or shadows of the dead. I have known native women refuse to enter a room where pictures were hung on the walls "because of the mzimu, souls, which were in them." The photographic camera was at first an object of dread, and when it was turned upon a group of natives they dispersed in all directions with shrieks of terror. "The European," they said, "we shall be able to take away their shadows and they would die." In their mind the kadu was allied to the shadow or picture, and the removal of it to the photographic plate would cause the disease or death of the shadow body.

7: Hetherwick M-5 (ca. 1900) 1962 FT7 Tao FT7

As an instance of their faith in the close relationship of the kadu and the picture or shadow, I may relate the following incident. An influential Yao chief on Mount Zomba with whom I was on terms of intimate friendship for years, refused to allow himself to be photographed, fearing the consequence on his life. At last I was able to persuade him to give me a sitting, but on the sole condition that the picture was to be shown to none of his subjects but to be sent out of the country as soon as possible. He feared lest some ill-wisher might use it as a means towards his bewitchment. Some months afterwards the chief became seriously ill, and in the minds of his attendants his illness was attributed to some accident having befallen the photographic plate on which they believed the picture of their chief to be imprinted. If that negative had been broken in England, whither it had been sent, their chief's illness would be accounted for. Accordingly they appealed to the divining oracle, who, however, after consulting the "bone," assured them that the picture was intact, and that in consequence the disease must be ascribed to some other cause.

The kadu or soul is recognized as the chief agency in dreams. To dream is, in the Yao tongue, lowgwanda wonder, where wonder is the plural form of kadu. The kadu is supposed to go out and visit the scenes and persons it dreams about, and in turn is visited by the souls of others, dead or living. Pains in the body on rising from sleep in the morning are usually attributed to such nocturnal visits, while disease or pains of a severer type are ascribed to contagious by the whips of the wonder or more frequently of the witches who prowl around during the night watches.

Madness, idiocy and the ravings of delirium or disease are accounted for by a similar agency. The sufferers are ma wonder, they of the spirits, and a sudden fit of epilepsy or insanity is described as gukwanda wonder, the spirits have seized him. Such persons are usually regarded with awe, as living in close contact with the unseen, but no incantations or enchantments are ever used to expel the spirit in possession. Some native doctors are credited with a knowledge of certain medicines which they say are effectual in such cases, but their application in no way differs from those employed in treating ordinary types of disease. Idiots and the insane are allowed to wander at will about the village, and only when violent symptoms show themselves as a danger to the community is any physical restraint put upon them.

The wonder are also recognized as the inspiring agencies in the ravings of the witch detective. This person, usually a woman, is called in to discover who is the guilty agent in cases of mysterious deaths or outbreaks of an epidemic in a village. She arrives on the scene and takes up her abode for a few days previous to her actual demonstration. She mixes with the people, learns all the scandal and gossip of the community, and at night prowls about the houses searching for witchcraft. On the appointed day the kwaw, kwjiw mundu, to dance the spirits, or kwamuta, to rave or prophesy, and in the ravings of the dance she calls out the name of some party who is afterwards accused of being the sorcerer or witch. Followed by a crowd of excited spectators the kwaw through the village spear in hand, stopping here and there to dig up charms or medicines which the supposed witch has buried in the ground as the instruments of his occult practices. It is only in cases of supposed special difficulty, or when the magnitude of the supposed crimes demands that special measures be adopted for their detection, that the services of such a witch detective are called in. In ordinary cases these appeals are made to the divining oracle who consults his "bete" as a means of discovering crimes of this nature.

9: Hetherwick M-5 (ca.1900) 1902 FT7 Tao FT7

Among the Tsaw the human being is believed to be the sole possessor of a kudu. I have been unable to discover any trace of a theory that the kudu may pass into any animal or inanimate object and then confer upon it the nature or power of a kudu. Such belief is shunned among the kwgwi and kwkwa tribes to the westward by Ryan and the upper Shire River, and the intelligent Tsaw is aware of this, but he states that among his people no such belief exists. Even charms which have the effect of healing or warding off disease, or of protecting the bearer from war or wild beasts or other danger by land or water, are supposed to possess this power without any idea of their being possessed by a kudu or other spirit influence. The nearest approach to such a theory is in the case of certain powerful "doctors" who have obtained special medicine by means of which, on death, they can transform themselves into lions, leopards, crocodiles. Leopards also are sometimes supposed to become hippopotami. But both of these cases must be regarded rather as transmutations of body than transmigrations of soul.

It will be thus seen that the nature of the human kudu is closely allied to that of the mundu, which are the inspiring spirits in medicine and in the century of prophecy or incantation. What the origin of these inspiring mundu is, or to whom they belonged when in bodily life, the Tsaw holds no theory. He is content to accept them as they are, mundu kpepe, "Just mundu and nothing more," as he says.

It is, however, when we follow the disembodied kudu after death and consider its position and power in the other world that we find ourselves in a region of higher spiritual activities.

In disease or in fainting fits the kudu leaves the body but only to return to it with the awakening consciousness. At death, however, it leaves the earthly abode never to return. It is now spoken of as having gone to mulungu or ulungu. This word, which lies at the basis of all Tsaw theories of the place of the soul after death, will be dealt with later on as regards its derivation and connections in the Bantu family of languages. In its natural use it bears two significations.

1. The word mulungu is in the first instance applied to the human soul or kudu after death when it is considered as an inhabitant of the spirit world. Even in life a man, when he meets with any place of good luck, will be heard to say, "Ilo my mulungu," as if his soul had an influence in determining the character of his

1: Tew E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

Land Tenure

The rules governing land tenure were those which would be expected of a society which suffered from no land shortage. A man was entitled to as much land as he could cultivate, the limitation being that he should consult the headman as to his neighbours' boundaries. Abandoned gardens could only be taken up with the permission of the original cultivator.[1]

MAIN CULTURAL FEATURES

Religion

The Yao are largely Islamized. Cadrington remarked that the perpetuation of this faith was distinctly unsympathetic to British influence, and it received considerable attention from chiefs and headmen. Schools for the instruction of youth in reading and writing Swahili in Arabic characters were established in nearly every village, where also prayers were made at regular intervals in the day. The Moslem fasts and feasts were also observed, and the Yao were not inclined to embrace Christianity.[2] Their conversion to Islam did not take place till the nineteenth century, long after their first introduction to the Arab traders at Kilwa and Zanzibar, although they had adopted Swahili modes of dress much earlier.[3]

According to Hetherwick, Islam is strongest on the lake shore and on the east border of Nyasaland, chiefly round the old slave-trade centres. Makanjira's on the south-east side of the lake, and Domira Bay on the west, were the centres of Moslem propaganda. The Moslem population around Zomba and Blantyre consists mainly of Yao men, who have built themselves mosques in their own villages, or use the large mosques of Indian Moslem merchants. In the west districts, below Shire, Ruo, central Shire, Lilongwe, Fort Manning, the Moslem population does not total more than 7½. In the districts round Fort Johnston and Karonga, the Moslems are one-ninth of the total population, while in Zomba district they number one-fifth.[4]

The Yao pagan religion was a form of ancestor worship. Apart from diviners and medicine men, there was no regular priestly profession. Intercession with the ancestors was performed by the chief, on behalf of the chiefdom, by the headman on behalf of the village, and by the head of the matrilineal kin for his dependents.[5] A man was qualified to approach his ancestors individually only if he had been initiated and had a house of his own.[6]

Some of the ritual duties of the chief have already been mentioned. When his people were visited by drought or epidemic, or when he fixed the day for the beginning of the millet harvest, he made an offering of flour and of beer poured into a pot in the ground at the grave of a dead chief. The village headmen made similar offerings to the spirit of his dead predecessor. The spirits of the dead Nyanja chiefs, control by the Yao invasion, were regarded as still powerful in the homeland of their people. For instance, Kangombe, whose shrine was on Mount Soche, used to be appealed to for rain, and on the principle that the most appropriate mediator between a dead man and the living is a descendant of the former, the Yao chief, Kapeni, where he wished to propitiate

[1] Macdonald, Africa, vol. 1, pp. [illegible]; Sanderson, 1, 1905, p. [illegible].
[2] Cadrington, Chiefs, p. [illegible]; see also Stapleton, 3, 1899.
[3] Young, T. C., 2, 1929, p. 20.
[4] Hetherwick, 2, 1907, p. [illegible]; Sanderson, 1, 1905, p. [illegible].
[5] Hetherwick, 2, 1907, p. [illegible].
[6] Macdonald, Africa, vol. 1, p. 84.

1: Tew . E-4 (no date) 1950 F77 Tew F77

Kangunda, used to persuade Nyanja to help in the sacrificial rite. When Kapeni in turn fled to Mount Sochs from the Ngoni, and died there, the Yao addressed their offerings to him, not to Kangunda.[1] The word Mulungu has sometimes been interpreted to mean Supreme Being, God, Creator, but among the Yao it seems not to have a personal connotation. It was used to describe the agent in any mysterious event,[2] or the place where the ancestor spirits (mawaka) were supposed to dwell. Daily life was full of acts of respect towards the ancestors, who were regarded as jealous of the living, and requiring constant propitiation.[3]

Sorcery

Accusations of witchcraft and measures for dealing with it play a dominant role in Yao social life. With certain exceptions nearly all diseases and deaths are thought to be caused by sorcery. The exceptional causes are: the hand of God, old age, the transgression of certain taboos, and battle wounds. If sorcery is suspected the relatives of the sick or dead man consult the diviner to identify the offender.

Yao (in common with the Mawri and many peoples of Central Africa) believe that sorcerers have a craving for human flesh, which they satisfy by killing with magic the victims of their malice and hatred. They acquire their magical powers by an apprenticeship, which might include incestuous relations with mother, sister, or mother-in-law, or sleeping on the grave of the mother for one night. The sorcerer then learns the medicines and finally demonstrates his power by killing a young relative by magic; he waits till the victim is buried, and then conspicuously exhumes him for the secret feast with his fellow sorcerers. Each sorcerer who shares the flesh owes a debt to the one who secured the victim.

Charms are used as preventive measures against sorcery. When a diviner has diagnosed the cause of death as sorcery, retaliatory measures are taken. The headman of the village could either call in the witchfinder to identify the offender or he could call in the diviner to take action against all the sorcerers in the village. After the diviner, Mahindlo, had revealed the guilty ones, they were challenged to take the poison ordeal to prove their innocence. If they died, the proof and the punishment were simultaneously accomplished. If they survived, the diviner was held to have been at fault and they were acquitted. The witch doctor was supposed to entice sorcerers to the graveside, and slay them with magic more powerful than their own.

The diviner's findings are to-day checked by the poison ordeal administered to a chicken. A sorcerer detected in this way might be asked to provide medicine for the man whose sickness he had caused, or after a death he might be compelled to pay compensation. If the accused is a village headman, he will not be summoned before a chief, but his brother will take the villagers away from the sphere of his influence, or he may be chased away from the district. Accusations of sorcery follow certain regular lines. Nearly all accusations fall on relatives. Diviners are consulted by matrilineal relatives of the sick or dead person, and the man most usually accused is the brother of the accuser, or the husband of his sister. Witchcraft is therefore a manner of expressing the hostilities latent in these relations, which are, in the Yao social system, full of tension.

[1] Hetherwick, op. cit., vol. i, p. 30. [2] Hetherwick, op. cit.
[3] Hodoul, op. cit., pp. 14-15; Hetherwick, op. cit., vol. i, pp. 38-39, 104-15.

[illegible] give an excellent idea of the average figure. It is circular in plan, often with a little kiosk in the centre known as kokoshi hongwapoki, "the hill of duke," and disposed in the quadrants are four depressions.

[illegible] When the well are introduced to Chingwa, they stand round in a circle while the a'wishida stands in one of the depressions with perhaps two of his assistants in others. The a'wishida sings:

[illegible] "Ayaw, hongwapoki chingwapoki wonapoki ningwapoki kokoshi, ewwi
[illegible] "The kiln someone was I born duke I would have died on the plain, another!"
Ayaywaki wayawaki"

or

"I have lived by the great kiln all my life, I should have died in the plains"

while all these under movements are of pudding a cross. The depressions are said to represent crosses. I believe this is the recognized form but I have also seen an oblong figure with two outlines of considerable squares. Chingwa is usually found near wahongwa.

Chinto, when represented, stands beyond wikoshi. It consists of two trenches at right angles forming a cross, which are covered over with logs and earth and the whole outlined with four in a decorative pattern. The end of one limb of the cross is left open and round this opening a screen of grass is made. As the well approach Chinto, some of the assistants or chowwi descend into the trenches for the ceremony. The a'wishida takes up his stand at the centre of the cross and sings:

"Chinto, cross, kwakin chinto!"
"Chinto, mother, cross-we chinto!"

[illegible] Then as everyone says "Listen, listen!" crying is heard "coming out of the bowels of the earth," followed by drumming and the singing of the chinkinin songs (sometimes wikoshi or wonki); a horn is sometimes heard as well as kokoshi, trilling with the tongue against the lips. Chinto is called "the resting place of all departed spirits" and the sounds are said to be the echoes of their doings. The word is not used with elsewhere among the Tewa, although it occurs in the Chingwanja and in other languages of this country with the meaning "the heavens."

[illegible] Chinto is said by Bedzawitch[1] to be "a large fish that forms one of the pictures at the Chingwa," but I have never seen it or heard of it, and I am doubtful of the correctness of the statement.

[illegible] Ching'wahong'wonki. Dr. Dorsey's photograph[2] is an excellent reproduction of this figure, which consists of a mound of earth flattened on the top, and decorated with geometric patterns in four which extend to the ground. In the centre and at the four corners, so to speak, are implanted billets of wood with dark native lines and dots in black and red on the white wood (Pl. X, figs. I, II). The billets are three inches in diameter and project twelve to fifteen inches above the ground.

[1] Handbook of the Tewa language, op. cit., p. 110. [2] Op. cit., Pl. XII, fig. 2.

771
774
826
539

68. A child, whose one of its milk teeth drops out, stands some five yards away facing the door of the hut and throws the tooth over the roof of the hut, saying:

"Ali Mungulu Iwe Ipwa-ipu, ndawi Ipungu Ipundwe "pu"
"Old mwe tooth your there is, give me my of good one!"

Religion. The matter of the religious beliefs professed by natives of East Central Africa is one beset with many difficulties to the student of today. It has been the subject of many essays by workers in the missionary field, but the wide contact of the natives of Nyanganiland with missionary effort during the past thirty years has done much to confuse the problem, and one finds that many misstatements in their writings rather color the picture with their own feelings. 771

I think probably the Yao with whom I am now concerned have a truer conception of their own beliefs than many of the subject tribes among whom mission teaching has more easily taken root. The religious beliefs of a people are to a large extent the reflection of the circumstances under which that people lives. The outstanding event to all natives is death. At death, something is lost to the body, without which life is impossible. This is the mzimu which may be translated "soul" or "spirit." The mzimu is said to leave the body of the dying man when he becomes moribund or unconscious. It appears that this same mzimu may leave the body during unconscious states unassociated with death, as when a man faints, in epilepsy, and during sleep. 771 761 774

Apart from this evidence of the dissociation of the mzimu from the living body, the Yao believe that a man's shadow is an objective manifestation of the soul and they will say "the shadow is the mzimu." Fear is experienced if a man jumps on the shadow of his fellow. Light is also thrown on the constitution of the mzimu by the belief in a certain evil-spirit which dwells in deep pools. It is called ahinda-mwi, which means "one who may drink (drink up) all the water." The superstition regarding this evil spirit is that it can suck the blood from your shadow as you stand at the edge of the pool, till you become so weak that you fall in and are drowned. 774 776

After leaving the body at death, the mzimu goes to take up its place in the spirit-world, occupying a position corresponding to that held by the man during his life. With a truly materialistic conception, the soul is supposed to have all the attributes of the dead man, to be wealthy in proportion as the man was so on earth, and its relative position will be identical with that which he held among the living. The tribal chief becomes a paramount chief in the spirit world, the lesser chief holds sway in his lesser capacity, etc. We shall see that in intercession, when the tribe is threatened with calamities, it is the late paramount chief who is appealed to for help, and when one feudal chief is at war with another, the chief's dead predecessor will be called upon for aid. When a village is moved, it is from the spirit of the dead headman of the village that success in the enterprise is sought. Similarly, in family trouble, some dead ancestor is entreated to set things right, while a native 775

3:Summer D-5 (ex. 1912) 1922 FT7 Tao FT7

●775 setting out on a journey may ask the intercession of his deceased father to secure his safe conduct.

The spirits of the dead are in general said to dwell "above." They haunt the graveyard or visit the scenes of their life, and may be associated with natural objects or with certain animals, into which they are supposed to enter temporarily. Thus a dead man's spirit will visit the earth mound which marks the site of his old house in the village. The spirits of headmen are often thought to haunt the big trees of the village open space; such trees are held sacred for this reason. Some time ago in the old village of the chief, Malenya, a party of women cut down one of these trees for firewood, ignorant of its sacred character. With the crash of the falling tree, they became frightened, and one of the present Malenya's wives came upon the scene, predicting all kinds of evil to follow unless reparation were made to the insulted spirits of the dead chiefs. The remains of the tree lie there to this day, untouched except by natural decay.

To quote another example, near a bathing pool called japwoli (from ku-japa, to bathe, and woli, the initiates) where boys bathe after initiation, on the Domasi river, there is a small cataract whence a cloud of spray rises and a continued rumbling sound comes forth. Here, the old men say, you can hear the drumming of the spirits, while you may see pythons and the crowing cobra in whose bodies the spirits live.

As I have already mentioned, the spirit-world so far as the native has speculated on the problem is "above" in a semi-materialistic heaven. If questioned closely, the phrase "I do not know" will figure largely in his replies. He will not say there is any "marriage or giving in marriage." If a child dies, they often say, "So-and-so (some deceased person) wants a water-carrier." Indeed they often use a phrase under the circumstances identical with an English expression, "They are calling away the children."

Natives attribute to the spirits of the dead the power to partake of anything on this earth, such as food. They have no exact ideas with regard to animals and what happens to them when they die. They will not tell you that an animal has an mzimu but at the same [825] time, a goat is often killed at a funeral, with the remark, "The goat will follow the dead man." The goat's meat will be eaten by those assisting at the funeral; hence there is the suggestion of the idea that animals' spirits do go to the spirit-world.

✓776 In referring to the spirit-world, the native generally uses the word ku-mulungu, and here we have the second element in their religious beliefs, namely a supreme being; ku-mulungu means at the place of or with mulungu, the supreme being. Mulungu, however,
[845] takes a very secondary place to the mzimu. He is referred to only in a general way. In answer to such questions as why has a woman an albino child born to her, she will say "Mulungu made it so"; in fact in reply to many questions to which the native has no answer, he will use practically our English phrase, "Oh, God knows!" and with about as much meaning.

To Mulungu is ascribed the sending of the rain, but apparently he has no part in giving good crops or causing a plentiful harvest, neither has he any direct interest in men's affairs,

[829] [778] be supposed to live in such trees. They are convenient natural objects for them to occupy, in fact practically the only ones to be found in villages. Trees may accordingly, therefore, be looked upon as in some degree sacred. Almost each tree stringe or phase of saliva may be placed as an offering to the spirits of the departed. But the Tao do not count little huts in their vicinity, hung about with strips of cotton as is the custom among the Anyanja.

[775] Macdonald[1] mentions the spirits in connection with Sudes and other hills round Blantyre and supposes them to be the spirits of the places themselves. This I think is unlikely; they would probably turn out to be spirits bearing the names of long departed Anyanja chiefs whom the immigrant Amangoche Tao venerated just "to be on the safe side," since they had come and taken the country which long ago belonged to the former tribe. When approaching or passing any spot held to be the dwelling place of spirits, salutation is made by clapping the hands.

Spirits of the departed may enter into animals or may take the form of animals, commonly lions and sometimes large snakes (python), but this belief is not as general among the Tao as among other tribes, in my opinion. An animal which is so possessed is called Sayuka, from ku-ayuka, "to be transformed."

[823] [774] Apart from this habitation of inanimate objects above mentioned by mains, there is nothing that points to a belief in Animism among the Tao, so far as I know. Neither hills, rocks, streams, lakes, nor trees have their own spirits, nor are they endowed by the native mind with life.

Deceased persons appear to the living in dreams, the native apparently believing that the deceased appears in his material body.

[775] [787] [791] They believe also in revelation of wishes of the deceased through the medium of the living. The spirit of the deceased is supposed to enter into the medium. The medium, I am informed, is always a woman, never a man. From the descriptions of some of these revelation séances, there can be no doubt that they are manifestations of la grande hystérie. The medium works herself up into a frenzy of excitement and in her delirium gives out the name of the deceased, the voice which speaks being that of the spirit within her. She rolls on the ground and foams at the mouth, uttering the word of revelation which is generally to the effect that some deceased chief's spirit is feeling aggrieved at the neglect of his tomb; the voice may go on to say that certain practices are forbidden, or demand that certain rites be observed by the people. The spirits which possess her are generally spoken of as mawabe, a word which, though sometimes used as equivalent to mains, usually seems to have rather a sinister significance. Insane persons are called mawabe and are thought to be possessed by a spirit, and vapor baths with excretion may be practised for their cure. In the case of the death of anyone who is possessed, in answer to my interrogation, I have been told that both the spirit which has entered into the man and his own mains leave his body.

[158] [761]

[1] Op. cit., vol. I, p. 70.

?: Hatherwick M-S (ca. 1900) 1902 FT? Tao FT?

witchcraft. On the appointed day she dances, hapina mounts, to dance the spirits, or kamtanda, to rave or prophesy, and in the ravings of the dance she calls out the name of some party who is afterwards accused of being the sorcerer or witch. Followed by a crowd of excited spectators she dances through the village spear in hand, stopping here and there to dig up charms or medicines which the supposed witch has buried in the ground as the instruments of his occult practices. It is only in cases of supposed special difficulty, or where the magnitude of the supposed crimes demands that special measures be adopted for their detection, that the services of such a witch detective are called in. In ordinary cases these appeals are made to the divining oracle who consults his "bone" as a means of discovering crimes of this nature. 754 [171]

Among the Tsaw the human being is believed to be the sole possessor of a linda. I have been unable to discover any trace of a theory that the linda may pass into any animal or inanimate object and there confer upon it the nature or power of a fetish. Such belief is cherished among the Angoni and Achewa tribes to the westward by Nyasa and the upper Shire River, and the intelligent Tsaw is aware of this, but he states that among his people no such belief exists. Even charms which have the effect of healing or warding off disease, or of protecting the wearer from war or wild beasts or other danger by land or water, are supposed to possess this power without any idea of their being possessed by a linda or other spirit influence. The nearest approach to such a theory is in the case of certain powerful "doctors" who have obtained special medicine by means of which, at death, they can transform themselves into lions, leopards, crocodiles, etc. Lepers also are sometimes supposed to become hippopotami. But both of these cases must be regarded rather as transmutations of body than transmigrations of soul. 774 [151] 756 775

It will be thus seen that the nature of the human linda is closely allied to that of the mzimu, which are the inspiring agents in medicine and in the century of prophecy or incantation. What the origin of these inspiring mzimu is, or to whom they belonged when in bodily life, the Tsaw holds no theory. He is content to accept them as they are, mzimu (pepi) "Just mzimu and nothing more," as he says. 774 [28]

It is, however, when we follow the disembodied linda after death and consider its position and power in the other world that we find ourselves in a region of higher spiritual activities. 775

In dreams or in fainting fits the linda leaves the body but only to return to it with the awakening consciousness. At death, however, it leaves its earthly abode never to return. It is now spoken of as having gone to mzimaya or mlimaya. This word, which lies at the basis of all Tsaw theories of the place of the soul after death, will be dealt with later on as regards its derivation and connections in the Bantu family of languages. In its actual use it bears two significations.

1. The word mzimaya is in the first instance applied to the human soul or linda after death when it is considered as an inhabitant of the spirit world. Even in life a man, when he meets with any piece of good luck, will be heard to say, "It's my mzimaya," as if his soul had an influence in determining the character of his present fortunes. But it is in the houses and after death, when it is considered as having an influence on the lives and fortunes of those it has left behind in the world and consequently as a power to be propitiated and honoured, that the term wulungu is more strictly applied. Freed from the body it passes to wulungu, and there is regarded as endowed with powers which it never possessed when alive on earth. To pray to such a spirit is described as kulomba wulungu, to worship wulungu, never finds in this case. Such wulungu worship enters largely into Tao religious or social life. In almost every Tao village there will be found a shrine which is the centre of the worship of the inhabitants. It consists of a carefully built hut enclosed within a strong green fence or hedge of a species of native plant. The hut itself is built of the usual native materials—the walls of wooden posts, bamboos, and strong reed grass bound together with bark rope and plastered over with clay or stiff mud. The roof is of grass laid on a framework of bamboos, and is generally covered with long strips of white or coloured calico. On the ridge or apex of the roof are fixed a couple of flags or an umbrella or two. One wall is usually left open so that the interior is easily seen. Within, from the bamboo rafters are suspended handkerchiefs, cloths, bunches of beads, etc., all offerings to the wulungu of the dead headman or chief from his friends and relatives. The floor is of clay carefully smoothed with mud in native fashion. A raised platform or mound of earth in the centre marks the spot where the grave was made. The wulungu or officials who preside at the funeral ceremonies, first dig for about 9 or 10 feet down in a perpendicular direction, and then on the western side of this well they hollowed out a shallow cave in the earth. In this the body was placed, laid on its side with the knees bent up under the chin, and the face turned towards the east. Various articles of personal property were next placed beside the corpse, clothes, ivory, guns, axes, hoes, etc., and the mouth of the cave closed up with wooden posts and a strong reed mat. The grave was then filled in and the surface carefully finished as we have seen. At the head of the mound a native pot was fixed in the ground for the reception of the offering of beer which is an almost ignorable accompaniment of any act of worship paid to the wulungu of the dead.

9: Hathorwick (M-5 (ca. 1900) 1981 FTT Tao FTT

Such a shrine marks the grave of almost every Tao chief or headman, and is regarded as the abode of his soul or the spot where his wulungu is most accessible. If his successor is about to undertake a long journey or enter on any warlike expedition against an enemy or neighbour, he must first kulopa whisper, place an offering here to secure the favour and assistance of the wulungu of the dead. Should a long-continued drought endanger the prospects of the grain crop, the departed chief must be solicited to send the lacking rain. A feast is first prepared, almost always of beer, sometimes with the addition of native porridge, fowl, or goats. The worshippers gather round the shrine bringing part of the food which they have prepared. Their priest for the occasion is the successor of the dead chief, sometimes one or other of the wulungu who placed the body in the grave, or it may be that any other near relation of the dead man is chosen to represent the people and act as their spokesman. The nearer the relationship the more influence will he have with the dead.

Y: Hatherwick M-5 (ca. 1990) 1992 FT7 Yao FT7

778 Uhlenbeckiale, which may therefore be rendered as "The old, old One," or "The 777 great, great One." A like rendering may be given of the Yao term mulungu, the "Old One," or the "Great One." In this or a modified form mungu (Swahili) it 782 appears in all the Eastern group of the Bantu tongues as the equivalent for "God" (see Father Torrend's Comparative Grammar of South African Bantu Languages).
[94] To trace in as Father Torrend does to any connection with Moloch, the god of the Phœnicians, is to attach undue weight to a chance coincidence of sounds.

As we have already seen, the word mulungu is applied to the human finite when regarded as an object of worship, or as an inhabitant of the spirit world.
● 775 But it is also used to denote that spirit world in general, or more properly 776 speaking, the aggregate of the spirits of all the dead. The plural form of the word is rarely heard, unless when the allusion is made to the souls in their individualities.
In its native use and form the word does not imply personality, for it does not belong to the personal class of nouns. Etymologically it is cognate with the leg, heart, arm, head, etc., of the human frame. Its form denotes rather a state or property inhering in something, as the life or health inherent in the body. Among the various tribes where the word is in use as we have described, the missionaries have adopted it as the term for "God." But the untaught Yao refuses to assign to it any idea of being or personality. It is to him more a quality or family of the human entire whose signification has been extended so as to embrace the whole spirit world. Once after I had endeavoured to impress an old Yao headman with the personality of the Godhead in the Christian sense of the term, using the term Mulungu, my listener began to talk of "Che Mulungu," "Mr. God," showing that originally to him the word conveyed no idea of the personality I was ascribing to it.

And yet the Yao approaches closely to the idea of personality and a personal 776 being, when he speaks of what mulungu has done and is doing. It is mulungu 773 who made the world, and men, and animals. Far in the interior of the continent, toward the north-west, beyond the plains and swamps of the Lengwe River and Lake Bangweulu, there lies, in Yao legend, an island in the midst of a lake called Kapititinya. On that island there is to be seen a large flat rock marked by the footprints of men and animals of all kinds. When that rock was once a heap of moist clay, mulungu created all living things and sent them across the soft mass, where their footprints remained to be afterwards hardened into the impalpable rock.
Such is the Yao legend of the creation of the world, and mulungu is always the Great Creator.

Mulungu is also regarded as the agent in anything mysterious. "It's 776 mulungu," is the Yao exclamation on being shown anything that is beyond the range of his understanding. The rainbow is always "mulungu," although some [95] Yaos have begun to use the Mang'anja term "utu wa Lomo," bow of Lomo.

Offerings are made to the spirit world or to mulungu as the great agency in 769 the affairs of human life. Outside the village, or beside the headman's hut, may 782 often be seen a rough shed. In this are placed the first-fruits of the new crop,

1: Tew . E-6 (no date) 1950 F77 Yao F77

Kangombe, used to persuade Nyanja to help in the matrilineal rite. When Kapeni in turn fled to Mount Soche from the Ngoni, and died there, the Yao addressed their offerings to him, not to Kangombe.[1] The word Mulungu has sometimes been interpreted to mean Supreme Being, God, Creator, but among the Yao it seems not to have a personal connotation. It was used to describe the agent in any mysterious event,[2] or the place where the ancestor spirits (mazimbu) were supposed to dwell. Daily life was full of acts of respect towards the ancestors, who were regarded as jealous of the living, and requiring constant propitiation.[3]

Sorcery

Accusations of witchcraft and measures for dealing with it play a dominant role in Yao social life. With certain exceptions nearly all diseases and deaths are thought to be caused by sorcery. The exceptional causes are: the hand of God, old age, the transgression of certain taboos, and battle wounds. If sorcery is suspected the relatives of the sick or dead man consult the diviner to identify the offender.

Yao (in common with the Mawri and many peoples of Central Africa) believe that sorcerers have a craving for human flesh, which they satisfy by killing with magic the victims of their malice and hatred. They acquire their magical powers by an apprenticeship, which might include incestuous relations with mother, sister, or mother-in-law, or sleeping on the grave of the mother for one night. The sorcerer then learns the medicines and finally demonstrates his power by killing a young relative by magic; he waits till the victim is buried, and then magically exhumes him for the secret feast with his fellow sorcerers. Each sorcerer who shares the flesh owes a debt to the one who secured the victim.

Charms are used as preventive measures against sorcery. When a diviner has diagnosed the cause of death as sorcery, retaliatory measures are taken. The headman of the village could either call in the witchfinder to identify the offender or he could call in the diviner to take action against all the sorcerers in the village. After the diviner, Mahindile, had revealed the guilty ones, they were challenged to take the poison ordeal to prove their innocence. If they died, the proof and the punishment were simultaneously accomplished. If they survived, the diviner was held to have been at fault and they were acquitted. The witch doctor was supposed to entice sorcerers to the graveside, and slay them with magic more powerful than their own.

The diviner's findings are to-day checked by the poison ordeal administered to a chicken. A sorcerer detected in this way might be asked to provide medicine for the man whose sickness he had caused, or after a death he might be compelled to pay compensation. If the accused is a village headman, he will not be summoned before a chief, but his brother will take the villagers away from the sphere of his influence, or he may be chased away from the district. Accusations of sorcery follow certain regular lines. Nearly all accusations fall on relatives. Diviners are consulted by matrilineal relatives of the sick or dead person, and the man most usually accused is the brother of the accuser, or the husband of his sister. Witchcraft is therefore a manner of expressing the hostilities latent in these relations, which are, in the Yao social system, full of tension.

[1] Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, p. 70.
[2] Hetherwick, 3, 1900.
[3] Hoch, 1933, pp. 14-15; Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, pp. 58-73, 204-13.

THE WATAO OF FYAMLAND

III

48. A child, when one of its milk teeth drops out, stands some five yards away facing the door of the hut and throws the tooth over the roof of the hut, saying:

"Ai khonpale [illegible] ghyo [illegible] ghyo [illegible] ghyo [illegible] ghyo"
"Old one take your tooth, give me my of good one!"

Religion. The matter of the religious beliefs professed by natives of East Central Africa is one beset with many difficulties to the student of today. It has been the subject of many essays by workers in the missionary field, but the wide contact of the natives of Fyamland with missionary effort during the past thirty years has done much to resolve the problem, and one finds that many missionaries in their writings rather solve the picture with their own feelings.

I think probably the Tao with whom I am now concerned have a truer conception of their own beliefs than many of the subject tribes among whom mission teaching has more easily taken root. The religious beliefs of a people are to a large extent the reflection of the circumstances under which that people lives. The outstanding event to all natives is death. At death, something is lost to the body, without which life is impossible. This is the mzimu which may be translated "soul" or "spirit." The mzimu is said to leave the body of the dying man when he becomes moribund or unconscious. It appears that the same mzimu may leave the body during unconscious states unconnected with death, as when a man faints, in epilepsy, and during sleep.

Apart from this evidence of the dissociation of the mzimu from the living body, the Tao believe that a man's shadow is an objective manifestation of the soul and they will say "the shadow is the mzimu." Fear is experienced if a man jumps on the shadow of his fellow. Light is also thrown on the constitution of the mzimu by the belief in a certain evil-spirit which dwells in deep pools. It is called shimala-mzuri, which means "one who may finish (drink up) all the water." The superstition regarding this evil spirit is that it can suck the blood from your shadow as you stand at the edge of the pool, till you become so weak that you fall in and are drowned.

After leaving the body at death, the mzimu goes to take up its place in the spirit-world, occupying a position corresponding to that held by the man during his life. With a truly unintelligible assumption, the soul is supposed to have all the attributes of the dead man, to be wealthy in proportion as the man was so on earth, and its relative position will be identical with that which he held among the living. The tribal chief becomes a permanent chief in the spirit world, the lesser chief holds sway in his lesser capacity, etc. We shall see that in intercession, when the tribe is threatened with calamities, it is the late paramount chief who is appealed to for help, and when one feudal chief is at war with another, the chief's dead predecessor will be called upon for aid. When a village is moved, it is from the spirit of the dead headman of the village that success in the enterprise is sought. Similarly, in family trouble, some dead ancestor is entreated to set things right, while a native [illegible] setting out on a journey may ask the intercession of his deceased father to assure his safe conduct.

The spirits of the dead are in general said to dwell "above." They haunt the graveyard or visit the scenes of their life, and may be associated with natural objects or with certain animals, into which they are supposed to enter temporarily. Thus a dead man's spirit will visit the earth mound which marks the site of his old house in the village. The spirits of headmen are often thought to haunt the big trees of the village open space; such trees are held sacred for this reason. Some time ago in the old village of the chief, Mulonya, a party of women cut down one of these trees for firewood, ignorant of its sacred character. With the crash of the falling tree, they became frightened, and one of the present Mulonya's wives came upon the scene, predicting all kinds of evil to follow unless expiatory rites were made to the insulted spirits of the dead chiefs. The remains of the tree lie there to this day, untouched except by natural decay.

To quote another example, near a bathing pool called japondi (from ba-japa, to bathe, and vuli, the initiation) where boys bathe after initiation, on the Dzonzi river, there is a small cataract whence a cloud of spray rises and a continued rumbling sound issues forth. Here, the old men say, you can hear the drumming of the spirits, while you may see pythons and the crowing cobra in whose bodies the spirits live.

As I have already mentioned, the spirit-world so far as the native has speculated on the problem is "above" in a semi-materialistic heaven. If questioned closely, the phrase "I do not know" will figure largely in his replies. He will not say there is any "marriage or giving in marriage." If a child dies, they often say, "Ba-ambo (some deceased person) wants a water-carrier." Indeed they often use a phrase under the circumstances identical with an English expression, "They are calling away the children."

Natives attribute to the spirits of the dead the power to partake of anything on this earth, such as food. They have no exact ideas with regard to animals and what happens to them when they die. They will not tell you that an animal has an anima but at the same time, a goat is often killed at a funeral, with the remark, "The goat will follow the dead man." The goat's meat will be eaten by those assisting at the funeral; hence there is the suggestion of the idea that animals' spirits do go to the spirit-world.

In referring to the spirit-world, the native generally uses the word ba-mulungu, and here we have the second element in their religious beliefs, namely a supreme being; ba-mulungu means at the place of or with mulungu, the supreme being. M'ulungu, however, takes a very secondary place to the mulungu. He is referred to only in a general way. In answer to such questions as why has a woman an albino child born to her, she will say "M'ulungu made it so"; in fact in reply to many questions to which the native has no answer, he will use practically our English phrase, "Oh, God knows!" and with about as much meaning.

To M'ulungu is ascribed the sending of the rain, but apparently he has no part in giving good crops or causing a plentiful harvest, neither has he any direct interest in man's affairs, see in he "God the creator," of man or earth. He, however, receives the spirits of the dead. Should he refuse to do so, a man continues to live. When a child has recovered from some commonly fatal disease, the natives say, "Mkungu wakenda (refused him)!" or if he has been very near to death and then recovers, they say "Mkungu wamenda (spat him out)".

It would thus appear that among the spirit beats there is a regular law of precedence, and presiding over all is a supreme being, but all this is so remote as to have little importance for the living. The supreme conveying Mkungu, I must admit, has given rise to some doubt in my own mind as to how far he was a deity with an entity of his own in their religion at a little time ago.

Ancestors tend to be forgotten in proportion to the length of time which has elapsed since their death, unless they played some important part during their lives: then some particular one may be remembered to the exclusion of others, and to him prayers of intercession are offered. In the case of chiefs, the memory of a long line of rulers may be remembered on occasions when all else about them has fallen into oblivion. It seems possible originally Mkungu was the oldest ancestral chief who was raised up as a supreme being but who, in the process, has lost all other attributes. On the other hand, the word often refers only to the place where the spirits dwell; this may have been the original meaning.

There is no religious worship in the proper sense of the term but only propitiation, prayer for intercession, and return of thanks for favors granted. The keystone of this ancestor worship, the sum total of their religion to the exclusion of the belief in a supreme being, is fear. We have seen at the funeral that everything is done to lay the spirit at rest. The people wish never to hear of the spirit again. It is chiefly with a view of averting some evil that worship takes place or with a view of repairing some crime that sacrifice is made or to alleviate some suffering that communication is sought with the spirits. It is a question of, "Do us no harm, do not vent your wrath upon us for what we have left undone," rather than "Keep us from doing evil, save us from being our own enemies." It would appear to be a religion of spite, not of love and kindness, though there are glimmerings of a search after "a bond to guide and protect," as in the prayer given below and also in the action taken when removing a village.

As a corollary of this system of ancestor worship, there is no real priesthood. A man asks for favors for himself; the head of a family petitions a deceased father or some more remote ancestor of greater importance; the headman intercedes on behalf of the village with the spirit of a predecessor; a chief takes the place of high priest on the occasion of a tribal supplication to a former ruler, though he may be replaced by some one of his wives who acts as intermediary.

Some form of sacrifice is offered with the prayer, and often some omen is sought as a sign that the prayer is granted. For this purpose, flour made from millet called mkopani (mawele, Chin.) is commonly used. The word mkopani probably includes any sacrificial offerings.

[illegible] never have any food outside at night, not even the shell from the grain she has been pounding, but these most valuable of beings be attracted by it.

[illegible] Chinese is a word common to several tribes and among them appears to have various shades of meaning. Among the Wayao, the term are "the little people" of the lagoodoom order. They rob the gardens and cause not among the pumpkins; their little footprints can be seen, where they have passed hither and thither; fruits and vegetables that they touch will become bitter. To prevent these disasters, the Yao, at the time when their crops are ripening, place different kinds of vegetables at cross-roads, hoping thereby to satisfy the Ziwa and prevent them coming into the gardens. As far as I am aware, the Ziwa have nothing to do with fanlee and are in no way connected with Mlungu, to be mentioned below, as Mawkendi believed.[1] The chinwa is variously said to be "like a man but rather like an animal." He has two legs but goes on all fours.

The Yao describe another legendary race of "little people" who used to live in this country and who may still be met with, — "who knows?" They were of a very small stature, gave long beards, were very wealthy, quarrelsome, and fierce, and carried spears. When anybody met one, he was immediately asked: "Mwenkwale Jumpi?", "From how far did you see me?" and it was always well to pretend to have seen the little man coming a long way off and make him believe he was considered quite a big person; if you said "Hello, I have only just spotted you!", he would immediately spear you. They are commonly supposed to dwell on the tops of high mountains and are iron workers. They are called the Mwenkwale Jumpi.

[illegible] There is no relation so far as I know between these two classes of "little people," but I think these stories go to upset the theory recently advanced by Hastings Gulliard in his Hunterian Lectures (1914) that folk-lore fables of bakgalidzes, etc., have a basis in fact. He believes that dwarf races at one time were to be found, possibly over a very wide area of the globe. In this country, I think it may be that we see the transition from historical facts to true fairy stories.

[illegible] The Anyanja have the same legend about these "little people," the mwandi mwandi ("where-did-you-see-me"); it is indeed not only wide-spread throughout this country, (the Alunga and Ambonda in North Nyasa district speak of the mwandimwandu who ask the same question), but there is a very similar legend among the Akikuyu in British East Africa.[2]

The chinwa is doubtless the chiwani of the Anyanja, mentioned in Scott's dictionary,[3] as Miss Werner[4] has suggested, for one finds that among the Anyanja at the southern end of the Peninsula, the chinwa is described as having only one side to his body so that he is invisible when viewed from the off side, thus resembling the chiwani who has one half of his body made of wax.

[1] Op. cit., vol. 1, p. 11. [2] H. W. H. Beech, 'Two Years' campaign of East Africa,' (Mac, London, 1914, p. 40-41).
[3] Op. cit., p. 50. [4] British Central Africa, op. cit., p. 20.

S:Swanson D-5 Ion. 1951] 1952 FTT Tao FTT

Lusuto Mtengo is the prophet of Isoma, a man of great height who walks the round of the country, stepping from hill-top to hill-top along "the fairy way," the "Mlire wa Lusuto Mtengo," which is supposed to run right around Nyasaland and never to cross a river, starting and ending somewhere near the junction of the Shiré with the Zambezi river. As he goes, he can be seen from a hundred miles away. He carries the Isimbo instrument and plays as he walks, singing:

"Ndiwe mwe Amapapo Amlopo mwe wamudzo wamudzo ndiwe"
"You my son (in trouble) with the midget Amadzoo I must call up the wasps, this season of famine!"

which might be rendered, "You people grumble about small troubles, so I will teach you to know better by inflicting great ones." When he is seen, there will be famine.

It will be convenient here to allude briefly to some of the beliefs connected with meteorological phenomena, as some of them have a bearing on native religious beliefs. The remarks made under this heading for the Anyanja hold good for the Yao. The morning and evening stars are called Nyamulaka and Nyamupalanga, the good cook and the bad cook. They are looked upon as the two wives of the moon, one of whom feeds him so well that he grows fat, the other who does not, so he wastes away. The constellation of the Pleiades is called Jimsiku; the Milky Way, Lubingo wadza, "the watcher of the night," when high in the heavens, dawn is near. When shooting stars are seen, natives exclaim "mwapie mdwajo!" Mwapie is a sweep-pointed arrow. Eclipses are recognized but no explanation is vouchsafed. Thunder is supposed to be the noise of rain falling in the heavens before it reaches the earth. The rain is sometimes supposed to be the condensing steam from an enormous pot of water boiling over a furnace fire in heaven. The lightning is conceived as a lizard-like animal which dwells in the clouds and darts out from behind them and comes to earth and breaks up trees and may kill a man. Mire is supposed by the Yao to be its movement. The animal is called Njoai, and is the same as Mpamba of the Ashipeta who consider the rainbow to be the broken egg-shell of the lightning dragons' eggs. There is a large red compound lily, a species of Haemanthus also called Njoai, which is in some way connected with the lightning. No Yao child would ever touch this flower. Children are always advised never to seek shelter under a big tree but always to make for a bamboo thicket, for if the lightning strikes the bamboo and splits it, it will get caught inside the hollow stem.

Gales of wind are said to emanate from a plant called Chanpale. It is described as having one prongs like an elephant's trunk and others like two fingers. It is found on the tops of very high mountains, growing alone and surrounded by bare rock. This plant is used by medicine men to gain supernatural powers. Chanpale is also the name of a parasitic plant on the charcoal trees in Nyasaland.

The world is taken by the natives as they find it; to them no explanation for its being is necessary. So far as I can find out, there is no idea among the Yao of a Creator. The [illegible] origin of mankind is explained in a story given elsewhere; Mulungu takes no part, nor is the supernatural even invoked in explanation.

The religion of the Tso may then be summed up as somewhat vaguely phrased, ill-defined, monotheistic belief in a supreme being. Their religion is not animistic. There are certain spirits of evil, demons, fairies and supernatural beings and animals which, however, do not play any real part in their religious beliefs.

Native Sayings. Natives are very fond of sayings, many of which are of the same nature as our own proverbs. The meaning of many of them is, however, not always self-evident but depends on some little story with a moral.

The following are some of those which I have collected among the Tso near Sesheke:

1. Akwanda kkandalala! (or kpalala)
   He caught a fish, (a mouse!)

An expression meaning "He slipped down." The variations being used when wet or when dry under foot.

2. Uwenda ubi ni'mwa!
   Coming is in the eye (evident).

An expression meaning "Look out; some one is after us!"

   Kalala shangwa!
   Rabbit is shown!

This is a Mang'anja equivalent to the above.

3. Chenyepilowa mwakkkkkala wanyanda!
   A thing that did not know they cooked in among the herbs!

An insect which had not listened to advice about the dangers of sitting on herbs used as vegetables, was gathered up by a woman and cooked with them.
An expression used with the sense "If you do not take advice and anything happens to you, it will be your own fault."

4. Mlala ubi ni'wapikwala!
   Medicine is in the nest!

Meaning "You are forewarned; it is your own look out!"

5. Kwapikwanda wandachala ukkkkkkwa!
   Mr Would-Be-Clever they left with the shell!

Ku-kalanda, to be clever (to show off); an expression made to a newcomer who unbidden joins in a discussion. It has reference to the following story and means that anyone joining a party unbidden may find himself in an awkward situation. Some strangers came to a village, and after being given food and quarters, all retired for the night. One of them, however, Mr. Would-Be-Clever, hearing something going on outside crept out of the house to find out what was happening. Seeing some people playing at catch-ball, he

T: Hetherwick M-S (ca. 1900) 1932 FT7 Tao FT7

with the dead. He approaches the shrine, opens the gate of the fence, takes a 769 pinch of beer and pours it into the pot on the head of the grave. Next he places the basket of porridge and the plate of meat on the second basin in and retires.
Kneeling down outside the gate facing the shrine and a few yards in front of the people he chants his prayer in a monotone, each petition commencing with "Chonde, chonde," "Please, please." All the while the people clap their hands in unison with him and sing the responses as they do in a native case in the chief's court.

When the offering has been made at the grave, the rest of the beer or other food is consumed by the worshippers. Grass are fired as a token of respect to the dead, and the rest of the day is spent in dancing. [639]

Such shrines are to be seen in almost every Tao village where the inhabitants have been located for any length of time. They are regarded with awe—the little 778 boys as they pass whisper to each other in a warning tone, "nsondo." Should the 769 village be moved to any other district, the old shrine is not forgotten. Periodical visits are made to it with the usual offerings. In cases where the old house has been occupied by a people hostile to the old inhabitants, such visits are usually made during the night, and the people awake in the morning to feel that the old chief's grave in their midst has been newly repaired, and a fresh offering of food placed on its head.

Sometimes such shrines are found on the summits of hills which some way have been a refuge from the enemy in times of war, but which now lie bare and deserted. Thither in their need the people make their way with their offering of food and beer, and their prayer for rain or suitable weather for the crops. Near Phwetyre such shrines are to be seen on the tops of Mount Sochi and Mount Mishiro. The former is the abode of the spirit of Kankhwaka, and the latter of Mpulule, both old Mawri or Mang'anja chiefs who doubtless fled there seeking safety from the war of the invading Tao, and died leaving their wounds to be the nsonsopo or spirit of the mountain. Some years ago, during the fear of an Angoni invasion, the Tao of Mount Sochi fled to the hill-top for refuge, and there the old chief Kapasi died. He was buried close to the grave of the old Kankhwaka, and now, when the Tao on Sochi make an offering, it is to the spirit of Kapasi that the homage is paid, and the shrine of Kankhwaka lies neglected.

Only the graves of chiefs or headmen are thus treated as shrines of worship. 554
The burying place of slaves and the common people lies away in the thick bush, 769 where only the rank grass or the thicket of old trees marks the spot. No offerings 769 are ever taken there, for such as are buried there can have no influence in the 778 spirit world. The dead are buried, the broken pot or basket is left on the grave to mark the spot, and none ever seek to go there save to lay another in the same neglected ground.

II. But the word nsonsopo is used by the Tao with a wider application. 776
Etymologically the word is connected with the root kulwapwa, which in so many 197 of the other branches of the Bantu tongue appears as kulu or kuru, and signifies 192
"great" or "old." It is the same root which appears in the Kafir word for God, 778 Unkulunkulu, which may therefore be rendered as "The old, old One," or "The 777 great, great One." A like rendering may be given of the Ewe term mawuga, the 782 "Old One," or the "Great One." In this or a modified form mawuga (Dwalin) is [104] apparent in all the Eastern group of the Bantu tongues as the equivalent for "God" (see Father Torrend's Comparative Grammar of South African Bantu Languages). To trace it as Father Torrend does to any connection with Moloch, the god of the Phoenicians, is to attach undue weight to a chance coincidence of sounds.

195 As we have already seen, the word mawuga is applied to the human dead 779 when regarded as an object of worship, or as an inhabitant of the spirit world.
778 But it is also used to denote that spirit world in general, or more properly speaking, the aggregate of the spirits of all the dead. The plural form of the word is rarely heard, unless when the allusion is made to the souls in their individualities. In its native use and form the word does not imply personality, for it does not belong to the personal class of nouns. Etymologically it is cognate with the leg, heart, arm, head, etc., of the human frame. In form denotes rather a state or property inherent in something, as the life or health inherent in the body. Among the various tribes where the word is in use as we have described, the missionaries have adopted it as the term for "God." But the untaught Ewe refuses to assign to it any idea of being or personality. It is to him more a quality or family of the human nature whose signification he has extended so as to embrace the whole spirit world. Once after I had endeavoured to impress an old Ewe heathen with the personality of the Godhead in the Christian sense of the term, using the term Mawuga, my listener began to talk of "Our Mawuga," "Mr. God," showing that originally to him the word conveyed no idea of the personality I was ascribing to it.

776 And yet the Ewe approaches closely to the idea of personality and a personal 773 being, when he speaks of what mawuga has done and is doing. It is mawuga who made the world, and man, and animals. Far in the interior of the continent, toward the north-west, beyond the plains and swamps of the Lungwa River and Lake Bangwelu, there lies, in Ewe legend, an island in the midst of a lake called Kapitilonya. On that island there is to be seen a large flat rock marked by the footprints of men and animals of all kinds. When that rock was once a lump of moist clay, mawuga created all living things and sent them across the salt water, where their footprints remained to be afterwards hardened into the impressible rock. Such is the Ewe legend of the creation of the world, and mawuga is always the Great Creator.

776 Mawuga is also regarded as the agent in anything mysterious. "It's [107] mawuga," is the Ewe exclamation on being shown anything that is beyond the range of his understanding. The rainbow is always "mawuga," although some Ewes have begun to use the Mang'anja term "nin wa Lawa," bow of Lawa.

769 Offerings are made to the spirit world or to mawuga as the great agency in 782 the affairs of human life. Outside the village, or beside the heathen's hut, may often be seen a rough shed. In this are placed the first-fruits of the new crop,

777

777 LUCK AND CHANCE--concept of good and bad luck; ideas about chance and probability; things associated with good or bad luck (e.g., lucky objects, luck-bringing formulas, lucky and unlucky numbers, propitious and unlucky days); techniques for controlling luck (e.g., wearing of luck amulets, reciting of lucky formulas); conception of fate, etc. See also:

Seasons	448	Divination	97
Gambling	649	Person numbers	301
Parapsychic studies	701	Calendar	68
Theory of accidental injuries	766	Scientific theory of chance	613

9-Pamma B-6 (ca. 1910) 1952 FT7 Tan FT7

[91] [573] [574] as he climbs a tree with his back to the trunk; at the top he hangs by his legs and looks down on the crowd, his assistants doing the same. Coming down he runs to his hut; throwing his "tail" into the air and catching it again, he enters.

This is about nine a.m.; all cast till about eleven o'clock, the cast somewhile eating food cooked by their mothers in the shelters. About eleven o'clock, the n'wéléléle takes a big gourd and putting his "tails" into it covered with a white cloth, gives it to his assistant who carries it on his head and follows him to a pool of water, accompanied by all the women except any young men who have not borne children. He invites them to go "crab-hunting."

At the pool he enters the water with his assistants round him, except the assistant with the gourd, who stands on the bank. The n'wéléléle makes movements as of hunting for crabs in the water singing:

"Chwanyande ngwéli ngwéli nwanyi nwanyi"
"There must be hunting otherwise I should have had to eat porridge my without relish!"

He pretends to catch a crab and his hands are immediately grasped by his assistants in the water who all help him to convey it to the gourd as the "tail" is taken out of it.

[91] The crowd then returns to Lepanda to enact the nambunde ceremony. Nambunde is a representation of an animal made of bark on a frame-work covered with cloth and painted with flour in spiral markings, hence the name (nbunde is a part of a spiral shell from the Zambezi coast much prized by natives as an ornament). The animal is really the cattle antelope with horns and the n'wéléléle's "tails" in place; there is a man inside it. It is made perhaps a mile away and then brought near to Lepanda and placed in a cleared area.

The n'wéléléle on his return from crab-hunting has gone into his hut and put on his full regalia; then, accompanied by his drummers, he comes out and is immediately followed by the cast and the rest of the crowd; knowing where the nambunde will be put, he leads the people in the opposite direction calling out to them to look out for the antelope. They, of course, all look in the wrong direction, so when he knows nambunde is in place, he wheels round and stops. "There is the animal!"

In the old days the chief was present for this, a platform being built for him. When the nambunde appeared, he gave his hunters much powder (no bullets) and they shot at the animal. The animal would fall as if hit and the n'wéléléle would approach to claim it as his beast, but it would promptly get up and charge, to be driven off by the crowd, whereupon it would run away into the bush.

Lots are then cast by the n'wéléléle, using a tortoise shell stuffed with medicine. The cast all stand in a circle with their mothers behind them, while the n'wéléléle goes to the leader and throws the tortoise at the boy's chest. If it sticks there, all is well and he pretends to rub boy. Should the shell not stick on the boy's chest, it portends ill-luck to that individual and he has to be dealt with further. The n'wéléléle, holding his "tail," and his assistant holding a horn of medicine, stand back to back, with the boy between [56] While the wali then march solemnly along shaking their wands, the assistants begin singing:

[77]

"Ee village assistant"
"To the gate they have shot"

[57] [58] to which the wali reply:

"Kanwa kwalagalia"
"There is no place where to pass"

The w'wisbile remains at Lepunda till everyone else has left; he then sets fire to the shelters and leaving without looking back, runs to overtake the procession and then leads it on towards the village still at a slow pace, while all around is a yelling crowd of delighted mothers and other relatives and the assistants and drummers, all singing and shouting.

When the outskirts of the village are reached, the w'wisbile halts and waits for the chief to come out and give them permission to enter. The chief brings cotton which unrolled on the ground measures the length of the procession of wali. Headed now by their leader, the wali walk over this cotton, while the assistants roll it up behind them for the w'wisbile, as it is part of his payment. Flour may be brought him at the same time, carried by the chief's wives.

At an Uyaya I witnessed at Kwimbanwa's, the hall was called on the bank of a stream at the edge of the village where a bamboo arch had been erected. The arrival of Chief Malenya at this point with cotton and flour was the sign for a demonstration by his young men who ran forward as if in battle, firing off blank rounds from old Tower muskets and executing a kind of war dance.

After the cotton has been handed over, the chief returns to his kraal and the procession continues into the village, across the village open space to the house round the chief's house. Then, the wali enter by a gateway and disperse over the courtyard where they find [71] their sleeping-mats laid out ready for them by their mothers. The w'wisbile lays his "tail" on the leader's mat to bring good luck thereafter. With Mbunda, there is no further part for the wali, but in some cases they are called upon by the chief to give an exhibition of their dancing and drumming. The wali sleep that night in the kraal and disperse the following day.

In the morning, the w'wisbile takes his "tail" and a stirring stick made from a millet stalk with the roots on it, and strikes the ground at points in a row in front of the chief's [72] house. Here the pots of beer which have been prepared are placed in rows, those chosen by the chief and those chosen by the w'wisbile, and drinking commences. The w'wisbile, before he joins in, takes the wali to an ash-heap in the village and there sprinkles them with medicine from a grain-mortar after which they go with their shamwari behind a house and [73] change into new clothes. They then go and salute the chief by clapping their hands and depart to their villages, duly initiated and somewhat subdued by what they have been through. Their new names as "men," may be given them by the shamwari either at Lepunda [55] or after the return to the village.

3:Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

Tingalinga was another well-known performer; he used to do the same tricks as Kambanja. He also was possessed of an elastic skin and is said to have been able "to tie his ears together behind the back of his head." 789 791

Mpechetula, a Yao of Mkanda, is a man with considerable renown. He is said to be able to produce a lion at will from a lion's tail and claw. He would offer to show this if there were any brave enough to go through with it. On a moonlight night, he would expose on the ground in a cleared space near a village the tail of a lion held cross-wise in a piece of split bamboo. At the split end of the bamboo, he would place a lion's claw and round this, a woman's belt held in position by three bamboo pegs, around which he would draw a circle of mbepusi flour. Everyone would then withdraw to a hut in which the séance was to take place. After an hour or so, Mpechetula would send some one out to inspect the lion's tail where probably all would be found intact. He might then pretend to be uninterested and sleepy and suggest that some one should go out again in half an hour. Sooner or later, a man would come back, having found the tail gone; then everyone would go out to see what had happened. The pegs would be found in place but the tail and claw gone. A little way off, the split piece of bamboo would be found and further still a bead or two from the woman's belt. These, Mpechetula would pick up, and leaving a little trail of flour on their way, all returned to the hut, while he whistled as if calling some one. Suddenly they would be aroused by the sound as of a lion brushing against the hut walls, as the beasts are known to do, and next, a loud roar. Mpechetula would immediately open the door half-way so that the people could look out into the moonlight and there, a little way off, would be the lion. It would immediately advance towards the house and then, as it prepared to spring for the door, Mpechetula would offer it some of the flour in his left hand, armed with a stirring-stick, mtiko, in his right hand. As the lion landed, he would strike it on the head with the stick and lo and behold! the lion would vanish and the tail and claw would be found in his hand.

Superstitions. Scattered throughout these notes, particularly under Usewi and Disease, mention is made of practices which show a strong belief in superstition. Below are given a number of minor beliefs, and it is interesting to compare them with many well-known superstitions in other parts of the world. 771 784

1. A child who cuts the upper incisor teeth first will be unlucky. Such children used to be killed by the Yao. (Other tribes make medicine against the threatened ill-luck.) [777] ●

2. A woman with polydactylism may not take food out of a corn-store. Otherwise the stock of corn will not last long. (Rudimentary sixth fingers are not uncommon.) [732]

3. An insect called chiopesa nusi which lives in the mud at the bottom of pools, if killed causes the water to dry up. [823]

4. If a boy puts a water-spider in the armpit when learning to swim, he will learn quickly.

5. A man wishing to prevent rain falling on a day he is making a journey, will wrap some of the leaves of the mtowesi tree in his loin cloth and go without drinking. [824]

3:Stanzus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

19. That portion of the gut of animals having folds of mucus membrane inside, may be eaten only by old people past the child-propagating age. If a young woman should eat it, she would have difficulty in labor. 771 784 [862]

20. It is believed that people who eat too freely of a little fish like whitebait called mutumbu get obstruction of the bowel by the wedging together of the bones. The treatment adopted is to pass up the rectum a smooth stick with a pad of rag at the end. This cannot be done by the person himself and so the aid of another has to be called in; only an intimacy, such as the relationship of brother-in-law gives, will warrant this service being asked.

21. The Yao believe that there is a little insect which lives in the ear, called chiyeme lipilewile, which tells the person what is said to him, the wax in the ear being its excrement. The pupil is called mwanache jwa lisu, the child of the eye. [825]

22. Among women, the uterus is called nawaso (maso = eyes); it is supposed to be a little person who holds the foetus. When the child is born, nawaso cannot find it and starts looking about, the movements causing the afterpains.

23. A man making his first journey to the coast used to sprinkle himself with water from every stream he crossed to give him a safe journey. In the same way, women at the present day going between Zomba and Blantyre sprinkle their babies with water from each stream. [484]

24. An ant-like insect called ndupetumbe (tumbutumbu, Chin.) [dasylabris maphistis] is lucky. On seeing it a native pats its belly and then rubs his own, wishing for plenty of food that day. If he is embarking on a journey or beginning some enterprise, he will wrap one of these insects in a fold of his loin cloth and take it with him for luck. [825]

25. When a native hears the mwaipe bird call (its call is like the mew of a cat), if he wants something, he immediately says, "Oh mwaipe, I want so-and-so. Be quiet and I will then be quiet, too!" If the bird ceases calling, he knows the wish will be granted. The female bird is said to be the more certain prophet.

26. The snake, nahlukuti, which lives in trees and is of a buff clay color with green markings, is said by natives to pierce the chest and tie a knot in itself on each side so that it can only be withdrawn by cutting off one knot. When the snake is thus withdrawn, its blood mixes with that of the man and he will die.

27. Natives have a habit of marking the spot where any event takes place by a stone by the side of the path, and every passer-by will add a stone for luck. In this way some large piles of stones have been made. [777]

28. A man resting on his way home from a long journey places a stone in the fork between the branches of a nearby tree, so that on his arrival he may find his wife has put by some food for him and has not used up the day's stock of flour.

29. A chameleon found digging in the path is said to presage the death of the finder's nearest relative. [787]

3: Stanzus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

262 no one will touch. With the exception of carrion birds such as the crow and the hawk, most birds are considered fit to eat. The hornbill is not eaten, as it is supposed to carry part [825] of a corpse on its nose.[1] Fowls form a regular article of diet, but some taboos in this connection are mentioned elsewhere.

Eggs are eaten only by children and old people; that is, by those outside the child propagating age. Milk is never consumed in any form. They say, "What a disgusting habit, to suck the juice of an animal while it is still alive!"

[843] Pregnant women will not eat certain things lest the child be born with some deformity, such as the snout of a pig, or the white stripes of a zebra.

539 Art and decoration. Sculpture can hardly be said to be an art known to the Yao. The only piece of stone work I have ever seen was a granite boulder, on the surface of which cup-holes had been made for the game of Bao (Pl. IV, fig. 4).

Of late years, individuals here and there have begun carving wooden figures of men and animals. The Yao, of course, make no idols. It is uncertain exactly how long it is since any of these people started producing wooden figures. I should think that this art has sprung up within the past twelve or thirteen years, that is to say, since there has been a market for them among European residents. In the first place only natives and some of the common animals, the eland and leopard, were represented; since then, many animals and Europeans have been copied. The native is extraordinarily clever in reproducing characteristic features in dress, etc., so that a Portuguese is easily distinguished from an Englishman. The little models in ivory of animals and native household objects, made by the Swahili people on Lake Nyasa, have never been copied by the Yao. Neither do they make clay images of men and cattle as do the Zulu-descended Angoni and cattle-keeping Wankonde. No native would allow any wooden figure to remain in his house for [777] fear of ill luck; the women especially would look askance at them, fearing some misfortune in their next pregnancy. Little wooden figures of birds, however, are sometimes seen affixed to the point of the hut roof.

[177] The making of carved figures, then, is of recent introduction, or rather is a recent event in the evolution of the Yao, as they were not taught but self-inspired in the work.

The ability to make representations of objects by drawing appears in the same way to originate spontaneously here and there as a sport. Natives with a talent for drawing are found among all the tribes, and among the Yao, it is said, there have always been some who have been able to draw. Naturally enough, their reproductions are made on the walls of their houses, and their subjects are generally animals of the forest, sometimes men and houses, or some other object of particular interest[2] (Pl. VIII, fig. 1). I also give sketches of some other drawings I have noted (Pl. XVIII); the line figure of a man at Makanjila's or after the return to the village. The boys often wear all their beadwork and new cloth for several days; after carrying their ngonge for a similar period, they give them up to their ahamani. Together they go into the bush where they break up their wands and put them either into a pit or in the forked branch of a tree. Before the m'wichila leaves, he brings to the chief all his takings and these are divided between them. 881

[1] Vide supra, p. 337.

[2] Cf. A. Werner, 'A Native Painting from Nyasaland,' Geog. Abs. Soc., London 1903, vol. 3, no. 30, p. 199-202.

3: Stanner D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

Mention has been made above of the ingonge and it now remains to consider these more fully. The figures vary in subject, in number and in arrangement. At the ceremony at Kumnanma's, the following were arranged in a long line beginning with the whale and ending with the python before ching'undang'unga (Pl. X, fig. 2). 778 825

1. Nahungwani ..... the whale (Pl. XI, fig. 7).
2. Nyoma ..... the crocodile (Pl. XII, fig. 1).
3. Chimi ..... the leopard (Pl. XII, fig. 3).
4. Mbunda ..... the zebra (Pl. X, fig. 6).
5. Nyuba ..... the scaly anteater (Pl. XII, fig. 2).
6. Nhumundu ..... the hippopotamus (Pl. XII, fig. 4).
7. Kunga (nakunga?) ..... (Pl. X, fig. 5).
8. Mbalagi ..... the sable antelope (Pl. XI, fig. 3).
9. Wahungwe wa chikuwa-bulala ..... the woman dead in child-birth (Pl. XIII, fig. 2).
10. Lipuwo ..... the sun (Pl. XI, fig. 4).
11. Lihokwa ..... the scorpion (Pl. XII, fig. 6).
12. Mbale ..... the plate (Pl. XI, fig. 6).
13. Likwamundu ..... a kind of cloth (Pl. XI, fig. 5).
14. Njoni ..... the lightning-lizard (Pl. XIII, fig. 4).
15. Sokota ..... the iguana (Pl. XII, fig. 5).
16. M'undu ..... the man (Pl. XIII, fig. 1).
17. Lipuhwa ..... the wild pig (Pl. XI, fig. 1).
18. Sungula ..... the hare (Pl. XI, fig. 2).
19. Sata ..... the python (Pl. XIII, fig. 3).

Beside these, Nyasa, the lake, nearly always appears;[1] Mwezi, the moon, the drunken woman, and certain animals may be represented, and in addition, chiuta, "the dwelling place of all the old spirits." Each particular m'wichila has his favorite figures about which he sings, always commencing, however, with the whale.

Reproduced here is the series of ingonge at Kumnanma's village sketched at the time of my visit. It seems probable that originally the same set of figures was always reproduced. It is hard to trace their significance with any certainty. Natives aver that they are made only for instructional purposes. "The animals are made so that the boys may recognize them, while some of the other figures have reference to customs." They deny the more in-

[1] Cf. Stanner and Depuy, 'The initiation ceremony for boys among the Yao of Nyasaland,' op. cit., Pl. III, fig. 3.

3: Stanzus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

778
825

tersting possibility of a totemic origin and it is, of course, true that at the present time the Yao have few clan names referring to animals and practically no clan food taboo.

At Mkangula's village in September 1913, I saw the ingoge figures being made. The long grass was cleared away and the earth hoed up into heaps, roughly of the shape and size of the figures to be made. A number of women were employed carrying water from the stream with which the mounds were well moistened and moulded into more definite form. The outlines of the figures were then drawn in, all by one oldish man, with flour smeared on by hand. In drawing nahungumi, it was interesting to note how the efforts to keep to symmetry failed.

Of nyuma, chinsi, ngaba, ndomondo, mbalapi, nakata, lipulusu, nato, I have little to add; the wali are told of their habits, whether they are good to eat, whether they are dangerous, etc.; and all the stories about them. Mbunda, the zebra, is always represented in duplicate for some unknown reason. Sungula is pointed out in reference to a story the boys have been told at Ndapala, namely, that the hare is good to eat but they must not eat it till after they are married and their wives have borne children; otherwise they will be childless. The superstitition regarding the hare is mentioned elsewhere. Njasi is the hypothetical lizard-like animal which lives above the clouds and is seen as lightning. Likwiambo is a cloth which the Yao used to wear. In the presence of his chief, a man must not throw a fold over his shoulder. Mbale, the plate, refers to the chief's plate from which he eats. Likoloto: It is said that the old people used to eat scorpions and the people of Mangoche, Amangoche Yao, used to call the Amachinga Yao the "Mabolokoto eaters." Lyuwa is the sun, the giver of daytime. Wakongwe is a representation of a pregnant woman who has died undelivered because her husband was unfaithful. This is a well recognised superstition and one among others of equal moral value, inculcated into the youths during their stay at Ndapala. Though rough, wakongwe is a very realistic figure. The woman is evidently lying down, as one hand supports the head, the other hand grasps the thigh as if she were in pain; the breasts are made large and the figure being in relief, the prominent abdomen, and expanded umbilicus are noticeable features. The face and pudenda are modelled in clay and superimposed on the earth figure; a maize cob stalk is placed in the nose to counterpart the nose-button worn by women.

In contradiction to wakongwe, mundu is symbolic of the man who has led a proper life and is blessed with a child. The child is shown on one side. On his other side is seen a conventional illustration of a spear, possibly to indicate that the figure is that of a man. I am not very sure about Kanga; it may be meant for nakanga, the woman who officiates at Litiso; there is nothing about the figure to suggest a woman and I could learn nothing concerning it.

Nahungumi: There appears to be some difference of opinion about this animal. Formerly I accepted the translation given by Scott,[1] namely, the whale. Others have supposed that the word refers to some large animal which lived or may still live in the big lakes. The older natives say of nalumgumi that "it lived in the big sea at Zanzibar. It would come and lie on the surface of the water, maybe near a village; then the people would go down and cut lumps of meat off without its knowledge; the wounds healed up immediately. Meat from different parts differed; some was nasty to taste. It was a very large animal indeed and never lived in the lakes." They distinguish it from liporo of the Anyanja which was "bigger than a hippopotamus but not so big as nalumgumi, lived in the lakes of Nyasaland, in the deep parts as at Tunde on Lake Chilwa; was very fierce and killed the hippopotamus; would upset canoes. There are no more liporo but probably there might be." One of my informants, a man of forty, said his father had been told of them by his father, but he had never seen them. At the present time, other natives say that the nalumgumi used to live in the lakes but they seem really to refer to liporo and I think looseness of speech only accounts for the idea that the word refers to anything but the whale. Hetherwick translates nalumgumi as a large fish figuring in the initiation ceremonies,[1] a poor description, since it always has four limbs. The word nalumgumi meaning a whale, occurs among the Mchiwambo people who live at Quilimane. These people do not make any figures on the ground at their circumcision ceremonies but it is interesting to note that their wali carry staffs similar to the ngongo on their return to the village. I think, therefore, there can be little doubt that the word refers to the whale which was probably well known to the Yao before they migrated so far inland as Nyasaland. Whether the word was adopted or not in these parts in the past and used for some indigenous animal now extinct, one cannot be quite sure, but I think it is improbable; I believe the confusion with liporo is of quite recent date. Liporo itself appears to have been some large mammal of the hippopotamus type, extinct probably for some time. The stories of liporo resemble those of the monster of Lake Ngami and are not without interest. The most weighty evidence against the animal now depicted at the Unyago and called nalumgumi being a whale, is found in the representations themselves. It has a neck with a knob at the junction of the head with the body and a second knob at the junction of the body, tail and hind limbs; the tail is well marked. The "webbing" between the limbs is, I think, a means of finishing the figure and is not supposed to represent some anatomical feature of the beast. The same is, I think, true of the markings, lines, dots, etc., which are purely decorative. Reference has already been made to its tusks. The little mounds on either side of the body of the animal, on one side within the "webbing," are spoken of as the "little hills" and are not suggested breasts as one might imagine. The hollows have no significance according to my informers except that they are where the m'michila stands; the mark which looks like a native hoe, I believe, is meant to represent the hoe which has been used in making the figures.

[1] David Clement Scott, 'A cyclopædic dictionary of the Mang'anja Language,' Edinburgh, 1892, p. 421.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

Chinyasa, the lake: the photograph in the article by Dr. Davey and myself of Nyasa[1]

[1] Op. cit., p. 320. [1] Op. cit., Pl. III, fig. 2.

3: Stanmus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

778 gives an excellent idea of the average figure; it is circular in plan, often with a little hillock in the centre known as betumbi kangungubi, "the hill of debt," and disposed in the quadrants are four depressions.

881 When the usili are introduced to Chinpasa, they stand round in a circle while the 778 m'michila stands in one of the depressions with perhaps two of his assistants in others.
533 The m'michila sings:
539

"Nyasa kungungula chinungungula mumunche ningumila kwilombo, amai!
"The lake enormous was I born child I would have died on the plain, mother!"
Ninguwila ninguwila!"

or

"I have lived by the great lake all my life; I should have died in the plains."

while all three make movements as of paddling a canoe. The depressions are said to represent canoes. I believe this is the recognised form but I have also seen an oblong figure with two outlines of unmistakable canoes. Chinpasa is usually found near nalumgumi.

Chiuta, when represented, stands beyond mbunda. It consists of two trenches at right angles forming a cross, which are covered over with logs and earth and the whole outlined with flour in a decorative pattern. The end of one limb of the cross is left open and round this opening a screen of grass is made. As the usili approach Chiuta, some of the assistants or abawusi descend into the trenches for the ceremony. The m'michila takes up his stand at the centre of the cross and sings:

"Chiuta, amao, kwiola chiuta!"
"Chiuta, mother, come see chiuta!"

881 Then as everyone says "Listen, listen!" crying is heard "coming out of the bowels of the 778 earth," followed by drumming and the singing of the chindimba songs (sometimes mbunda [775] or masche); a horn is sometimes heard as well as lululuta, trilling with the tongue against the lips. Chiuta is called "the resting place of all departed spirits" and the sounds are said to be the echoes of their doings. The word is not met with elsewhere among the Yao, although it occurs in the Chinyanja and in other languages of this country with the meaning "the heavens."

Chiwuta is said by Hetherwick[1] to be "a large fish that forms one of the pictures at the Ungapo," but I have never seen it or heard of it, and I am doubtful of the correctness of the statement.

778 Ching'undang'unda: Dr. Davey's photograph[2] is an excellent reproduction of this [531] figure, which consists of a mound of earth flattened on the top, and decorated with geometric patterns in flour which extend to the ground. In the centre and at the four corners, so to speak, are implanted billets of wood with decorative lines and dots in black and red on the white wood (Pl. X, figs. 1, 2). The billets are three inches in diameter and project twelve to fifteen inches above the ground.

[1] Handbook of the Yao language, op. cit., p. 142. [2] Op. cit., Pl. III, fig. 2.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

The actual meaning of this figure it is very difficult to ascertain. It may be referred to as "the little hill of debt" signifying, I believe, an idea that everyone owes a debt to his Unpipe, to his progenitors, and to his own future progeny. It is the spot where medicine has been buried to insure the Unyago success, and may be looked upon as the keystone of the ceremonies which take place at Lupanda. The derivation of the word is probably from ku-ulipa, "to heap up earth into a mound," or maybe from ku-unda, "to teach children manners," but it is uncertain as the word is variously spelled; the spelling I have given follows the pronunciation of the old people. 778

Lupanda: This consists of a mound of earth closely resembling ching'undung'unda in shape and decoration with similar wooden billets at the base, while on the top is often planted a branch from a tree (Pl. X, figs. 3, 4). The word is derived from the verb ku-panda, "to plant" and signifies the place which the m'wichila marks for the ceremonies to take place.

Reference has already been made to the assistants of the m'wichila. The chief assistant has been already mentioned; some three or four others who aid him are friends of the m'wichila from his own village. They participate at the essential moments of the ceremonies, singing, drumming, or dancing, and together with some of the akamusi, take part in chiuta. Beside these, there are regular bands of trained drummers and dancers who attend Lupanda and dance in the village in the morning and at Lupanda in the afternoon of the day of return. They usually dance chambe and sanje. They are men who come for the fun of the thing and, of course, may gain a good deal from presents. On so important an occasion, there is much criticism of their performance. Should one of them not dance well enough to please the old people, they may call out, "Pluck off his feathers!" and the unlucky fellow has all his dancing kit and any clothes beside stripped off and he is driven forth naked, the laughing stock of the crowd. 881

Chiputu: The initiation ceremony for girls is on lines very similar to the boys' ceremony. The age at which the girls take part is from about ten to fourteen years, though lately they have been much younger on the whole, in consequence of the older people's wishes that their children shall benefit from its instruction before they come under civilising influences and the recently introduced mission teaching.

When a number of girls have reached the proper age in a village or group of villages, as with the boys, the chief is approached and he arranges a date for the ceremony during the same season as Lupanda and for similar reasons.

The woman corresponding to the m'wichila who arranges everything is called mtewi. Each girl mwali about to be initiated is looked after by a woman, her akamusi.

The girls, their guardians, and the mistress of the ceremonies, together with the inhabitants of the villages adjourn, as in the case of Lupanda, to a spot some little distance from the main village, called Chiputu. Here grass shelters have been erected beforehand and food has been collected.

3: Stanmus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

There has never been any shortage of land and therefore the plotting out of gardens was a matter which caused little trouble. A man wishing to make a new garden the next season simply marked the site in the bush by scoring some trees or hoeing around some patches of grass and tying the grass ends into a knot. If anyone else came along and hoed this plot, the man who had marked it out still claimed it and need not pay for the hoeing done. Whenever a man was doubtful about a piece of land, he would ask advice of the headman of the village. 423

When an abandoned garden had become overgrown, anyone wishing to take it up applied to the headman who sent him to ask the original owners whether they wished to take it again. The newcomer could take possession only with their permission. 361

Often if a village were moved, during the first season the people simply put up shelters in their gardens. Later, the site of the village was chosen and around it a medicine man sprinkled medicine to insure happiness and prosperity. The tree from which this medicine was made became sacred to the village and might not be used for firewood, or was subject to any other taboo the medicine man might care to make. He might also say, "In this village there shall be no pounding of grain at night," etc. 423 [789] [778]

If a village were to be built near a spot previously inhabited, medicine and offerings were made to the departed spirits of the former occupants to put them at rest and "open" the place to the newcomers. The beer-pot from the grave of some former chief or headman, who was supposed to have directed the destinies of the old village, was brought to the new location and beer placed in it to insure his continued guidance. [769]

In the case of a village into which a number of men had married, the sponsors of the wives went to the sponsors of the husbands and asked permission to move the village.[1] Later, beer was brewed in the new village and the sponsors invited to come and drink and "put foot in the new village." [273]

Relationship. Family relationship among natives presents certain difficulties to the Europeans accustomed to equivalent relationship of males and females on both sides of the family. In the diagram below (Fig. 1) the relationship of the two children (C 5) will be traced. The mother and father (B 10 and 9) are the achikulu and wese but are addressed as amao and atati. The maternal uncles older and younger than the mother (B 11 and 15) are called alumbuma and their wives (B 12 and 16) akwapua. The maternal aunts are addressed as amao, mother, anyone older than the mother being distinguished as amao wakulungwa, "the bigger" (B 13), a younger aunt as amao wanandi, "the lesser" (B 17); their respective husbands are addressed atati, atati wakulungwa (B 14), and atati wanandi (B 18). On the father's side the uncles are called atati wakulungwa (B 1) and atati wanandi (B 5), respectively, for those older and younger than the father, and their wives amao wakulungwa (B 2) and amao wanandi (B 6). The paternal aunts are called atati wakungwa (female uncles) (B 3 and 7), their husbands (B 4 and 8) atati. 593 601 knees and elbows, at intervals swaying their bodies from side to side and clapping their hands. Kasongs then ordered all to go and bathe, men and women separately. As they returned from the stream, rain began to fall.

[1] Vide supra, p. 238.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

516 731 769

755 769

Intercession on behalf of the sick may be made, especially by anyone who is likely to be accused of causing the illness by witchcraft.[1] The man standing with arms outstretched, downwards and a little in front of his body, the hands supine, takes some water in his mouth and discharges it in a stream on the ground, (probably as a sign of purification of his tongue), and then invoking "all the spirits above," asks that they will intercede to restore health to the sick man and bear witness to his own innocence of any wish to do the sick man injury. Ku-pesya is the word meaning to offer sacrifice and prayer.

769 241 782

Harvesting and hunting are occasions when sacrifices may be offered. It was formerly the custom for the chief to determine the day on which harvesting of millet should begin. On the day appointed, a big drum was beaten in the village and word passed round; then everyone would go down to his garden, gather a head of millet, and bring it back to the village where it was all handed over to the chief's headwife. After drying and threshing, a little of the grain was laid at the grave of an old chief by one of the reigning chief's advisers, the remainder being again distributed to all the people gathered together in the village meeting-place, who ate it raw. After this ceremony, harvesting began.

In passing through a millet garden, if a child asks his mother to give him some to eat, she plucks a bunch or two and reverently laying one at the foot of a maoro tree for the spirits or at the base of some other tree, if she cannot see a maoro, she gives the rest to the child.

782 224

When a hunting expedition makes its first killing, part of the flesh of the animal is laid at the base of a tree as a thank offering to the spirits and in anticipation of further favors to be conferred. All such offerings are supposed by the natives to be partaken of by the spirits, though they are well aware that they do not actually diminish in quantity. There is an interesting point in this connection: any man who has acted as mbilo (undertaker) to some well-known man may appropriate these offerings. In the case of the hunting offering, he will run round the tree, saying, "I am a hyaena, the spirits will not mind me," and will then take part of the flesh-offering and eat it.

In the same way, a mbilo may drink from a grave beer-pot after three days, when the spirits are supposed to have taken what they want.

824 778

With the exception of the maoro tree above mentioned (ndima, Chin.), and possibly another called nsilo-nyama (Chin.), which is never used as firewood and which is supposed to be used by masuwi, I do not think there are any sacred trees properly so-called. Miss Werner supposes that many of the big trees (often a species of Ficus) in villages are sacred.[2] The truth is, I believe, simply that a village is made naturally round a big tree which conveniently offers its shade for the village meeting place. The spirits of deceased chiefs may

[1] Vide supra, p. 267.

[2] The natives of British Central Africa, op. cit., p. 62.

824 718 be supposed to live in such trees. They are convenient natural objects for them to occupy, in fact practically the only ones to be found in villages. Trees may secondarily, therefore, be looked upon as in some degree sacred. About such trees strings or pieces of calico may be placed as an offering to the spirits of the departed. But the Yao do not erect little huts in their vicinity, hung about with strips of calico as is the custom among the Anyanja.

775 Macdonald[1] mentions the spirits in connection with Soche and other hills round Blantyre and supposes them to be the spirits of the places themselves. This I think is unlikely; they would probably turn out to be spirits bearing the names of long departed Anyanja chiefs whom the immigrant Amangoche Yao venerated just "to be on the safe side," since they had come and taken the country which long ago belonged to the former tribe. When approaching or passing any spot held to be the dwelling place of spirits, salutation is made by clapping the hands.

Spirits of the departed may enter into animals or may take the form of animals, [825] commonly lions and sometimes large snakes (python), but this belief is not so general among the Yao as among other tribes, in my opinion. An animal which is so possessed is called lisyuka, from ku-syuka, "to be transformed."

[774] Apart from this habitation of inanimate objects above mentioned by maimu, there is nothing that points to a belief in Animism among the Yao, so far as I know. Neither hills, rocks, streams, lakes, nor trees have their own spirits, nor are they endowed by the native mind with life.

Deceased persons appear to the living in dreams, the native apparently believing that the deceased appears in his material body.

775 787 791 They believe also in revelation of wishes of the deceased through the medium of the living. The spirit of the deceased is supposed to enter into the medium. The medium, I am informed, is always a woman, never a man. From the descriptions of some of these revelation séances, there can be no doubt that they are manifestations of la grande hystérie. The medium works herself up into a frenzy of excitement and in her delirium gives out the name of the deceased, the voice which speaks being that of the spirit within her. She rolls on the ground and foams at the mouth, uttering the word of revelation which is generally to the effect that some deceased chief's spirit is feeling aggrieved at the neglect of his tomb; the voice may go on to say that certain practices are forbidden, or demand that certain rites be observed by the people. The spirits which possess her are generally spoken of as masoka, a word which, though sometimes used as equivalent to maimu, usually seems to [158] have rather a sinister significance. Insane persons are called masoka and are thought to be possessed by a spirit, and vapor baths with exorcism may be practiced for their cure. In the case of the death of anyone who is possessed, in answer to my interrogation, I have [761] been told that both the spirit which has entered into the man and his own maimu leave his body.

[1] Op. cit., vol. 1, p. 70.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

1778
825
532

[361]

1-2. CRIBS (FRAGMENTS). 3. APPARAT PORTS: 4. SKETCH PLAN OF APPARAT. 5-6. ZITAU FIGURES

[End Plate 10]
[Explanation of plates, cat. 116, p. 265]

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

H. S. STANNUS—WATAO PLATE XI

778
532
825

[End Plate 1L]

[For Plate Explanation, see cat. 116, p. 265]

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

778
825
532

WAYAO FIGURES

[End Plate 12]

[For explanation, see cat. 116, p. 265]

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

778
825
532

WAYAO FIGURES

[End Plate 13]

[For explanation, see cat. 116, p. 265]

7: Hetherwick M-5 (ca. 1900) 1902 FT7 Yao FT7

775 present fortunes. But it is to the human soul after death, when it is considered as having an influence on the lives and fortunes of those it has left behind in the world and consequently as a power to be propitiated and honoured, that the term mulungu is more strictly applied. Freed from the body it passes to mulungu, and there is regarded as endowed with powers which it never possessed when alive on 769 earth. To pray to such a spirit is described as kulomba mulungu, to worship mulungu, never lisoko in this case. Such mulungu worship enters largely into Yao religious or social life. In almost every Yao village there will be found a shrine which is the centre of the worship of the inhabitants. It consists of a carefully 346 built hut enclosed within a strong grass fence or hedge of a species of cactus plant.
769 The hut itself is built of the usual native materials—the walls of wooden posts,
778 bamboos, and strong reed grass bound together with bark-rope and plastered over with clay or stiff mud. The roof is of grass laid on a framework of bamboos, and is generally covered with long stripe of white or coloured calico. On the ridge or apex of the roof are fixed a couple of flags or an umbrella or two. One wall is usually left open so that the interior is easily seen. Within, from the bamboo rafters are suspended handkerchiefs, cloths, bunches of beads, etc., all offerings to the mulungu of the dead headman or chief from his friends and relatives. The floor is of clay carefully smeared with sand in native fashion. A raised platform or mound of earth in the centre marks the spot where the grave was made. The 764 awilo or officials who preside at the funeral obsequies, first dug for about 8 or 10 feet down in a perpendicular direction, and then on the western side of this well they hollowed out a shallow cave in the earth. In this the body was placed, laid on its side with the knees bent up under the chin, and the face turned towards the east. Various articles of personal property were next placed beside the corpse, clothes, ivory, guns, axes, hoes, etc., and the mouth of the cave closed up with woolen posts and a strong reed mat. The grave was then filled in and the surface
[769] carefully finished as we have seen. At the head of the mound a native pot was fixed in the ground for the reception of the offering of beer which is an almost invariable accompaniment of any act of worship paid to the mulungu of the dead.

769 Such a shrine marks the grave of almost every Yao chief or headman, and is [775 regarded as the abode of his soul or the spot where his mulungu is most accessible.
622] If his successor is about to undertake a long journey or enter on any warlike expedition against an enemy or neighbour, he must first kutopa mbepesi, place an offering here to secure the favour and assistance of the mulungu of the dead. Should a long-continued drought endanger the prospects of the grain crop, the departed chief must be solicited to send the lacking rain. A feast is first prepared, almost always of beer, sometimes with the addition of native porridge, fowl, or game. The worshippers gather round the shrine bringing part of the food which they have prepared. Their priest for the occasion is the successor of the dead chief, sometimes one or other of the awilo who placed the body in the grave, or it may be that any other near relation of the dead man is chosen to represent the people and act
[602] as their spokesman. The nearer the relationship the more influence will he have with the dead.

7: Hetherwick M-5 (ca.1900) 1902 FT7 Yao FT7

with the dead. He approaches the shrine, opens the gate of the fence, takes a potful of beer and pours it into the pot at the head of the grave. Next he places the basket of porridge and the plate of meat on the mound beside it and retires. Kneeling down outside the gate facing the shrine and a few yards in front of the people he chants his prayer in a monotone, each petition commencing with "Chonde, chonde," "Please, please." All the while the people clap their hands in unison with him and sing the response as they do in a native case in the chief's court. 769

When the offering has been made at the grave, the rest of the beer or other food is consumed by the worshippers. Guns are fired as a token of respect to the dead, and the rest of the day is spent in dancing. [535]

Such shrines are to be seen in almost every Yao village where the inhabitants have been located for any length of time. They are regarded with awe—the little boys as they pass whisper to each other in a warning tone, "masoka." Should the village be moved to any other district, the old shrine is not forgotten. Periodical visits are made to it with the usual offerings. In cases where the old home has been occupied by a people hostile to the old inhabitants, such visits are usually made during the night, and the people awake in the morning to find that the old chief's grave in their midst has been newly repaired, and a fresh offering of food placed at its head. 778 769

Sometimes such shrines are found on the summits of hills which once may have been a refuge from the enemy in time of war, but which now lie lone and deserted. Thither in their need the people make their way with their offering of food and beer, and their prayer for rain or suitable weather for the crops. Near Blantyre such shrines are to be seen on the tops of Mount Sochi and Mount Michiru. The former is the abode of the spirit of Kankhomba, and the latter of Mpalale, both old Maravi or Mang'anja chiefs who doubtless fled there seeking safety from the war of the invading Yaos, and died leaving their masoka to be the malungu or spirit of the mountain. Some years ago, during the fear of an Angoni invasion, the Yaos of Mount Sochi fled to the hill-top for refuge, and there the old chief Kapeni died. He was buried close to the grave of the old Kankhomba, and now, when the Yaos on Sochi make an offering, it is to the spirit of Kapeni that the homage is paid, and the shrine of Kankhomba lies neglected.

Only the graves of chiefs or headmen are thus treated as shrines of worship. The burying place of slaves and the common people lies away in the thick bush, where only the rank grass or the thicket of old trees marks the spot. No offerings are ever taken there, for such as are buried there can have no influence in the spirit world. The dead are buried, the broken pot or basket is left on the grave to mark the spot, and none ever seek to go there save to lay another in the same neglected ground. 554 764 769 778

II. But the word malungu is used by the Yao with a wider application. Etymologically the word is connected with the root lalungwa, which in so many of the other branches of the Bantu tongue appears as lulu or kuru, and signifies "great" or "old." It is the same root which appears in the Kaffir word for God, 776 197 192

1: Tew E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

Land Tenure

The rules governing land tenure were those which would be expected of a society which suffered from no land shortage. A man was entitled to as much land as he could cultivate, the limitation being that he should consult the headman as to his neighbours' boundaries. Abandoned gardens could only be taken up with the permission of the original cultivator.[1] 423

MAIN CULTURAL FEATURES

Religion

The Yao are largely Islamized. Codrington remarked that the perpetuation of this faith was distinctly antagonistic to British influence, and it received considerable attention from chiefs and headmen. Schools for the instruction of youth in reading and writing Swahili in Arabic characters were established in nearly every village, where also prayers were made at regular intervals in the day. The Moslem fasts and feasts were also observed, and the Yao were not inclined to embrace Christianity.[2] Their conversion to Islam did not take place till the nineteenth century, long after their first introduction to the Arab traders at Kilwa and Zanzibar, although they had adopted Swahili modes of dress much earlier.[3] 771 787

According to Hetherwick, Islam is strongest on the lake shore and on the east border of Nyasaland, chiefly round the old slave-trade centres. Makanjira's on the south-east side of the lake, and Domira Bay on the west, were the centres of Moslem propaganda. The Moslem population around Zomba and Blantyre consists mainly of Yao men, who have built themselves mosques in their own villages, or use the large mosques of Indian Moslem merchants. In the west districts, lower Shire, Ruo, central Shire, Lilongwe, Fort Manning, the Moslem population does not total more than 732. In the districts round Fort Johnston and Kotakota, the Moslems are one-ninth of the total population, while in Zomba district they number one-fifth.[4]

The Yao pagan religion was a form of ancestor worship. Apart from diviners and medicine men, there was no regular priestly profession. Intercession with the ancestors was performed by the chief, on behalf of the chiefdom, by the headman on behalf of the village, and by the head of the matrilineal kin for his dependents.[5] A man was qualified to approach his ancestors individually only if he had been initiated and had a house of his own.[6] 771 769

Some of the ritual duties of the chief have already been mentioned. When his people were visited by drought or epidemic, or when he fixed the day for the beginning of the millet harvest, he made an offering of flour and of beer poured into a pot in the ground at the grave of a dead chief. The village headman made similar offerings to the spirit of his dead predecessor. The spirits of the dead Nyanja chiefs, ousted by the Yao invasion, were regarded as still powerful in the homeland of their people. For instance, Kangomba, whose shrine was on Mount Soche, used to be appealed to for rain, and on the principle that the most appropriate mediator between a dead man and the living is a descendant of the former, the Yao chief, Kapeni, when he wished to propitiate 771 631 622 775 782

[1] Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, pp. 177-9; Sanson, 2, 1903, p. 280.
[2] Codrington, 1898, p. 526; see also Maples, 3, 1893.
[3] Young, T. C., 4, 1932, p. 27.
[4] Hetherwick, 4, 1927, p. 127.
[5] Werner, 1906, p. 270; Sanson, 4, 1922, p. 311.
[6] Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, p. 63.

1: Tew . E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

775 Kangomba, used to persuade Nyanja to help in the sacrificial rite. When Kapeni in 782 turn fled to Mount Soche from the Ngoni, and died there, the Yao addressed their offerings to him, not to Kangomba.[1] The word Mulungu has sometimes been interpreted to mean Supreme Being, God, Creator, but among the Yao it seems not to have
[776] a personal connotation. It was used to describe the agent in any mysterious event,[2] or the place where the ancestor spirits (masoka) were supposed to dwell. Daily life was [769] full of acts of respect towards the ancestors, who were regarded as jealous of the living, and requiring constant propitiation.[3]

Sorcery

754 Accusations of witchcraft and measures for dealing with it play a dominant role in Yao social life. With certain exceptions nearly all diseases and deaths are thought to be caused by sorcery. The exceptional causes are: the hand of God, old age, the transgression of certain taboos, and battle wounds. If sorcery is suspected the relatives of the sick or dead man consult the diviner to identify the offender.

Yao (in common with the Maravi and many peoples of Central Africa) believe that sorcerers have a craving for human flesh, which they satisfy by killing with magic the victims of their malice and hatred. They acquire their magical powers by an apprentice-[835] ship, which might include incestuous relations with mother, sister, or mother-in-law, or sleeping on the grave of the mother for one night. The sorcerer then learns the medicines and finally demonstrates his power by killing a young relative by magic;
[266] he waits till the victim is buried, and then magically exhumes him for the secret feast with his fellow sorcerers. Each sorcerer who shares the flesh owes a debt to the one who secured the victim.

[751] Charms are used as preventive measures against sorcery. When a diviner has 754 diagnosed the cause of death as sorcery, retaliatory measures are taken. The headmen
683 of the village could either call in the witchfinder to identify the offender or he could call in the diviner to take action against all the sorcerers in the village. After the [695] diviner, Mabitalila, had revealed the guilty ones, they were challenged to take the poison ordeal to prove their innocence. If they died, the proof and the punishment were simultaneously accomplished. If they survived, the diviner was held to have been at fault and they were acquitted. The witch doctor was supposed to entice sorcerers to the graveside, and slay them with magic more powerful than their own.

[695] The diviner's findings are to-day checked by the poison ordeal administered to a chicken. A sorcerer detected in this way might be asked to provide medicine for the man whose sickness he had caused, or after a death he might be compelled to pay compensation. If the accused is a village headman, he will not be summoned before a chief, but his brother will take the villagers away from the sphere of his influence, or he may be chased away from the district. Accusations of sorcery follow certain regular lines. Nearly all accusations fall on relatives. Diviners are consulted by matrilineal relatives of the sick or dead person, and the man most usually accused is the brother of the accuser, or the husband of his sister. Witchcraft is therefore a manner of expressing the hostilities latent in these relations, which are, in the Yao social system, full of tension.

[1] Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, p. 70.
[2] Hetherwick, 3, 1902.
[3] Hachet, 1935, pp. 14–15; Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, pp. 58–75, 204–13.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

631 advocates the more orthodox type of Islamic devotion in which 643 a quiet restrained manner is emphasized. As far as I know the 745 twaliki sect are confined entirely to Jalasi's chiefdom and the nikutu to Kawinga and Liwonde. In this matter, Nyambi's people side with Kawinga's and Liwonde's.

On the other hand, local informal organization is well de-631 veloped so that Chiwalo who is at the point of juxtaposition of 643 Kawinga, Liwonde, Nyambi and Jalasi chiefdoms, may try cases
692 involving headmen from any of these areas, and they usually accept his arbitration. His is the nearest court house. The actual boundaries of the four areas, however, are very clearly recognized and Chiwalo realizes the limits of his jurisdiction. Though he may arbitrate in a difference between headmen, he would not dare to apportion land outside his area. Headmen living on the boundaries of two chiefdoms arbitrate in each other's cases; the villagers under them intermarry. A village in Chiwalo's may
621 procure garden lands in Jalasi's area, and children may be initiated
631 at ceremonies held by headmen in other chiefdoms. There is no
643 clear break in the normal social relationships of people across the boundaries of chiefdoms, and their members interact as freely with each other as members of two villages of the same chiefdom. The cleavage between the villages on different sides of the boundary of a chiefdom becomes apparent only in special situations.

631 The formal relationships of the chiefs, set by the history of their conquests and their kinship, and incorporated in and slightly
643 modified by the Administrative framework, are overlaid by an informal local organization where the interaction of village headmen only conforms to the formal pattern when no agreement can be reached.

The Position of the Modern Chief

643 In ritual situations a chiefdom is clearly differentiated from its neighbours, and many of these situations arise in the cult of
769 tendence on the ancestor spirits. The ancestor cult has fallen
782 away almost completely among village headmen, but among the chiefs it is still strong, and appears particularly in the rain-prayers and the initiation ceremonies. Later, I shall discuss at length the importance of the chief's sanction before headmen may conduct initiation ceremonies. This is because the spirits of the ancestors of the chief are supposed to affect the welfare of the initiands. Though some village headmen may conduct initiation ceremonies they are unable to offer rain-prayers. These are offered by a chief on two occasions. The first is in November, before the rains have started. The chief's wife and some women from the bigger villages in the near vicinity of the chief's village gather at his hut. They brew beer—ukana wacisoka, the beer of the spirits—to be used as a libation. At sunset on the appointed day the chief goes to the shrine tree where some headmen have gathered, and pours some of the beer into a pot, partly buried at the root of the tree, while he invokes all the spirits of his departed ancestors—mainly matrilineal but occasionally some patrilateral. He then entreats the spirits to send some rain and to look after their 'children' in the land. Sometimes a length of calico is hung on the tree as an extra offering. Should no rain fall the chief will have to repeat the offering until it does fall. When the rains have ended in March he makes a second offering 'of thanks'.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

In the context of the present discussion, the important point is that it is only the chief who can make this libation and offer this prayer. If his plea fails the whole area starves, and no headman may supplicate his ancestors on his own behalf or approach the chief's ancestors through his own ancestors. The grain for the beer comes from the various villages, but not on a fixed rate of levy. Some villages never contribute. The chief buys the offered cloth on behalf of his people. When in 1948 the cloth on the shrine tree was stolen, Chiwalo imposed a levy on the village headmen in the area so that a new cloth could be bought. Here the boundaries of the chiefdoms are important, and no headman outside Chiwalo's area was approached. A village headman from Jalasi's area, though geographically much closer to Chiwalo, relies on Jalasi's rain-offerings and may not approach Chiwalo or plead with him to offer a rain-prayer to his ancestors.

Another ritual situation in which the limits of the chiefdom appear is during the institutionalized pillage on the death of a chief. I have not been in any area when the chief has died, so that I rely here on the tales of informants. During the mourning rites certain feasts are held. The food for the mourning feast of a commoner or village headman is provided from his estate

3:Stanna D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Tao FT7

as to procuring medicine for him from a medicine-man. If the caster of lots is suspicious that 754
some one has caused the illness, he will at the same time add, "Let so and so pray," men- 695 tioning the name of the man whom he suspects. Following the advice given, the medicine-man is consulted. He promises to get medicine for the sick man and goes into the forest to search for it. Having returned, he prepares his decoctions and having first partaken of a little himself, he gives it to his patient with further instructions. The friends of the sick man having returned to the village, indirectly ask the man on whom suspicion has been cast to pray for the sick man saying, "He is covered by some spirit." The man prays, [782] sometimes using nkopani and beginning chonde! chonde! "please! please!" and goes on to ask Mlungu to take away the spirit which has covered the sick man, adding that he himself is innocent of any ill doing against the man and that any grudge he may have had against him is now forgotten.

If the sick man recovers, well and good, but should he die, there is more to be done. 754
The morning following the burial, the relatives go to the chief and in answer to his inquiry 695 of what they are going to do, they say they must again consult the caster-of-lots. They 791 will choose some one who lives a long way off and is not cognizant of the death of their relative: those who go to him have not been shaved after the funeral. Much the same business is gone through as on the first occasion but, in the end, the caster-of-lots is told that they suspect some one unknown to have brought about the death of their relative. The names of all the possible persons are given, the lots cast in each case and, eventually, one is picked out as the guilty man; the caster-of-lots saying, "If I am not telling the truth, you can test my words by giving mwai (ordeal poison) to a fowl; if it does not die, come back and break up all my properties."

He may have gained information from his lots that the suspect is a man of power gained by some special rite, e.g. the midnight bath on the ant hill, in which case he will insist that the fowl poison-ordeal must take place on an ant hill or he will give other specific instructions. On the way back, the relatives will buy two fowls; mwai will be prepared by a boy who has not passed through his initiation ceremonies, and two of the party will be chosen as pleaders, one for the deceased, the other for the accused. One fowl is then selected to represent the accused and the poison administered according to the conditions laid down by the lot-thrower, while the two pleaders give injunctions to it, one saying, "You are guilty; you shall die"; the other, "You are innocent and you shall show your innocence by vomiting the poison and recovering." If the fowl dies, a third man cuts off its head, saying, "I am the burier of the dead." Mwai is then administered to the second fowl to ascertain whether any other persons are involved. The head of the first fowl is singed, stuck on a stick and carried back with the party towards their village. A little way outside, they halt in the bush, and send word to the headman that they are returning. He then comes out privately to see them, asking what has happened, and is told all the events in sequence.

3:Stanmus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

516 731 769

knees and elbows, at intervals swaying their bodies from side to side and clapping their hands. Kazunga then ordered all to go and bathe, men and women separately. As they returned from the stream, rain began to fall.

Intercession on behalf of the sick may be made, especially by anyone who is likely to be accused of causing the illness by witchcraft.[1] The man standing with arms outstretched, downwards and a little in front of his body, the hands supine, takes some water in his mouth and discharges it in a stream on the ground, (probably as a sign of purification of his tongue), and then invoking "all the spirits above," asks that they will intercede to restore health to the sick man and bear witness to his own innocence of any wish to do the sick man injury. Ku-peqa is the word meaning to offer sacrifice and prayer. 755 769

Harvesting and hunting are occasions when sacrifices may be offered. It was formerly the custom for the chief to determine the day on which harvesting of millet should begin. On the day appointed, a big drum was beaten in the village and word passed round; then everyone would go down to his garden, gather a head of millet, and bring it back to the village where it was all handed over to the chief's headwife. After drying and threshing, a little of the grain was laid at the grave of an old chief by one of the reigning chief's advisers, the remainder being again distributed to all the people gathered together in the village meeting-place, who ate it raw. After this ceremony, harvesting began. 769 241 782

In passing through a millet garden, if a child asks his mother to give him some to eat, she plucks a bunch or two and reverently laying one at the foot of a maoro tree for the spirits or at the base of some other tree, if she cannot see a maoro, she gives the rest to the child.

When a hunting expedition makes its first killing, part of the flesh of the animal is laid at the base of a tree as a thank offering to the spirits and in anticipation of further favors to be conferred. All such offerings are supposed by the natives to be partaken of by the spirits, though they are well aware that they do not actually diminish in quantity. There is an interesting point in this connection: any man who has acted as mbilo (undertaker) to some well-known man may appropriate these offerings. In the case of the hunting offering, he will run round the tree, saying, "I am a hyaena, the spirits will not mind me," and will then take part of the flesh-offering and eat it. 782 224

In the same way, a mbilo may drink from a grave beer-pot after three days, when the spirits are supposed to have taken what they want.

With the exception of the maoro tree above mentioned (ndima, Chin.), and possibly another called nsilo-ngoma (Chin.), which is never used as firewood and which is supposed to be used by nanai, I do not think there are any sacred trees properly so-called. Miss Werner supposes that many of the big trees (often a species of Ficus) in villages are sacred.[2] The truth is, I believe, simply that a village is made naturally round a big tree which conveniently offers its shade for the village meeting place. The spirits of deceased chiefs may 824 778

[1] Vide supra, p. 297.

[2] The natives of British Central Africa, op. cit., p. 62.

7: Hetherwick M-5 (ca. 1900) 1902 FT7 Yao FT7

Unkulunkulu, which may therefore be rendered as "The old, old One," or "The great, great One." A like rendering may be given of the Yao form mulungu, the "Old One," or the "Great One." In this or a modified form mungu (Swahili) it appears in all the Eastern group of the Bantu tongues as the equivalent for "God" (see Father Torrend's Comparative Grammar of South African Bantu Languages). To trace it as Father Torrend does to any connection with Moloch, the god of the Phœnicians, is to attach undue weight to a chance coincidence of sounds.

As we have already seen, the word mulungu is applied to the human lisoka when regarded as an object of worship, or as an inhabitant of the spirit world. But it is also used to denote that spirit world in general, or more properly speaking, the aggregate of the spirits of all the dead. The plural form of the word is rarely heard, unless when the allusion is made to the souls in their individualities. In its native use and form the word does not imply personality, for it does not belong to the personal class of nouns. Etymologically it is classed with the leg, heart, arm, head, etc., of the human frame. Its form denotes rather a state or property inhering in something, as the life or health inheres in the body. Among the various tribes where the word is in use as we have described, the missionaries have adopted it as the term for "God." But the untaught Yao refuses to assign to it any idea of being or personality. It is to him more a quality or faculty of the human nature whose signification he has extended so as to embrace the whole spirit world. Once after I had endeavoured to impress an old Yao headman with the personality of the Godhead in the Christian sense of the term, using the term Mulungu, my listener began to talk of "Che Mulungu," "Mr. God," showing that originally to him the word conveyed no idea of the personality I was ascribing to it.

And yet the Yao approaches closely to the idea of personality and a personal being, when he speaks of what mulungu has done and is doing. It is mulungu who made the world, and man, and animals. Far in the interior of the continent, toward the north-west, beyond the plains and swamps of the Loangwa River and Lake Bangweolo, there lies, in Yao legend, an island in the midst of a lake called Kapiritimya. On that island there is to be seen a large flat rock marked by the footprints of men and animals of all kinds. When that rock was once a heap of moist clay, mulungu created all living things and sent them across the soft mass, where their footprints remained to be afterwards hardened into the imperishable rock. Such is the Yao legend of the creation of the world, and mulungu is always the Great Creator.

Mulungu is also regarded as the agent in anything mysterious. "It's mulungu," is the Yao exclamation on being shown anything that is beyond the range of his understanding. The rainbow is always "mulungu," although some Yaos have begun to use the Mang'anja term "uta wa Lesa," bow of Lesa.

Offerings are made to the spirit world or to mulungu as the great agency in the affairs of human life. Outside the village, or beside the headman's hut, may often be seen a rough shed. In this are placed the first-fruits of the new crop, green maize, beans, pumpkins, peas, etc., as a thankoffering from the villagers for their harvest. This is described as kulomba mulungu, to worship mulungu. At the foot of the tree in the village courtyard, where the men sit and talk or work, an occasional small offering of flour or beer is placed on any special occasion in the life of the village or any of its inhabitants. This also is kulomba mulungu. A devout native sitting down to a meal will, before beginning to eat, take out a small morsel of the food before him and throw it at the root of the nearest tree as an offering to mulungu. On a journey a traveller will sometimes stop and lay a little flour in a pyramidal heap at the foot of a tree by the wayside or at an angle where two roads meet. This, like the others, is for mulungu, the spirit world, the guardian of the wayfarer on his journey.

7: Hetherwick M-5 (ca.1900) 1902 FT7 Yao FT7

Thus the Yao presents us with three stages of animistic belief :—

(1) The human liseka or shade, the agent in dreams, delirium, etc.

(2) This liseka regarded as mulungu, and an object of worship and reverence, the controller of the affairs of this life, the active agent in the fortunes of the human race.

(3) And lastly, mulungu as expressing the great spirit agency, the creator of the world and all life, the source of all things animate and inanimate.

And yet between these three conceptions of the spirit nature no definite boundary line can be drawn. The distinction in the native mind is ever of the haziest. No one will give you a dogmatic statement of his belief on such points.

It is only through long association with them in their daily life noting actual expressions of opinion or hearing of definite acts in relation to their worship or their dead, that one can get behind the reserve with which every Yao man or woman approaches or alludes to the spirit world which lies beyond and after this.

II. The Political Structure
BEFORE THE WHITES CAME

173 (kuhamula ukongolo), i.e. to surrender to the chief 643 in the area. Also the chief sent out expeditions
167 to capture slaves or he purchased slaves with the cloth and beads he had exchanged for ivory at the East coast.

643 Within his territory certain privileges and rights
421 were held by the chief and he had certain religious duties to perform in which the unity of the people in the territory was expressed. In general the chief had rights over any ivory either found or hunted in his territory. If a dead elephant were found the tusks belonged to the chief, though he usually rewarded the finder with cloth. If a man killed an elephant the tusk that lay on [224] the ground belonged to the chief while the other belonged to the killer. The killer's tusk was in-[439] cluded in the chief's caravan to the coast and its value paid in cloth to the killer when the caravan returned.

643 The chief was also entitled to an annual tribute
651 of food and beer from all villages in his area, but this was used to entertain visitors who came to the court-village.

643 The chief's religious duties lay mainly in 782 propitiating the spirits of his ancestors on occasions when the community at large, in contrast to the chief's own private affairs, was either threatened or directly affected. The most obvious occasion was immediately before the rains came when flour was poured on the tree shrine and the spirits of the ancestors asked for good rains. Later when the rains were over a similar sacrifice was made asking for a good harvest. Sacrifices to the ancestors were also made on two other public occasions. They were made when some calamity had occurred or was believed to be impending. A run of unsuccessful campaigns induced Cingwalugwalu, a son of the Yao chief Mponda near Fort Johnston, to ask his father's father's brother to make sacri-

643 782 fice to the ancestors. The other public occasion was at initiation ceremonies. A successful initiation, i.e. one in which the initiates were not beset by misfortune, depended upon the goodwill of the ancestors of the chief. Initiates therefore gathered at the chief's court-village before the initiation, when the sanction of the spirits was asked and the initiates severally blessed. After this they scattered to the bush-schools near their villages only to return when initiation was completed and the chief received them into tribal society.

643 769 The people who had submitted themselves, willingly or unwillingly, to the rule of a chief, in turn expected certain services from him. He provided them, as we saw, with mystical protection through his ancestors. On a more pragmatic plane he was able to arm and co-ordinate military forces thereby giving his people protection from attack. Within his area of rule he was a common person of final appeal in the regulation of relationships of his subjects.

In these various ways, by propitiating his ancestor's spirits on behalf of his subjects, by settling differences between subjects, by co-ordinating defence and in fact by being a unique personality in the area, the chief became the symbol of unity of his tribal group. The symbolism was clearly noticeable on the death of a chief when a short period of social disorganization called cipinimbe followed. The members of the chief's village were allowed to pillage and to commit rape and other criminal acts without suffering legal action. The demise of the symbol of unity was followed by a period of disunity before the appointment of successor restored the status quo.

622 [769] At the same time much of what has been said about the chief was true also of important village headmen. Village headmen also made sacrifices to their ancestors but only in domestic or village affairs. They too built up their prestige by slaving. Many villages in Southern Nyasaland to-day

11: Sanderson D-5 (ca. 1920) 1920 FT7 Yao FT7

The alternative term, wese, common to nearly all Bantu languages, is usually reserved for "own father," but not always. 601

Latterly, though the relationship is really akwaye, the husbands of a man's "daughters" or "grand-daughters" are called atati -in a complimentary sense, not of course in defining relationship.

The word akwaye is rapidly falling into desuetude for men, and is, nowadays, never used in speaking to a man of that relationship, though used freely as a mode of address to women.

Amao (or achikulu-wangu, -wao, etc., "my, his mother") may be further defined as "great" or "little" in the same manner as atati.

The parents of any atati or amao, and those of one's wife are called ambuje ("grandparent"). Great-grandparents are specified as "father" or "mother of my grandfather (or mother)."

The founder of a family is called Likolo, especially in prayer—except for the augmentative prefix obviously the same word as Nanyolo, "a parent," which includes all "fathers" and "mothers." [782]

It is curious in this connection that a name for little girls in general, if one does not know their real name, is chikolo. All these words seem to be derived from -hola ("have," "possess"), and refer, probably, either to actual or potential possession of offspring.

Achinangolo are distinguished as "male" or "female" according as they belong to the father's or mother's side—irrespective of their own sex.

Conclusions.—The Yao nomenclature of relationships, bearing as it does the evidence of former group marriages, is, like other classificatory systems, gradually changing in conformity with the development of the race, so that it can be used to express consanguinity; Rivers has, I believe, called attention to this process. 601 178 [121]

The Yao custom—now dying out—of lending one's wife to a visitor (usually a close friend) may be a remnant of ideas carried on from communal marriage, though such a privilege is never given to a relative. [839] [504]

In the same way a man who has had no children (a great stigma) may request his friend to help him - he will never ask a relative and all of the three parties will keep the secret of the true paternity of any children resulting. [839] [840]

In many tribes the marriage of brother and sister, or a man with his sister's child, is permitted to compensate for the law by which a man's property goes to the son of a stranger, but nothing of the kind is allowed among the Yaos. Indeed, they view any incestuous union with particular horror, and such must be very rare. I have heard of a case of a man committing incest with the idea that he would thereby become endued with supernatural power, but all he gained was ostracism; in the old days he would have been burned. 588 835 [24]

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

strike out with his adherents to found a new village. A sum of £6 or £7 is a considerable amount in everyday Yao life where the annual cash income of the average individual is not much more. The leader of a dissident group is prepared to forgo this wealth to get one foot on to the lowest rung of the political ladder—that is by becoming a village headman. 621 166 627

Obversely there is a great deal of sentiment attached to the idea of a united village. To the Yao way of thinking a village is broken by fighting or death, and these evils are linked by witchcraft beliefs. The association of death and the break-up of the village is brought out clearly by the funeral ablutions of villagers after the burial of one of their number. An important ingredient in the medicine with which the mourners wash themselves after the funeral, is cikula. It is the earth from a particular type of termitary which is usually about 12 to 18 inches high, upright and almost cylindrical. The crust is very brittle and it is comparatively easy to chip off a piece. When this is done a mass of internal chambers and passages is revealed. The soldier ants, unlike those of other species that retreat into the darkness of their passages as soon as they are exposed, come into the open daylight and swarm in confusion over the fractured termitary. When I questioned my informant about cikula, he kicked the crust off the top of one of the hills and said, 'See all the houses in the village of the ants? I have broken their village. So it is with death. It breaks the village.' 621 764 783 825

The Yao believe that death 'breaks the village' and that conflicts through sorcery lead to death. Therefore, conflicts are the real cause of village splits. Hence differences must be settled immediately if the village is to persist, because if they last too long one of the aggrieved parties is sure to start using sorcery against its opponents. Those who do move away, go to a distant place because they believe that sorcery operates only where there is social interaction. But the fear of sorcery on the other hand is just as strong a force in maintaining the physical unity of the village. It is while the migration is being planned that sorcery is most likely to be used. This is particularly so if the village break is taking the form of a lineage split. This happened, for example, in Lupunje village. 621 754 626

Kalambo, the sister's son of Lupunje, wanted to leave the village and had gone to seek a suitable site. When he returned he found that 621 626 753

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

764

toward the east. After adjusting the body in its place, the ambile would tear open the shroud over the ear, and pour on to the plans some powdered beads to be used by the dead man as money in the hereafter. Except in the case of chiefs, no objects were buried with the dead, contrary to Macdonald's description[1] of the Amangoche. The pole on which the body had been carried to the grave was broken into bits and together with any stick that had been used to measure the body for the cave, was placed in the grave. The opening into the chamber was then closed by a mat fastened over it by pegs and supported by pieces of wood. The ambile clambering out of the well, pushed the first earth backward into the grave with their elbows, after which the rest of the earth was shovelled in quickly, and a heap made at the surface. The ground about this mound was swept clean with a bunch of leaves by some one walking backward so that no footprints were left; the bunch of leaves was thrown on top of the mound. No medicine was put in the grave, nor were the household utensils placed on the mound, as Macdonald states concerning the Amangoche.[2]

[114]

[114]

For some years past, the type of grave made among the Yao has resembled that of the Anyanja,[3] a long pit with a chamber scooped out along the whole length of one side. In this, the corpse is placed in a fully extended position so that it lies on its back with the feet toward the east. With this exception, the account given above holds good for the present day. The method of suspending the corpse in a mat slung on forked sticks within the grave, mentioned in Africana,[4] is not found among the Amachinga Yao.

764

On the way back to the village, two ambile lead, followed by the men, the women, and lastly, by the other ambile. First, all wash, the men upstream, the women downstream; no one may wash another's back. The hoes used in digging the grave are also washed; hoes are never washed on any other occasion.

783

During the funeral, some responsible old man is left in charge of the village with several younger men to assist him. Just before the return of the funeral party is expected, the old man sends one of the younger men to set medicine at the side of the path along which the mourners will pass. This medicine is made from the bark of the mpingo tree and is used for purification; it is placed in a sherd. Each person as he arrives at the spot squats down, dips the little finger of each hand into the medicine, and passes the fingers between the little toe and the third toe of the corresponding foot. The last comer throws any remaining medicine into the bush. As they near the village, a gun is fired and wailing is resumed for a few minutes, after which it ceases altogether. The old man who has been left in charge of the village always inquires whether all has gone well at the interment.

[824]

That evening, the time is passed in singing chindimba.[5] All those who attended the burial, sleep in the village, and if the deceased's relatives can afford to provide the necessary food, all remain in the village for a number of days equal to the period which elapsed between death and burial. Sometimes, when burial was long delayed, the mourning party

765

[1] Op. cit., vol. 1, p. 107.
[2] Ibid.
[3] Stannus, 'Notes on natives of British Central Africa,' op. cit., p. 313.
[4] Macdonald, op. cit., p. 108.
[5] Vide infra, p. 367, 370.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

30 that she is tattooed more profusely on the buttocks and legs. The circlet of beads was [548] formerly made like mapunda with a bark-cloth core, called mtumbo or mbula (ku-ula, to slip off), referring to the mbula being slipped off over the legs. The fashion now is to wear single strings of beads; each string is of one color but all the strings are different and perhaps number a dozen or more.

Lipamba: a bead belt three-inches wide, worn by Yao women near Lake Nyasa. A bead apron, kacjera, is also worn by them but not near Zomba (Pl. VI, fig. 2).

[783] A woman removes her beads when she is "unclean," that is: (a) during the menstrual period, (b) during the period of mourning for a near relative when coitus is forbidden, (c) before the birth of a child and afterwards until such time as she may resume intercourse with her husband.

A large variety of beads has long been used by the Yao. There are some rarely seen [172] now which were much prised in years gone by, while others are of quite recent introduction. There is no evidence that they themselves made beads and there are few which are probably not of European manufacture.

Clothing. The Yao used bark-cloth before the introduction of woven materials. The 291 older people may still be seen in it and it is used in most of the ceremonies. At one time, they also used to weave a cloth called likamambo from a native cotton plant. This has been given up since the introduction of imported materials.

For the method of wearing cloth, see Pl. II, fig. 2. The very poorest people wear only a strip of calico round the pudenda, held in position by a string round the waist hanging long behind and in front; this is called mthetha. Yao women, when menstruating, wear [841] under this a little piece of cloth called likumbi; it is only worn at this time and not always as in certain other tribes.

Warfare. Fighting has naturally played a large part in the life of the Yao as among 721 other African tribes, but at no time were these people a trained fighting race. Warfare was of a desultory character consisting mostly of raids by one feudal chief upon another. A party of men belonging to a chief at enmity with another, meeting some of his followers would challenge them, "Alumbe, who are you for?" The name of the rival chief in answer 726 was the sign for battle to begin. A fake answer would never be given to gain an advantage. When about to throw a spear, the thrower calls to his adversary.

The Yao have possessed guns for a long time. Going out to fight, the Yao used to [177] leap from one foot to the other, and spin their guns around in their hands. They made their own stocks for the rifles. They also used to make a small, cast-iron cannon about three feet long, called kambula, "a little nose." It was carried in the arms and was touched off by a torch. Drums called sonjo were taken into battle. There is an old war drum
[534] at Malemya's village, taken in 1895 by the old Malemya from a Mang'anja chief called Mkulumbo who lived near Lake Chiuta. Since then, this drum has always gone into battle with Malemya. Around it his men would dance and anyone who had killed a man in battle would run up to it and spit upon it in salutation.

ndwalo, a woman who is pregnant for the first time;[1] kacwabwe, a woman who has one or two children; mjembere, a woman who has three or four children, and lastly, ndolwa, a woman who is past child-bearing age. 554 584

The information which I have been able to collect on abortifacients and contraceptives suggests that they are not used by married people merely to prevent their having more children, but that they are used by people who wish to avoid pregnancies which would be embarrassing, for example, by a woman whose husband is a labour migrant. To what extent the abortifacients and contraceptives are efficacious I cannot say; some, I know for certain, rely on a magical principle, for example, the medicated cord worn by a man during intercourse. On the other hand, the abortifacients taken orally may have some active ingredient. 842

A barren woman or an impotent man is regarded with some embarrassment and the marriage sureties (arinamangorwe) of a childless couple will go to considerable trouble and expense consulting diviners and leeches in an attempt to make their wards productive. Childless couples are regarded as not fully adult and are treated in a patronizing way by those who have borne children. Since a man may marry other wives, barrenness in a woman is a cause of sorrow to her husband, but is not in itself a ground for divorce. Where the man is impotent, however, the woman may divorce him on this ground, though she usually takes a paramour and forces her husband to an action for damages which automatically leads to a divorce because it is the usual practice in these cases for the court to ask the woman if she wants to be divorced from her husband. [885] [554] [586] [837] [694]

In contrast to the satisfaction shown at the birth of a child is the sense of awe evinced when a child is still-born or the woman miscarries. The Yao do not distinguish between still-births and abortions, both events being known by the word kwasanga. This is a verb and refers to the process of abortion; there is no term for the dead foetus itself. I made no attempt to enumerate miscarriages and still-births because they are supposed to be due to breaches of sexual taboos on the part of the husband and wife, and interviewees were naturally reluctant to mention them. Miscarriages and still-births are greatly feared, and the woman is considered to be in a very dangerous condition until she and her husband have carried out a ritual purification. Should a man have intercourse with a woman who has miscarried and not yet been purified he will contract a disease called lwaso which is believed to be invariably fatal. Still-born children or aborted foetuses are buried in a hole dug with sharpened sticks in the bush by the women, whereas children who are born alive and die afterwards are buried in the graveyard in graves dug by men with hoes. The burial spots of still-born babies or aborted foetuses are marked with a stone or broken pottery, since it is believed that to step on them will induce an illness. 845 [783] [753] [766]

The concern of the interested kin-groups is shown in the child-birth procedure. Birth normally takes place in a hut in the presence of the older female relatives of the woman and the female representatives of the man. The husband's representatives are necessary because the Yao, like many other Central African peoples, believe that an adulterine child will not be born to the woman unless she confesses (kupaca) the name of the genitor. If she persists in concealing the identity of the genitor, they 844

[1] ndwalo — elephant, hence ivory. The terms lilibo and ndwalo here both refer to the ivory beads traditionally worn by the woman in the pregnancy initiation ceremony. [192] [361]

10: Sanderson D-5 (ca. 1920)1922 FT7 Yao FT7

796 THE WHOLE VILLAGE IS THOROUGHLY 'SPRING CLEANED', ALL RUBBISH
[364] is swept up, the ground round the houses is hoed clean, and the interiors remudded. Ceremonial beer is brewed by the head-wife of the chief, and after this has been drunk the ashes of the fire used in the brewing are carefully collected and taken to a malebano ("cross-roads," or "diverging of paths") where they are deposited.
[783] The chief, as representative of his people, bathes in special medicated water, a [624] decoction made from the bark of ng'ungu and mbawa, and the root of mpingo.
[621] This completes the ordinary annual ceremony, at which new fire is not made.

On certain special occasions a more elaborate ritual is carried out; such occasions are the death of a chief, a threatened epidemic of infectious disease, a murder (especially by shooting) and the frequent occurrence of quarrels in the village.

In such circumstances, in addition to the ordinary pyajila ceremony described above, the porridge sticks of the whole village are renewed and all fires extinguished. The discarded sticks and all ashes of the old fires are carried to the meeting of paths, where the former are stuck upright in the ground and the ashes piled together;
[372] this is done in procession, all the people taking part. On their return to the village new fire is made by friction by either the chief or his younger brother—usually the latter; fire procured in any other way would nullify the proceedings. Finally [783] all the people bathe in the medicated water used only by the chief at the ordinary ceremony.

751 In addition to this special form of the pyajila ceremony, another rite is sometimes
796 performed after the occurrence of a murder or as prophylactic against the spread of epidemic disease. The doctor first makes a kind of trough (lukwagwa) from the bark of mtondorobo or mpapa, and procures a chichiliko (or chipengule) basket—used as a strainer in salt-making. Having collected his medicines he proceeds to the bank of the stream near the usual bathing-place of the village and digs a shallow hole, in which he places the basket; in this he puts the leaves of a certain thorny shrub and covers the whole with the trough, which is banked up with earth so as to be perfectly firm. He then puts his "medicines" into the trough; these are, first, the head of an iron hammer and a piece of slag, both from a smelting furnace. On top of these he puts pieces of the root of a certain tree which has many and particularly sharp thorns, and bits of bark from two trees peculiar for having very straight stems. Having distributed these evenly along the floor of the trough, he fills it with water and then proceeds to construct an arch over the end of the trough furthest from the stream. Two long poles, cut from a kind of tree particularly rich in sap, are planted in the ground, one at each side of the trough and close to it; these are bent over towards each other, and fastened together by means of a strip of their own bark. A bamboo is now planted alongside each, and similarly tied to its fellow. During all these preparations and throughout the ceremony it is essential that the doctor has no knots in any part of his clothing.

The preparations are now complete, and when all the fires in the village have been extinguished the people go in procession to the spot where the doctor awaits them. All must be poorly clad and must have no metal about them.

[622] The chief opens the ceremony. He steps into the trough and taking some of the medicated water therefrom in his hands he rinses his mouth with it. He then
[769] offers a prayer to the spirits of his ancestors, first stating the emergency and detailing the measures which are to be taken to deal with it (new fires, sweeping, discard of porridge-sticks and shaving). The prayer over, he splashes the water in the trough over his body and passes through the arch, first throwing some gift (beads or, in more modern times, money) into the trough. These gifts, presumably [756] intended as an offering to the spirits, are the perquisites of the doctor, and everybody is supposed to contribute in turn.

10: Sanderson D-5 (ca. 1920)1922 FT7 Yao FT7

The man and boys now pass through the arch in order of seniority; each splashes himself with the water in the trough, but neither speaks nor rinses the mouth. The women come next, led by the head-wife of the chief; the latter rinses her mouth and, instructed by the doctor, repeats a prayer similar to that offered by her husband. The remainder of the women merely splash themselves, like the men, before passing through the arch. All then return to the village, where the pyajila is continued. 751 796

Finally the doctor takes the hammer-head from the trough and hands it to the chief, who refits the haft into it, and, a hoe having been placed on the ground, goes through the form of forging the latter by beating it with the hammer. He then scrapes the ground with the hoe as if clearing a place overgrown with grass; he does not dig with it as in hoeing up the ground for planting seed. After this rite the chief again bathes in medicated water similar to that in the trough, and the ceremony is complete.

Whereas the pyajila ceremony and its adjunct, the rite of the arch, are now but rarely performed, no Yao will omit the rite of purification after a death in his family. This ceremony consists of two essential parts, both protective against the ndaku, a disease characterised by dropsy and supposed to be contracted by contact with a corpse, or by association, especially by sharing a meal, with those who have been in such contact. The first of these parts is bathing in certain medicines, which protects the bather from ndaku, and the second consists of a sort of communion meal, shared by all friends and especially relatives with those who have been contaminated, and designed to protect those friends and relatives. [178] 751 764 796 783

The decoction for bathing is made by soaking the roots of lugwalambuti and lumlemela in water, together with the bark of mkomwa, one piece each from the east and west aspects of the tree; the water assumes a reddish tint, and the whole body is bathed. 751 783 824 765

The communion meal consists of porridge made from any kind of flour or of rice, and some ngunde beans. In the latter some scorched and powdered root of mandanyelele is mixed, with a little salt. All near relatives of the deceased must partake of this meal, as well as their wives and their near relatives; part is carefully put aside for the use of any relative unable to be present at the ceremony. [262]

Latterly, since the spread of Islam among the WaYao, this rite has become confused with the distribution of food to the poor at the funeral of a Muslim, and the Arabic word sadaqa ("charity") is now generally used for it, to the exclusion of its wider, correct meaning. [777] [797]

It may be mentioned here that after the death of a child the father is denied access to his wife for a period of about three weeks, and the first act must be one of coitus interruptus. 765 784

MEREDITH SANDERSON.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

Nyambi's formal permission to install the heir as Cimombo. Nyambi told them to start preparing malt for the 'beer of succession' and to tell him when it was ready. Kaukutu then sent a man to Cholo on a bicycle to call Cimombo back to the village. One Tuesday, the day after Cimombo returned, Kaukutu reported to Nyambi, who told him to tell the women to prepare the beer, since the installation ceremony would take place on Saturday. Nyambi sent his perpetual sons Makoka and Ncimba to officiate on his behalf. These two men were important village headmen, Makoka having the right to wear a scarlet headband though Ncimba had not.

On Thursday, Makoka and Ncimbo came to a place about three miles from the village. They had four women with them, one of whom carried a sacred basket (ciselo cambepesi). Ncimbo sent a message to Kaukutu to say that they were waiting, and he told the heir that he was wanted along the road where a meeting was being held. When the women saw Kaukutu and the heir coming to the place where Makoka and Ncimbo were waiting, they ran to hide in the bush. The heir sat down under a mango tree and Makoka went up to him and begged for some snuff. Before he had time to take the snuff bottle out of his pocket, the women came out of the bush, Makoka got up and struck the heir on the forehead with his fist, knocking him to the ground, took some flour from the sacrifice basket and sprinkled it on the heir, shouting, 'This is Cimombo—he is risen from the dead!'[1] They put him in a hammock and carried him back to his hut in the village amidst wild exultation. They put him on his bed and made him stay there. Later, Mkoka and Ncimbo came in and started to deliver a series of homilies on his position as village headman.[2] They pointed out that from that day he was a chief (mwenye), a headman who had the right to wear a scarlet headband (acimweni shambendera). Thenceforth, he was not to go to funerals, or at least not into the hut in which a corpse was lying. If his child were to die while he was in the hut he must not move until other people had come in. It was only when a headman of similar rank died that he might go into the hut. They advised him particularly that he would have to look after his village and told him that he should

[1] Ce Cimombo ahwile—afimwie kufuile.
[2] Kumula mityango—to teach the customs.

3:Stanmus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

Thagalage was another well-known performer; he used to do the same tricks as Kambanje. He also was possessed of an elastic skin and is said to have been able "to tie his ears together behind the back of his head." 789 791

Mpachetula, a Yao of Mkanda, is a man with considerable renown. He is said to be able to produce a lion at will from a lion's tail and claw. He would offer to show this if there were any brave enough to go through with it. On a moonlight night, he would expose on the ground in a cleared space near a village the tail of a lion held cross-wise in a piece of split bamboo. At the split end of the bamboo, he would place a lion's claw and round this, a woman's belt held in position by three bamboo pegs, around which he would draw a circle of mkapasi flour. Everyone would then withdraw to a hut in which the seance was to take place. After an hour or so, Mpachetula would send some one out to inspect the lion's tail where probably all would be found intact. He might then pretend to be uninterested and sleepy and suggest that some one should go out again in half an hour. Sooner or later, a man would come back, having found the tail gone; then everyone would go out to see what had happened. The pegs would be found in place but the tail and claw gone. A little way off, the split piece of bamboo would be found and further still a bead or two from the woman's belt. These, Mpachetula would pick up, and leaving a little trail of flour on their way, all returned to the hut, while he whistled as if calling some one. Suddenly they would be aroused by the sound as of a lion brushing against the hut walls, as the beasts are known to do, and next, a loud roar. Mpachetula would immediately open the door half-way so that the people could look out into the moonlight and there, a little way off, would be the lion. It would immediately advance towards the house and then, as it prepared to spring for the door, Mpachetula would offer it some of the flour in his left hand, armed with a stirring-stick, while, in his right hand. As the lion landed, he would strike it on the head with the stick and lo and behold! the lion would vanish and the tail and claw would be found in his hand.

Superstitions. Scattered throughout these notes, particularly under Uwusi and Diwasa, mention is made of practices which show a strong belief in superstition. Below are given a number of minor beliefs, and it is interesting to compare them with many well-known superstitions in other parts of the world. 771 784

1. A child who cuts the upper incisor teeth first will be unlucky. Such children used to be killed by the Yao. (Other tribes make medicine against the threatened ill-luck.) [777]

2. A woman with polydactylism may not take food out of a corn-store. Otherwise the stock of corn will not last long. (Rudimentary sixth fingers are not uncommon.) [732]

3. An insect called chinyoo wusi which lives in the mud at the bottom of pools, if killed causes the water to dry up. [823]

4. If a boy puts a water-spider in the armpit when learning to swim, he will learn quickly.

5. A man wishing to prevent rain falling on a day he is making a journey, will wrap some of the leaves of the mkwawi tree in his bale cloth and go without detaining. [824]

3:Stanner D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

771 6. It is believed that signs of guilt are visible in the eye of a murderer; medicine is prescribed in the hope of getting rid of these signs.

●784 7. The possession of the hair of another person is supposed to give the possessor power over that person, hence a medicine man, when the patient he has been treating is cured, shaves the patient and keeps the hair until payment is made.

[826] 8. A native with light greenish-grey eyes is not to be trusted. He is said to have eyes like a cat and is called major(jor); these eyes are rare among natives.

9. It is unlucky for a child to get into a basket; he may be burned.

10. Should a woman turn the porridge pot upside down, every one who has eaten will become constipated. For the same reason, a woman, after turning out the porridge from the pot, just touches the top of the mass of porridge with the bottom of the pot.

11. A woman will never leave the pounding stick in the grain-mortar. Should she do so, the heavens would fall.

12. When a zebra is killed, a knot is tied in its tail so that eating of the meat shall not cause indigestion.

13. It is unlucky to sit upon a headrest, the mawili. The person would surely be bitten by a snake.

[843] 14. If a man commits murder, and his wife is pregnant at the time, she must sleep on the spear used.

15. Children are told that they must not eat at night; that if they are hungry, they must lie quiet and try to go to sleep again. If they don't obey and sit up eating porridge, a long hairy arm will come through the fastened door and beg for some, the voice of the unseen saying:

[539]

> "Ngwe chimbuti'chemi ssupa ni mjomi"
> "Give me that which you put to your nose to smell and throw away," the repeated movements of the hand to the mouth (nose) and back to the pot being supposed to make the "bogey" think that they are not really eating but merely smelling and throwing away the food.

16. A male should not scrape the porridge off the porridge stick; this is only allowed to the woman. Should a man do so, it is supposed that when he goes hunting, he will hit anything he shoots at, only in the tail.

17. There is a saying that the men and boys may eat little pieces of porridge which fall out of the pot, while cooking, on to the supporting stones and it will give them power to escape unhurt from battle. The fragments are called ngulupulu, (from ku-lupulu "to escape").

18. Children are instructed to take their food sitting down instead of being in a hurry and standing to take it. They are told that if they do not obey, their porridge will not go into their stomachs but into their legs and swell out their knee-joints.

3:Stanmus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

19. That portion of the gut of animals having folds of mucus membrane inside, may be eaten only by old people past the child-propagating age. If a young woman should eat it, she would have difficulty in labor. 771 784 DLa

20. It is believed that people who eat too freely of a little fish like whitebait called matumba get obstruction of the bowel by the wedging together of the bones. The treatment adopted is to pass up the rectum a smooth stick with a pad of rag at the end. This cannot be done by the person himself and so the aid of another has to be called in; only an intimacy, such as the relationship of brother-in-law gives, will warrant this service being asked.

21. The Yao believe that there is a little insect which lives in the ear, called chiyeyu lipihumlo, which tells the person what is said to him, the wax in the ear being its excrement. The pupil is called mwanache jwa lisu, the child of the eye. [826]

22. Among women, the uterus is called nemeso (meso = eyes); it is supposed to be a little person who holds the foetus. When the child is born, nemeso cannot find it and starts looking about, the movements causing the afterpains.

23. A man making his first journey to the coast used to sprinkle himself with water from every stream he crossed to give him a safe journey. In the same way, women at the present day going between Zomba and Blantyre sprinkle their babies with water from each stream. [484]

24. An ant-like insect called ndwyatumbe (lumbutumbu, Chin.) [dasylabris rufipilis] is lucky. On seeing it a native pats its belly and then rubs his own, wishing for plenty of food that day. If he is embarking on a journey or beginning some enterprise, he will wrap one of these insects in a fold of his loin cloth and take it with him for luck. [825]

25. When a native hears the mwipe bird call (its call is like the mew of a cat), if he wants something, he immediately says, "Oh mwipe, I want so-and-so. Be quiet and I will then be quiet, too!" If the bird ceases calling, he knows the wish will be granted. The female bird is said to be the more certain prophet.

26. The snake, nabulubuti, which lives in trees and is of a buff clay color with green markings, is said by natives to pierce the chest and tie a knot in itself on each side so that it can only be withdrawn by cutting off one knot. When the snake is thus withdrawn, its blood mixes with that of the man and he will die.

27. Natives have a habit of marking the spot where any event takes place by a stone by the side of the path, and every passer-by will add a stone for luck. In this way some large piles of stones have been made. [777]

28. A man resting on his way home from a long journey places a stone in the fork between the branches of a nearby tree, so that on his arrival he may find his wife has put by some food for him and has not used up the day's stock of flour.

29. A chameleon found digging in the path is said to presage the death of the finder's nearest relative. [789]

3:Stanmus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

771 784

30. If a chameleon is found holding on to the grass at both sides of the path, the path is "closed" and a man will turn back to his home and not proceed on his journey. It would be unlucky to continue.

787 771 784

31. Snakes seen in coils are a bad omen.

32. The slow-worm known as Ikumbula mangulu ("the cutter open of ant hills"), and the only anteater, if seen on the path, are of bad import.

33. To knock the toes against a stone on a journey is bad luck; if blood flows from the big toe, it points to good luck.

34. A man knocking the sole of his foot against a stone knows that some one is speaking ill of him.

35. A person whose hands itch knows he will receive a present.

36. Tremor of the circumorbital muscles of the right eye indicates that something good will be seen. When the left eye is affected, the outcome is less sure.

37. The cry of the bird ngulubulu (the green turaco), indicates to the hearer that he is about to meet some one, either friend or enemy.

771 784 825

38. Anyone who kills one of the large stick-insects (Phasmidae) known as chikase chiwiya, will always be breaking the cooking pots afterwards.

39. The natives believe that the caterpillar of the Hippotion osiris moth will jump at the breast. It is called chirumbila mumulu, "that which jumps at the breasts," and children seeing it will cover up their nipples with their hands.

40. Of Linulu, the Mongoose, there is a saying:

[539]

"Linulu gapachilanpuse ukilal"
"The banded mongooses relieve each other (at) the rascal"

It is said that mongooses assist one another when being hunted. When one is tired, a fresh one runs in so close to the pursuer that he goes after this one and leaves the tired one, and so they keep it up till the pursuer is exhausted.

41. Chiula, the frog. Children are told they must never kill a frog, or its spirit will come at night with porridge made of excrement and make them eat it. If a small child playing with a frog kills it by mischance, he will tear off a small piece of his calico cloth and place it by the frog as an offering.

42. Chindindi (Ikwapuse, Chin.) the weasel. It is said that the weasel hides its body and leaves exposed its anus, so that a chicken seeing it, goes up to peck at it, whereupon the weasel turns round quickly and catches the chicken with its mouth.

43. Chingwe, the skunk (from kwapa, to go to stool), so named on account of its odor, is said to apply the anus to a rat-hole and make wind. This will render insensible all the rats in the burrow and he can then dig them out at leisure.

44. Mbuli, the honey badger, when hunted is always said to attack a man by attempting to seize the testicles. Natives when they hunt this animal, tie stones in their loin cloths so that they hang down between the legs to defeat the badger.

3:Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

 771 784 826 539

45. A child, when one of its milk teeth drops out, stands some five yards away facing the door of the hut and throws the tooth over the roof of the hut, saying:

"Al lilumpulo lilo lyenu ulye, mbumi lyangu lyambuse 'lya!"
"Oh! over tooth your there is, give me my of good one!"

Religion. The matter of the religious beliefs professed by natives of East Central Africa is one beset with many difficulties to the student of today. It has been the subject of many essays by workers in the missionary field, but the wide contact of the natives of Nyasaland with missionary effort during the past thirty years has done much to confuse the problem, and one feels that many missionaries in their writings rather color the picture with their own feelings. 771

I think probably the Yao with whom I am now concerned have a truer conception of their own beliefs than many of the subject tribes among whom mission teaching has more easily taken root. The religious beliefs of a people are to a large extent the reflection of the circumstances under which that people lives. The outstanding event to all natives is death. At death, something is lost to the body, without which life is impossible. This is the mzimu which may be translated "soul" or "spirit." The mzimu is said to leave the body of the dying man when he becomes moribund or unconscious. It appears that this same mzimu may leave the body during unconscious states unassociated with death, as when a man faints, in epilepsy, and during sleep. 771 761 774

Apart from this evidence of the dissociation of the mzimu from the living body, the Yao believe that a man's shadow is an objective manifestation of the soul and they will say "the shadow is the mzimu." Fear is experienced if a man jumps on the shadow of his fellow. Light is also thrown on the constitution of the mzimu by the belief in a certain evil-spirit which dwells in deep pools. It is called chimalo-mzi, which means "one who may finish (drink up) all the water." The superstition regarding this evil spirit is that it can suck the blood from your shadow as you stand at the edge of the pool, till you become so weak that you fall in and are drowned. 774 774 776

After leaving the body at death, the mzimu goes to take up its place in the spirit-world, occupying a position corresponding to that held by the man during his life. With a truly materialistic conception, the soul is supposed to have all the attributes of the dead man, to be wealthy in proportion as the man was so on earth, and its relative position will be identical with that which he held among the living. The tribal chief becomes a paramount chief in the spirit world, the lesser chief holds sway in his lesser capacity, etc. We shall see that in intercession, when the tribe is threatened with calamities, it is the late paramount chief who is appealed to for help, and when one feudal chief is at war with another, the chief's dead predecessor will be called upon for aid. When a village is moved, it is from the spirit of the dead headman of the village that success in the enterprise is sought. Similarly, in family trouble, some dead ancestor is entreated to set things right, while a native 775

The men and boys now pass through the arch in order of seniority; each splashes himself with the water in the trough, but neither speaks nor rinses the mouth. The women come next, led by the head-wife of the chief; the latter rinses her mouth and, instructed by the doctor, repeats a prayer similar to that offered by her husband. The remainder of the women merely splash themselves, like the men, before passing through the arch. All then return to the village, where the pyejila is continued. 751 796

Finally the doctor takes the hammer-head from the trough and hands it to the chief, who refits the haft into it, and, a hoe having been placed on the ground, goes through the form of forging the latter by beating it with the hammer. He then scrapes the ground with the hoe as if clearing a place overgrown with grass; he does not dig with it as in hoeing up the ground for planting seed. After this rite the chief again bathes in medicated water similar to that in the trough, and the ceremony is complete.

Whereas the pyejila ceremony and its adjunct, the rite of the arch, are now but rarely performed, no Yao will omit the rite of purification after a death in his family. This ceremony consists of two essential parts, both protective against the ndaka, a disease characterised by dropsy and supposed to be contracted by contact with a corpse, or by association, especially by sharing a meal, with those who have been in such contact. The first of these parts is bathing in certain medicines, which protects the bather from ndaka, and the second consists of a sort of communion meal, shared by all friends and especially relatives with those who have been contaminated, and designed to protect those friends and relatives. [178] 751 764 796 783

The decoction for bathing is made by soaking the roots of lapudembati and lundemele in water, together with the bark of mbomwa, one piece each from the east and west aspects of the tree; the water assumes a reddish tint, and the whole body is bathed. 751 783 824 765

The communion meal consists of porridge made from any kind of flour or of rice, and some ngunde beans. In the latter some scorched and powdered root of mandengelele is mixed, with a little salt. All near relatives of the deceased must partake of this meal, as well as their wives and their near relatives; part is carefully put aside for the use of any relative unable to be present at the ceremony. [262]

Latterly, since the spread of Islam among the WaYao, this rite has become confused with the distribution of food to the poor at the funeral of a Muslim, and the Arabic word sadaqa ("charity") is now generally used for it, to the exclusion of its wider, correct meaning. [177] [797]

It may be mentioned here that after the death of a child the father is denied access to his wife for a period of about three weeks, and the first act must be one of coitus interruptus. 765 784

MEREDITH SANDERSON.

1: Tew E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

never to have had any large-scale central political organization, and their history is full of occasions when one group of Yao has attacked another. Even within his own area the authority of the chief was not, apparently, sufficiently strong to prevent one village headman from raiding his neighbours; the chief maintained no standing army.[1] The chief held certain rights and privileges. He was entitled to the ground tusk of any elephant found in his territory (the finder was rewarded after it had been sold, with a cloth); he received tribute in food,[2] with which he entertained visitors. He took a share of the spoils of war and was also entitled to annual labour service and to a gift when he made a new burial place. Apart from his military and judicial responsibilities, he had authority to settle when and where initiation ceremonies should be held.[3] The right to hold these ceremonies was sought after by the village headmen as a mark of status.[4] The chiefs or headmen of certain families had the right to wear a white cloth bound round their temples as insignia of rank.[5]

In addition the chief had a certain ritual status. He was thought to incur mystical danger by contact with death, and so was not allowed to attend a funeral nor to eat a chicken brought by a messenger announcing a death, nor to accompany his military expeditions. He was supposed to have great power through special medicines. He had to make offerings to the ancestors, especially in affairs concerning the whole people, such as drought or epidemic. He was expected to give a burial cloth at the death of an important man. At his death a period of social disorganization was recognized, members of his village were allowed to pillage and rape, until he was buried.

Succession to the chiefly office was matrilineal. The chief's position was based partly on his status as the senior male of his own matrilineal kin group, partly on his wealth. His command over slaves, guns, and caravans to the coast was greater than that of others, and from these his military strength was derived, for a chief was powerless without his following of dependents. The chief of the area was also headman of his own village. In fact, the position and duties of a village headman (except that he could not exact tribute)[6] reproduced in small scale those of the chief. The headmen also were in mystical danger through contact with death and were the channel through which the ancestors were approached in affairs concerning the village. They, too, built up their prestige and wealth by slaving activities. They seem to have been largely independent of the chief, carrying on slave raids of their own, and if they could gain a sufficient following, they might break away from the chief, and set up their own chiefdoms.[7]

The chief ruled through a hierarchy of headmen. His councillors were superior headmen, placed over a number of village headmen. Commoners could approach the chief only through the councillor in whose area their village belonged. The councillor's special duties were to report daily to the chief on the affairs of his district, to advise, and to arbitrate in the chief's own domestic affairs, e.g. in conflicts between the chief and his brothers and nephews. The councillors were not necessarily relatives of the chief,[8] but were chosen on account of their general status in the community, and their

[1] Elmslie, 4, 1899, p. 105, says of the Yao in the Shire highlands: 'Every tenth man one met might be set down as a chief . . . petty quarrels of petty chiefs were abundant. . . .' See Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, pp. 169 and 154.

[2] Stannus, 4, 1922, says that only beer was owed to him.

[3] Ibid., p. 279.

[4] Duff, 1903, p. 312.

[5] Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, p. 16; Werner, 1906, p. 260.

[6] Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, p. 153.

[7] Ibid., pp. 32 and 156.

[8] Ibid., p. 156.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

Native Authority, to the Native Authority, and eventually to the District Commissioner if the case is one which he will countenance. In practice, most cases reach the chief and go no further. Most people accept his decision. Thus the chief has important judicial functions. 692 643

The Chief as his People's Representative

In special situations where the welfare of the chiefdom as a whole has been endangered by an infringement of the mores, the chief may take action. For example, a chief prosecutes a village headman who allows a woman in his village to bear her first child before she has been through the litiwo ceremony. Every woman who becomes pregnant for the first time must undergo this ceremony, during which she is instructed in child welfare and child care. If she bears a child without undergoing the ceremony, she is said to have 'spoilt the country' (ajalwice cilambo), in the sense that she has besmirched its reputation.[1] 643 687 843

Chiefs usually call in magicians 'to smell out' those responsible for keeping back the rain.[2] When the rains fail as they did in 1948–9, their failure is held to be due to the magic of some evilly disposed person. It then becomes the chief's duty to call in a magician to indicate who this person is. The fees for this duty are paid by the chief himself on behalf of his people. 643 787 821

The chief also acts as a representative of his people when they are affected as a whole. For example, Nyambi called in a magician after man-eating lions had taken some of his subjects. This magician called for the hearth-stones and domestic utensils from all the villages in the area, and built them up into a pyramid over which he made some anti-lion medicine. This was to clear the whole chiefdom of man-eating lions. 643 789 731

Nowadays, the chief's representation of his people is seen most clearly in his position in the Administrative framework.[3] The chief represents the Administration to his people since they approach it through him. At the same time the Administration clearly treats him as the representative of his people and consults 643

[1] I was told in Mponda's area that the women undergo this ceremony after the birth of the child, but that it is still obligatory.

[2] Kutawa ula—lit. 'to tie or bind the rain', in the sense of to make it a prisoner.

[3] I have dealt with this aspect more fully in 'The Political Organization of the Yao of Southern Nyasaland'.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

Further enquiries may reveal that this is only a section of a larger village, possibly a hundred or more yards away. 622

The boundaries of a village may not always be clear. Clusters of huts which are part of one village may be physically nearer another, but in the minds of the Yao, who see not only the huts but also the social relationships of the people occupying them, there is no confusion at all. As a general rule the villages are fairly compact and clearly demarcated from others, and even strangers have no difficulty in recognizing the autonomy of the group which is expressed in many different ways. MacDonald recorded that formerly a headman performed a certain amount of ritual which symbolized the unity of the village.[1] Much of this has fallen away, but the unity remains. 621

The ritual surrounding the foundation of a new village bears testimony to its persisting political significance. In this ritual the unity of the group, against other similar groups, including the village from which it has sprung, is expressed. On first arrival at a new village site the men build grass sheds, beginning with that of the headman. That night the headman pours a cone of sacred flour at the root of a tree on the site, and asks the spirits of his ancestors whether the site is propitious. Early next morning he examines the cone to see the answer. If a side of the cone has collapsed it does not augur well and another site is selected. If the cone is still whole it is taken that the spirits acquiesce, and permanent huts can be started. The headman then goes into the bush to find medicines[2] which he mixes with groundbeans. That night, with the medicated groundbeans in the hut, the headman has intercourse with his wife. In the morning those who are not sexually active come to the headman's grass shed to drink some water in which the medicine has been steeped and eat some of the medicated beans with a little porridge, which the headman's wife has prepared from the sacred flour. This medicine is called 'the medicine to strengthen the village' (mtera wakulimbika musi). Until then all members of the village should have been continent but after this sexual relationships may be resumed. The object of the medicine is to prevent those 622 621 787 622 621 751 834 372

[1] See pp. 31–2.

[2] Nkulungulu and nkuta, two plants commonly used for protection against ndaka. See f.n., p. 112. [824] villages, however, the headman's activities may be as circumscribed by ritual prohibitions as the chief's are. 622 554

The village headman is subject not only to mystical dangers but also to other dangers deriving from his position of authority. It is significant that villagers never go to a diviner to find out the cause of a village headman's death. When I asked informants why this was so, they said, 'Well, what's the use of it? He has enemies on all sides in the village who are trying to kill him with their magic.' In harmony with this view of village headmanship, the symbolic object which represents the village headman in the diviners' gourds I have seen, is a small ring of grass (singwa), a copy of the grass cushion women place on their heads when they are carrying loads. This symbolizes the ring of enemies which surrounds the village headman. The saying 'the tortoise defecates on the one who carries it',[1] usually applied to chieftainship, applies equally well to a village headman. 622 787 578 482

A village headman may expect little material benefit from his position of authority. If he is an Administrative village headman he may be paid a small annuity of 5s. or 10s.[2] Returning labour migrants may give him a blanket or a military overcoat, or perhaps a few shillings, but this is not usual. If he is not a strict Moslem he will almost certainly be given a pot of beer from every brewing made for sale in the local 'club house'. On the other hand, if an important stranger, particularly a White official, arrives in the village he feels he must give his guest a chicken. It is mannerly to reciprocate with another gift, but not all Whites know this, or, if they do, do not observe it. In particular if the chief comes to his village, he will be expected to entertain him and here can expect no recompense—the chief 'eats from his country'. 622 651 431

The Yao know that the position of headman is no sinecure. Frequently the one chosen to succeed refuses to accept the position, especially if he is well placed in employment. It is significant that the word for an heir is litegwa[3]—the one who is trapped. An 622 554

[1] Ngogo jikuwpela usyene iwajigele.

[2] Until recently this was true. As I was leaving the field in 1949, I heard that the Administration had decided to abandon this system in favour of one in which only group headmen would be remunerated.

[3] Substantive form of the passive of the verb lutega—to set a trap as for animals. This word is not widely known, especially among the younger Yao.

621 his mother was ill and had gone with Lupunje's younger brother to 626 the diviner to find out the cause of the illness. The diviner indicated
753 that Lupunje thought that Kalambo was not showing him the proper respect. Lupunje knew that his sisters had lost their value in the lineage since they had stopped bearing children, whereas Kalambo's sisters were still reproducing. His malice had caused the woman's illness. When Kalambo got home he asked his mother's brother to blow water out of his mouth [1] and help him to prepare some medicine for the sick woman. This Lupunje did and the woman recovered immediately.

Shortly afterwards Kalambo remonstrated with his mother's brother for causing the illness of his sister, but Lupunje said that he had no control over it: the spirits had brought it on her. Kalambo knew that he could do nothing and abandoned the idea of building his own village. He knew that there was bound to be more illness if he carried on with his plan.

182 Clearly the belief in the mystical powers of the ancestors or of 621 sorcery is a force which prevents sections from breaking away
626 from the village. A break follows only when opposition within the village has reached sufficient pitch to force one of the sections to take the risk of illness, rather than to continue living in the village. Sometimes the dissident group comes back because further deaths at their new village site convince them that their action was wrong.[2]

Effects of the Headman's Personality

622 Whether a village maintains its unity or not, depends very largely on the personality of the headman. This is why the officiating headmen and others at the installation ceremonies are so insistent that cases should be settled quickly. The main duty of a headman is to maintain harmonious relationships within his village and to see to the welfare of its members. All severe
[787] illnesses are immediately reported to him, and so are the results of all divinations. He usually sends his representative to divina-
[764] tions concerning kinsmen not related to him matrilineally. He is immediately notified of all deaths and he organizes the funeral rites. Squabbles are brought to him for arbitration and even 622 where squabbles are settled by kinsmen in the village, usually the 692 headman is formally told of them. Frequently marriage diffi-

[1] An act which recants malice. See Chap. VI, p. 139.
[2] See the case history in Chap. VI, p. 153.

The events leading up to a split in a matrilineage usually follow a definite pattern. Very frequently indeed an accusation of sorcery is involved.[1] This usually stimulates a dissatisfied warden to gather his dependants together and to move off to found a new village. Elsewhere I have set out in detail the typical events which precede a village break-up when the lineage splits after a man quarrels with his mother's younger sister's sons.[2] These splits are not always successful because the seniority of the older relative, especially if he is a headman of some standing, may serve to reunite the village, and the leader of the dissident group may be unable to maintain its independence. This is what happened in Mwambajila village.

613 578 621

Mwambajila is one of the more important village headmen in Jalasi's area. The tension between him and his mother's younger sister's son Mbwana Somu reached a climax after a series of deaths among Mbwana Somu's children. He consulted a diviner and found that Mwambajila was the sorcerer causing these deaths. Mbwana Somu was very angry at this and told his sisters that they ought to leave the village and go to live in Liwonde's area, i.e. about 15 miles away. Eventually he persuaded them to move and they went to live on the Masanje river banks. But the deaths continued. The women now started to be worried because they had left Mwambajila's village

---

[1] The implication of this cannot be understood without some knowledge of Yao divining procedure. The type of divining is usually by gourd and object (ndumba). The diviner first of all establishes the reason for the visit, i.e. death, illness, theft, or whatever it is. He then consults his gourd and throws into his hand a variety of symbolic objects. He builds a story round these objects, and finally pronounces that he sees some person whom he vaguely defines. The consultor is then asked to mention who this could be. Though sorcery is supposed to be practised mainly in order to get human flesh for ghoulish feasts, it is not believed to act haphazard. In other words, a sorcerer is supposed to select his victims for revenge as well as for meat. The selective processes at work, therefore, when the consultor seeks to reconcile the diviner's findings with his own suspicions, are that he should select someone who is obviously evil, i.e. from his point of view, one with whom he has been quarrelling, and he should appraise the possible motivation for sorcery. After he has made the selection the name is tested by the diviner and the consultor may later submit a chicken to the poison ordeal to test the diviner's findings.

[787 754]

This, of course, confirms Evans-Pritchard's analysis of Azande witchcraft and I here acknowledge my debt to him for stimulus both from his book and from the discussions we have had on the topic. I assume his analysis in my discussion. See Evans-Pritchard, E. E., Witchcraft, Oracles and Magic among the Azande, Clarendon Press (Oxford, 1937).

[2] In Seven Tribes. Case History II, 321.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

578 and that he could not understand who could be inducing them to 593 talk like this. He told them also that as far as he was concerned they could report the case to whomsoever they wished. The women came 621 out of the hut and went straight to Pawesi who was the headman's younger brother. He told them to go back and to wait a while before they took further action.

578 After four days had passed the headman's sister who had fought with the headman's wife, became ill. In the morning the sisters sent 593 a message to Mponda but he did not come. They sent another 754 message to Pawesi who came and asked if they had told Mponda. They said that they had, but he had refused to come. Pawesi called 787 James and Ajusa, the sister's sons of the headman, and told them that he would tell the headman that they were going to find out the cause of the illness. This they did. The diviner indicated that the headman had caused the illness by sorcery, because of the fight between his wife and sisters. Pawesi tested the divination by giving a chicken some poison. It died, indicating that the divination was accurate. He took the chicken's head to Ngunga who was Mponda's perpetual mother's brother.

When Ngunga heard this he refused to believe it. However, he agreed to send for Mponda and to ask him about it. When he did so Mponda denied the accusation. Ngunga now produced the chicken's head and accused Mponda of being a liar. At that moment a child came to tell them that the woman was dead and the interview ended. They went to the funeral and the next morning they decided to have a post-mortem meeting (mapeto) in order to decide the cause of the death. Mitomoni, one of Nyambi's perpetual sons, represented the chief. Ngunga opened the discussion by telling the meeting that the woman had been killed by the headman because of the fight between his sisters and wife. Mitomoni asked how they knew this and Ngunga told of the divination and the poison ordeal. He then asked Mponda if he had heard what had been said and what he had to say. Mponda replied that he knew nothing of it. Ngunga said that Mponda was a bad man and that the others would leave him and he would have to live alone. Mitomoni told Pawesi and Ngunga that they must not leave the village. Ngunga replied that it was impossible to stay there while Mponda was so bad. If the women stayed with him he would finish them all. Pawesi collected 30 of the 40 huts that made up the village and took them away to Chikweo's area, a distance of about 15 miles. Those who stayed behind with Mponda were his 'children' and some unrelated people.

593 This case brings to the fore the position of the younger brother
578 as a constant challenge to his elder for the care of his sisters.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

604 578 Mwanace. He was the junior marriage surety to the marriage and it was his duty to go to the man's marriage surety, report the matter and arrange to take some action to get the man well again. Mwanace, however, refused to take any action. Instead he tauntingly said, 'Take the matter to Ali Kasunka, it is his village.' The woman did so, and Ali Kasunka asked immediately whether she had not taken the matter to Mwanace. She replied that she had and repeated Mwanace's words. Ali Kasunka took the matter up with Mwanace who now objected to being ordered about. Ali Kasunka, however, impressed on Mwanace that the village was his (Ali Kasunka's) and the authority rested with him. He then went to the man's home to tell them of Wayison's illness. The man's representative came and he and Ali Kasunka consulted a diviner. They found that the man was ill from ndaka, which he had contracted in his home village. They found medicine and treated him and he recovered.

604 578 833 ●787 684 Things came to a head in 1947. Mwanace's younger sister Nyangu II (D11) was married to a soldier who was away. One morning she came to her mother's elder sister, Mbalasyao (C1),[1] and told her that she had found semen on her pudenda and could not recall having had intercourse with anyone. Mbalasyao told Ali Kasunka about this. It was clearly a matter for divination and Ali Kasunka called Mwanace and told him that they ought to consult a diviner. But Mwanace's attitude, even in such a crisis as this, was hostile. He refused and said it was not his work to do this sort of thing. Ali Kasunka therefore went to a diviner with his sister Mbalasyao. The diviner said the semen was Mwanace's. He said that he had entered her hut magically and had sexual intercourse with her without her knowing it.[2] When Ali Kasunka got back to the village he called Mwanace and asked him what tricks he was playing in the village. Mwanace said that he had done nothing—it was not his village. Ali Kasunka then vaguely hinted at his crime. Mwanace pressed for more details and Ali Kasunka accused him outright of sleeping with his sister. He had hardly uttered the accusation before Mwanace had drawn a knife and attacked him. Mwanace was screaming something to the effect that Ali Kasunka had come to him with lies about having seen a diviner. Ali Kasunka beat off the attack and reiterated the accusation. Mwanace now turned his rage upon the woman and tried to catch her. Two of the men in the village then caught Mwanace and subdued

[1] Her mother, Amaliama, was dead.

[2] This is called cigonecesya. It combines the use of magic with sister-incest. [835] To the Yao mind there could be no clearer proof of sorcery. I have already mentioned the importance of sister-incest in relationship to the beliefs surrounding the sorority-group. See p. 146.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

him. The woman in the meantime had run to Chiwalo's hut half a mile away. Here she complained to the chief that Mwanace wanted to kill her. Chiwalo refused to listen to her complaint and sent for Ali Kasunka. When he had come and explained the sequence of events, he continued saying that he would like to take the case to court. Chiwalo, who was Ali Kasunka's wife's father's sister's son (hence a classificatory younger brother) and whose henchman Ali Kasunka was, refused to arbitrate in the case but referred it to Kawinga. On the day of the case the woman's husband came back from the Army. The case was tried and eventually the court assessors awarded a damages claim of £3 to be paid by Mwanace to his sister. The husband, at the same time, said that he could not remain married to her because whenever he saw her he would think that she had slept with her brother and in court he gave Ali Kasunka a marriage termination payment. The tension between Ali Kasunka and his 'sister's son' did not end there however. When they got back to the village Ali Kasunka remonstrated with Mwanace saying, 'Are you not ashamed to have married your sister?' Mwanace said that he could not stand that sort of thing and went back to live uxorilocally.

A crucial point in this case history is that the women did not like Mwanace. Almost certainly there would have been a split in the village had the women had more confidence in Mwanace. The tension between Ali Kasunka and Mwanace, although the conflict is inter-generational, started, as it consistently does, from the relationships of a man to the women of his matrilineage. Without the support of the women, younger brothers or sister's sons are impotent against the power of their senior relatives. It is only when they can induce the women to follow them and to leave their rivals that they can found a new village and thereby begin to earn prestige. Therefore, although the men are the active agents in bringing about a physical act of fission, they are in fact only making manifest a situation which is latent within the lineage.

The position of the senior male matrilineal relative is of fundamental importance in questions involving segmentation. His position is seen most clearly in the dominant matrilineage, in which the name of the village is inherited. The Yao practise 'positional succession'. A man not only succeeds to his mother's brother's name but also to the position of the mother's brother in the social structure as a whole.[1] It follows that when the

[1] See Chap. V, p. 121.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

754 A masuwi may be met with under different circumstances. An educated native told me of his experience one night when riding a bicycle back to a township where he was employed. Coming along a smooth-hoed path with his lamp alight, he became aware of the presence of something in the bush in front and at the side of him. Suddenly his lamp was smashed and he was left in darkness, while something pushed him over so hard that he fell off his cycle. Picking himself up, he started to wheel his cycle on, when there appeared on the path in front, figures who, rubbing their hands together to produce a phosphorescent glow, held them up in front of the boy's face. He was, however, not molested further, and coming to a group of huts he knew, he went in and made inquiries as to the cause of his experiences and was promptly told that there was a man living in a hut near the spot on the path where they had occurred who was supposed to be masuwi. Such a story is given for what it is worth. The boy was about twenty-two years old, a highly educated native with an intelligent appreciation of the worth of superstition.

Some masuwi demonstrations can have no object but to strike terror and keep up the prestige of the masuwi class. Mr. Moggridge wrote me, "A boy of mine was certainly attacked and squeezed about the neck by a man whom he described as naked, huge, and slightly luminous, on the road at the back of my house in Blantyre. The boy was strolling up and down in the dusk and had nothing about him to provoke robbery; he was almost choked before he managed to let out a yell which determined his assailant to let him go. He was not a local boy and no theory of personal spite was supportable. I thought and still think that the motive was to show that even the Resident's servant twenty yards from the Resident's house was not safe from masuwi." It seems possible that some natives with intent to rob had pretended to be masuwi but recognising that their victim was likely to cause trouble, they went no further.

[824] It is said that the phosphorescence is produced by rubbing in the hands two vegetable substances from local trees and that this is the method the masuwi adopt to announce their presence.

754 Poison Ordeal. As I have said above, when anyone sickens or dies, the illness or death
·695 is likely to be considered the work of some one who is masuwi, and action will be taken by the relatives to find him out. The proceedings in such a case where witchcraft is suspected will now be briefly sketched; though I give an account of a case from beginning to end as if it occurred at the present time, it must be understood that the giving of masuwi, the ordeal poison, is now much less common than formerly. A man becomes ill in some village and does not get better, so the caster-of-lots is consulted. The sick man's relatives or friends go to the lot-caster and approach the subject indirectly by asking him his advice about a number [787] of imaginary cases; they may say, "Things have been stolen from our house." The lots are cast and the caster replies, "No, you have not come to see me about that." This may go on for hours before the facts of the case proper are mentioned to him. Finally, they tell him that one of their relatives is ill in the village, the lots are consulted and advice is given and sitting within the circle, he blew his whistle which was irresistible to the mwesi man who was then induced to come out of his house. When he had reached the grave, the water was sprinkled over him by the junaketela with the millet stalk from the dish on the grave, or he was struck with the gnu's tail; in either case, he fell to the ground senseless. He was then ready to be dealt with. The seketela sticks, small bamboos filled with crocodile poison, were pushed up the anus and broken off to liberate the poison. Sticks might also be inserted behind the ear or in various other spots. The mwesi was then beaten to wake him up; he ran off to his own village and there, a little later, he sickened and died, telling no one the cause. After death, the ausilo when preparing the corpse of the hitherto unsuspected mwesi, might find the end of the stick projecting from the anus or see the punctures elsewhere with the medicine adhering to them, and the man was revealed in his true colors. 754 695 791

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

At Mtwiche's village, there was a man called Liunga who professed to be able to extract the poison injected by the junaketela by causing his patients to undergo a vapor bath and to drink certain decoctions. This man would never reveal the name of anyone who came to him for treatment but would brag that "trade was brisk." The symptoms of the mortal malady caused by the seketela are said to be intestinal obstruction with tremendous distention of the abdomen (peritonitis). [184]

Of this same village, a story is told which, if not true, at all events illustrates the sort of thing that is believed. As has been mentioned above, whenever the junaketela blows his little horn, any wasowi will hear it and thinking it is one of their band calling, will go to meet him. A woman of this village told how she and her husband were sitting over the fire while the evening meal was cooking, when he suddenly jumped up and said he must go outside for a bit. She remonstrated and asked him to wait for his food, but he hurried off. Later he returned, complaining of feeling very ill; his belly swelled up and he died soon after. It was said that this man was very friendly with a woman named Abibi and that when he went out into the bush, he was heard calling in a low voice, "Is that you, Abibi?" When his body was examined, two punctures were found on the left side of the chest. It was supposed that it was Abibi he expected to meet and with her enjoy a cannibalistic repast, whereas it was a junaketela who had called and killed him.

This brief outline of a case of sickness, suspicion of witchcraft, death, and the consultation with the caster-of-lots, the witch-finder, ordeal poison, death, and the catching of the cannibal witch, has been given as a more or less consecutive story in order that it may be most easily understood. Some further details concerning the lot-caster, witchcraft, etc., must be added.

Lot-casting. Medicine men who cast lots were at one time fairly plentiful and were consulted on many matters, often of small importance from a European point of view. Chief of all were questions of witchcraft. The modus operandi varied in different cases. In wasowi and other important matters, the medicine man always used the chisungo (divining in- 787 787 strument). These were of various types but the most usual was made of a gourd, ukhumbe, called ukumbe,[1] containing a number of small articles, each of which had some special name and if it appeared in the casting, a special significance. Among these articles are:

3:Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

(a) Ashikhokoki; small pieces of broken white earthen-ware. These have the significance of whiteness, cleanness, innocence, or answers in the negative to questions as to any particular person having done some action.

(b) Chiwumapeje; the body of one of those beetles which feign death. This indicates death in answer to the question asked. Chiwumapeje is the name of the beetle.

(c) Upese; a small piece of a sleeping-mat, signifying linen.

(d) Liwale; a small piece of stick or grass.

(e) Or Mwale the plural; little pieces of stick, said to indicate that the people have previously consulted some other diviner, whose findings are called for by the man who is then casting lots.

(f) Mwenge; the horn. For convenience the small horn of a guapi is used. It indicates witchcraft, referring to the fact that witches like medicine men are supposed to keep their medicines in horns.

(g) Npolaka; the coiled tendril of a vine, indicating a dispute, etc.

The lots are cast, and according to the disposition of the various articles, an interpretation is given in answer to the question put to the instrument.

Chipende (plur. ipende) is the word used in referring to instruments used for divination in minor cases and several of these are usually included in a diviner's kit. They may be called chisange.

1. A small heap of flour or ashes is raised and any article, such as a knife or a piece of stick is flipped towards it; interpretation is based on the direction taken by the article flipped.

2. A small tortoise shell filled with medicine propelled by a feather stuck in one end is similarly used, and is called chisange cha ngwepe;[2]

3. A horn and feather may be used in the same way.

4. The stuffed skin of a weasel, chindinde (lilongwe, Chin.) is also used, in the same way as gulupulo, the squirrel.[3]

On February 4, 1914 at Zomba I witnessed Chinganire of Chapita village, a Mangaeja man, use a small outfit for divining, consisting of: (1) A small orbid horn in a gourd with pieces of stick (Pl. XVI, figs. 3, 5); (2) a piece of bamboo matting with a horn fixed on each end of the strip called chisange cha ngwe (Pl. XVI, fig. 2); (3) medicine in a gourd (Pl. XVI, fig. 1); (4) a rattle (Pl. XVI, fig. 4). He commenced by taking these things out of his bag and dusting them by rubbing in his hands. The gourd cup was cleaned out with his finger and spit into. The horn was spit upon, rubbed in the hands, and anointed with medicine from the gourd by means of a stick; then placed at the forehead, point forwards, held for a second at each armpit, and finally rubbed over in the hands again. The cup was similarly manipulated, especially the edge, and rubbed in the hands, as were the horns on the ulu spoon. All this was done with great precision and evidently in definite order, each article being laid on the ground in turn, and the string of matting rolled up. Four pieces of reed of a size that would lie over the mouth of the gourd cup overlapping the edges about an inch were then selected from among others and set ready on the ground. The rattle was treated with medicine from the same gourd. The horn was placed in the gourd by the operator, point upwards and lying towards himself, as he held the gourd by its body in the palm of his left hand, the handle towards him. Shaking the rattle in the right hand, he constantly muttered to the chisungu " to tell him truly," " to answer his questions," and so on. By slight movements of his left arm which were well disguised but quite easily perceptible to the watcher, he could make the horn assume the erect position in the gourd and then fall backwards or forwards or to either side. The first position indicates " all is well," "nothing need be done"; the second means "there is trouble," "some one is talking at the village," " there is a case to be settled." Thus answer questions put to it by the owner who is being consulted about some case of illness, etc.

[1] Stannus, 'Notes on some matters of British Central Africa,' Pl. XXVII, fig. 4.
[2] Ibid., Pl. XXVI, fig. 2. [3] Ibid., p. 304 and Pl. XXVI, fig. 3.

3:Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

Another method of divining is with the horn in position as before mentioned and the four pieces of stick set across the mouth of the gourd touching one another, the ends projecting at the sides. The operator is able to make the horn appear to force off all the sticks without moving the gourd, or he can make any number of the sticks tumble into the gourd, and repeat the performance. If they fall off, it means a good day to go on a journey; if they fall in, the journey should be postponed.

The chisungu ulu spoon is held similarly in the left hand by the middle so that two wings are formed, each with the weight of a horn at the end. The matter-of-fact is able by almost imperceptible movements to make the two wings open and fall away from each other or swing together, and together partly roll up. When they fall apart wide open, it is an indication that all will be well; when they close, death may be expected. The gourd and horn and this chisungu ulu spoon form a pair which are called female and male.

Chipanda ulu ndinga: ndinga is a word relating to omens in regard to journeys. Thom Chonga told me that he remembers as a boy, when his father was going on a journey, he would take some pieces of root, moisten them in his mouth, and stick them on the wall of the hut. These pieces of root were daily watched by Thom's mother, as unaided they gradually took up a position lower and lower on the wall until they reached the ground. Then she knew that her husband had safely reached his destination.

Omens may be told in yet another way, chisungu ulu kwandula (ku-wandula, to speak). Ndundu is put in an empty house and the medicine man and his clients sit outside. The medicine man is asked some question which he puts to the ndundu which then answers like an oracle. I have never seen this done but my native informants tell me the voice that spoke is invariably usual in character and Chinyanja is the language always used. It is doubtless a case of what we should call ventriloquism. The custom is evidently of Mang'anja origin but in great favor with the Yao.

3: Stanner D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT? Yao FT?

787 498

787 695

Divination also plays an important part in tracing thieves or stolen property or in picking out from a number of people anyone guilty of some crime. Several modes of procedure may be adopted. The chisungo called ndumba may be used as the chisungo cha chipeto (chipeto, a kind of basket). Medicine in the form of certain roots is placed on the ground and covered by the inverted basket on which is placed the ndumba. Each person in turn is requested to lift the basket and the guilty one is at once revealed by his inability to budge the basket off the ground. This method may even be used to reveal a man guilty of witchcraft.

787

Other methods of divination include a kind of trial by ordeal somewhat similar to a boiling water ordeal. Kwendula (from ku-endula, to tramp round, referring to the peregrinations made in search of what is lost, or nawendo, the Chinyanja word from ku-londa, to follow on the footsteps of) is the name of the witch-doctor who searches for stolen property or traces the thief. The same man may be called nakwendula in Chinyanja (from ku-vendula, to reveal) when he uses his instrument to detect in a crowd the person guilty of some crime. The kwendula uses the horn of a kudu stuffed with appropriate medicine, the actual mise en scène and methods adopted varying somewhat with different practitioners. The practice I believe to be a Mang'anja one and I think most of the operators were Anyanja men and not Yao, though the Yao, as with other customs, adopted the system fully. In my district, the kwendula was usually armed with a rattle; when the horn indicated the guilty individual, he intimated the fact to the assembled crowd by throwing flour over him.

When a search is to be made for stolen property, the horn is put into the hands of four men, alternate men pressing down and pulling up on the long horn, while the medicine man stands by, operating his rattle and exhorting the horn to do its work of revelation. I know a man who has on several occasions assisted in holding the horn; he said it simply seemed to drag him on in a series of jerky movements, sometimes going very fast, at other times moving slowly, dragging the holders "along the footsteps of the thief with the stolen goods" in and out of the house, through the bush, and across streams, until suddenly the horn dropped from their hands to the ground, where on digging, the stolen goods were found buried. (Cf. table turning, planchette, etc.)

[114]

A good description of kwendula under the headings nakwendula and nawendula is given by Garbutt,[1] who describes the Mang'anja operators. In this same article, he makes the mistake of describing as nakwindula, the fumahula. As I have stated above, the fumahula is an order of medicine men who trap the man who is an wizard while in the wizard state, but the nakwindula points him out while he appears as an ordinary man of the village.

[1] H. W. Garbutt, "Native customs in Nyasa," (Man, London, 1910, vol. 10, p. 38-40).

3:Stanzus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

Witch-medicine. The making of medicine against people has been shown to occupy an essential place in usuri, and it plays an important part in all conditions. So by insensible grades, the ordinary use of drugs in common diseases is reached, though it is probable that very much greater faith is placed in a packet of burnt roots put under the floor of the house than in the efficacy of any concoction taken by mouth. 754 [757]

There is a general belief that by medicine extra ability verging into supernatural power can be acquired. This power in a general sense is represented by the word ukoma and a man so possessed is spoken of as mundu fun komale. The desire for increased power may be a perfectly natural one, such as a desire for influence and popularity as a chief, or on the other hand, the power of usuri may be aimed at, or again, the knowledge of magic medicine for thieving or for any other practice. Ukoma is, therefore, a relative matter. The necessary medicine or initiation into the understanding of magic can be purchased from persons already practitioners, the honest herbalist merging by imperceptible degrees into the most criminal witch-doctor. A single practitioner may prescribe a charcoal dressing for an ulcer, exorcise an evil spirit by a vapor bath, sell medicine to enable the buyer to win a case at court, arrange medicine on a pathway to act as a selective love potion, or prescribe a drug to change a man into a lion. 756 787 791

Deserving of special mention are the people who thieve by the aid of medicine which they have either purchased or prepared themselves. Such a man is called chitoka and the medicine ntoka or chitoka. The active principle of this medicine is said to be prepared from the tail of a hyaena, an animal which is said to be able to enter a house where people are sleeping and kill and carry off the fowls without waking the occupants. The medicine is often carried in a hyaena's tail. The chitoka is supposed to approach the house he would rob and chewing some medicine in the mouth, gently blow towards it to put everyone to sleep. The door is supposed to unfasten itself and the thief is free to take what he wishes. He is even said to kill, cook, and eat food in the house while the inmates remain unconscious. A special characteristic of the chitoka is that whatever he lays his hands on in the house he must remove, though he does not want it, so that in the morning many unwieldy, useless objects may be found outside the hut. 791 789

There are many other magic medicines. One of these, fungo, if introduced into a village, will cause the illness and death of some inmate. Anyone handling the body of the sick man or the corpse after death, sickens and dies until the whole village is wiped out. There is a man serving a life sentence now at the Central Prison, Zomba, who was convicted of having caused the death of many people in a village in Angoniland. He is said cheerfully to have admitted the power of his medicine. 754

Medicine made from a cousin is supposed to be efficacious in various ways. The blood of a cousin is instilled into the ear for otorrhoea. Drinking the water which has been used by a cousin to wash his face relieves intestinal colic. Medicine is made from the hairs of the beard of a cousin or from an adzie and used for chest trouble. 757 605

3:Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

19. That portion of the gut of animals having folds of mucus membrane inside, may be eaten only by old people past the child-propagating age. If a young woman should eat it, she would have difficulty in labor. 771 784 [DCA]

20. It is believed that people who eat too freely of a little fish like whitebait called matemba get obstruction of the bowel by the wedging together of the bones. The treatment adopted is to pass up the rectum a smooth stick with a pad of rag at the end. This cannot be done by the person himself and so the aid of another has to be called in; only an intimacy, such as the relationship of brother-in-law gives, will warrant this service being asked.

21. The Yao believe that there is a little insect which lives in the ear, called chiqwa lipilamile, which tells the person what is said to him, the wax in the ear being its excrement. The pupil is called mwanache jwa lisu, the child of the eye. [826]

22. Among women, the uterus is called nawaw (nawo = eyes); it is supposed to be a little person who holds the foetus. When the child is born, nawaw cannot find it and starts looking about, the movements causing the afterpains.

23. A man making his first journey to the coast used to sprinkle himself with water from every stream he crossed to give him a safe journey. In the same way, women at the present day going between Zomba and Blantyre sprinkle their babies with water from each stream. [787]

24. An ant-like insect called mbupatumba (bumbutumba, Chin.) [Anoplolepis nuphiatis] is lucky. On seeing it a native pats its belly and then rubs his own, wishing for plenty of food that day. If he is embarking on a journey or beginning some enterprise, he will wrap one of these insects in a fold of his loin cloth and take it with him for luck. [825]

25. When a native hears the mwipe bird call (its call is like the mew of a cat), if he wants something, he immediately says, "Oh mwipe, I want so-and-so. Be quiet and I will then be quiet, too!" If the bird ceases calling, he knows the wish will be granted. The female bird is said to be the more certain prophet.

26. The snake, nahulahuli, which lives in trees and is of a buff clay color with green markings, is said by natives to pierce the chest and tie a knot in itself on each side so that it can only be withdrawn by cutting off one knot. When the snake is thus withdrawn, its blood mixes with that of the man and he will die.

27. Nagiyao have a habit of marking the spot where any event takes place by a stone by the side of the path, and every passer-by will add a stone for luck. In this way some large piles of stones have been made. [777]

28. A man resting on his way home from a long journey places a stone in the fork between the branches of a nearby tree, so that on his arrival he may find his wife has put by some food for him and has not used up the day's stock of flour.

29. A chameleon found digging in the path is said to presage the death of the finder's nearest relative. [787]

3: Stanner D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

771 784 30. If a chameleon is found holding on to the grass at both sides of the path, the path is "closed" and a man will turn back to his home and not proceed on his journey. It would be unlucky to continue.

789 31. Snakes seen in coils are a bad omen.

771 784 32. The slow-worm known as Kimbulu mamapulu ("the cutter open of ant hills"), and the scaly anteater, if seen on the path, are of bad import.

33. To knock the toes against a stone on a journey is bad luck; if blood flows from the big toe, it points to good luck.

34. A man knocking the sole of his foot against a stone knows that some one is speaking ill of him.

35. A person whose hands itch knows he will receive a present.

36. Tremor of the circumorbital muscles of the right eye indicates that something good will be seen. When the left eye is affected, the outcome is less sure.

37. The cry of the bird upulubulu (the green turaco), indicates to the hearer that he is about to meet some one, either friend or enemy.

771 784 625 38. Anyone who kills one of the large stink-insects (Pharamidae) known as chikuse chiwipa, will always be breaking the cooking pots afterwards.

39. The natives believe that the caterpillar of the Hippotion sairis moth will jump at the breast. It is called chiyumbila mumulu, "that which jumps at the breasts," and children seeing it will cover up their nipples with their hands.

40. Of Linda, the Mongoose, there is a saying:

[539]

"Linda pyumbimpwe nikila"
"The banded mongooses relieve each other (at) the meal"

It is said that mongooses assist one another when being hunted. When one is tired, a fresh one runs in so close to the pursuer that he goes after this one and leaves the tired one, and so they keep it up till the pursuer is exhausted.

41. Chinda, the frog. Children are told they must never kill a frog, or its spirit will come at night with porridge made of excrement and make them eat it. If a small child playing with a frog kills it by mischance, he will tear off a small piece of his native cloth and place it by the frog as an offering.

42. Chindindi (Ikongwe, Chin.) the weasel. It is said that the weasel hides its body and leaves exposed its anus, so that a chicken seeing it, goes up to peck at it, whereupon the weasel turns round quickly and catches the chicken with its mouth.

43. Chingwe, the skunk (from Ku-ngwe, to go to stool), so named on account of its odor, is said to apply the anus to a rat-hole and make wind. This will render inaudible all the rats in the burrow and he can then dig them out at leisure.

44. Mbudi, the honey badger, when hunted is always said to attack a man by attempting to seize the testicles. Natives when they hunt this animal, tie stones in their loin cloths so that they hang down between the legs to defeat the badger.

3:Sinanus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

769 A man leaving his village on some expedition and wishing to be assured of safe conduct
484 will procure some millet flour. Going quietly into his house, he squats down in one corner 787 and gently sifts the flour through his hand so that it falls on the floor in the form of a little cone, repeating as he does so, his prayer for safe conduct beginning and ending with the word chonde! please!

[539] "Chonde! chonde! wa-ku-wulanga wulaje nilangaya nuse pangu nilinuse
"Please, please! those at above ancestor clear eye mine that I may see kinda, ngwinke 'chenene kungwiji, chonde! chonde! chenenuke!"
the path, may I arrive well where I go, please, please, please!"

He then covers the cone of flour with a basket. On the morrow, he will uncover it to see what has happened. According as the cone has remained intact or has fallen to one side or the other, the omen indicates whether or not the journey should be undertaken, the reaction being caused by the spirits to whom his supplication was addressed.

769 Again, there may have occurred much sickness in a village and the people conclude that the pest has come to remind them that they have not been attentive to their deceased chief. "His grave-house in the village has been allowed to fall into decay," and so on. They will decide that his spirit must be propitiated. The grave-house is rebuilt, a pot is sunk in the ground, and beer is poured in, and round about heaps of flour are placed. Prayer is made to the chief at whose grave they are worshipping, supplicating him in person and "all others who are with you at Mlungu," asking that he will no longer cause ill to befall the village.

When a village is moved, the beer-pot from the grave of the old chief is taken to the new village and a ceremony similar to that just described takes place, with the prayer that he will come to the new village and continue to exercise his benevolent care over its people.

731 In 1890 when there was a threatened famine on account of long drought in Zombe dis-769 trict, Malenya decided that supplication for rain must be made to the spirits of his illustrious predecessors. Kasunga, one of Malenya's wise men, acted as high priest. A large amount of beer was brewed and the night before the ceremony, twenty sheep and fifty goats were slaughtered. Plates of the meat, of rice and porridge were then placed on the ground round the grave-house of the old Malenya, and pots of beer set into the ground at intervals. At the head of the grave, little heaps of mbepwi flour were arranged. This flour had been prepared by such of Malenya's wives as were not near a menstrual period. The following morning, a fence was built round the grave, outside which all the people collected, while beyond them again was a second fence. Kasunga, accompanied by an assistant then appeared, and amid absolute silence entered the inner enclosure. He addressed to the old Malenya, at whose grave they were all assembled, a prayer for rain. He then repeated the prayer, invoking the aid of all the past line of chiefs down to the reigning Malenya, re-[514] peating their names. Returning to the outer enclosure, he again uttered the prayers, all the assembled multitude repeating them after him while lying face down, resting on their

3:Stanons D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

824 778 be supposed to live in such trees. They are convenient natural objects for them to occupy, in fact practically the only ones to be found in villages. Trees may secondarily, therefore, be looked upon as in some degree sacred. About such trees strings or pieces of calico may be placed as an offering to the spirits of the departed. But the Yao do not erect little huts in their vicinity, hung about with strips of calico as is the custom among the Anyanja.

775 Macdonald[1] mentions the spirits in connection with Sochs and other hills round Blantyre and supposes them to be the spirits of the places themselves. This I think is unlikely; they would probably turn out to be spirits bearing the names of long departed Anyanja chiefs whom the immigrant Amangoche Yao venerated just "to be on the safe side," since they had come and taken the country which long ago belonged to the former tribe. When approaching or passing any spot held to be the dwelling place of spirits, salutation is made by clapping the hands.

Spirits of the departed may enter into animals or may take the form of animals, commonly lions and sometimes large snakes (python), but this belief is not so general among the Yao as among other tribes, in my opinion. An animal which is so possessed is called liapulu, from ku-apulu, "to be transformed."

[174] Apart from this habitation of inanimate objects above mentioned by natives, there is nothing that points to a belief in Animism among the Yao, so far as I know. Neither hills, rocks, streams, lakes, nor trees have their own spirits, nor are they endowed by the native mind with life.

Deceased persons appear to the living in dreams, the native apparently believing that the deceased appears in his material body.

775 787 791 They believe also in revelation of wishes of the deceased through the medium of the living. The spirit of the deceased is supposed to enter into the medium. The medium, I am informed, is always a woman, never a man. From the descriptions of some of these revelation séances, there can be no doubt that they are manifestations of la grande hystérie. The medium works herself up into a frenzy of excitement and in her delirium gives out the name of the deceased, the voice which speaks being that of the spirit within her. She rolls on the ground and froths at the mouth, uttering the word of revelation which is generally to the effect that some deceased chief's spirit is feeling aggrieved at the neglect of his tomb; the voice may go on to say that certain practices are forbidden, or demand that certain rites be observed by the people. The spirits which possess her are generally spoken of as mandu, a word which, though sometimes used as equivalent to mizimu, usually seems to [158] have rather a sinister significance. Insane persons are called mandu and are thought to be possessed by a spirit, and vapor baths with emetics may be practised for their cure. In the case of the death of anyone who is possessed, in answer to my interrogation, I have [161] been told that both the spirit which has entered into the man and his own mizimu leave his body.

[1] Op. cit., vol. I, p. 76.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

●1787

285

285
415

1-6, Dowser's kit; 8-10, Mats; 11-16, Baskets

[End Plate 16]

4: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1909)1910 FT7 Yao FT7
Moravi FR4

Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute, Vol. XL, 1910, Plate XXVII.

M
Y
415
787
534
276
531

1 2 3 4

SOME TRIBES OF BRITISH CENTRAL AFRICA.

[p. 334(B)]

4: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1909) 1910 FT7 Yao FT7
Maravi FRY

M 535

and the feature of it was the introduction of life-size representations of animals made of bamboo and grass with men inside.

I once saw these at a namwali ceremony among the Awisa (q.v.).

12. Nkole.—Woman only present; danced on the occasion of a girl's first menstruation.

13. Litiwa.—Women only, on the occasion of the quickening with first child.

Y 535

14. Njrula.—Men and women, a quick shuffling step while standing in a circle.

15. Sukuas.—The body shaking (shoulders) dance of boys, they walk round in a ring, some fifty of them, the drums in the middle; when the bass drum breaks into a quicker time they all start shaking shoulders and bodies with intervals for two or three steps.

16. Nsenja.—Danced in a circle, men and women alternately.

17. Nkonde.—A big dance with sanji rattles.

18. Chibonda.—Dancing boys dance.

19. Mberuas.—(1907) men and women; each carries a bango reed filled with pebbles—no drums.

20. Mangenji.—A coast dance; palm leaf bags filled with pebbles are tied on the legs.

21. Senja.—A pas-de-deux, each man with a rattle and head-dress; for a few moments they wander round each other picking up the time and tune, and then jump into a very fast step dancing and jumping into the air shaking the rattles.

22. Chimwiniwini.—A pas-seul by a man carrying a viol and bow with anklets of small sticks.

Y M 535

23. Mawes.—Danced no longer. At Mponda's village a big crowd used to dance with skins round the loins and wooden anklets: in their hands they carried live snakes which had been rendered harmless by putting medicine over their holes before digging them out. Four drums as in chindimba were used. The women all fled away.

Description of Plates.

PLATE XXVI.

M 789 778 534 412

1. Iron tube with human hair.
2. Tortoise-shell containing "medicine."
3. Leaf packet of "medicine."
4. Tortoise-shell.
5. Iron knife.
6. Horn containing "medicine."
7. Seed rattle.
8. Bead amulet.
9. Stuffed squirrel skin.

1–9. Contents of the bag of an Ula-man.

PLATE XXVII.

M Y 415 787 534 276 531

1. Gourd vessel, Yao.
2. Gourd rattle, Yao.
3. Divining-gourd.
4. Gourd for casting lots.
5. Malanja.
6. Amachinga.
7. Awisa.

7: Hetherwick M-5 (ca. 1900) 1902 FT7 Yao FT7

774 they said, "was about to take away their shadows and they would die." In their 123 mind the liseku was allied to the chisilili or picture, and the removal of it to the photographic plate would mean the disease or death of the shadeless body.

As an instance of their faith in the close relationship of the liseku and the 123 picture or shadow, I may relate the following incident. An influential Yao chief 753 on Mount Zomba with whom I was on terms of intimate friendship for years, refused to allow himself to be photographed, fearing the consequences on his life.
774 At last I was able to persuade him to give me a sitting, but on the sole condition that the picture was to be shown to none of his subjects but to be sent out of the country as soon as possible. He feared lest some ill-wisher might use it as a means towards his bewitchment. Some months afterwards the chief became seriously ill, and in the minds of his attendants his illness was attributed to some accident having befallen the photographic plate on which they believed the picture of their chief to be imprinted. If that negative had been broken in England, whither it had been sent, their chief's illness would be accounted for. Accordingly they appealed to the divining oracle, who, however, after consulting the "lots," assured them that the picture was intact, and that in consequence the disease must be ascribed to some other cause.

774 The liseku or soul is recognized as the chief agency in dreams. To dream is, in the Yao tongue, kwangamila masoku, where masoku is the plural form of liseku.
787 The liseku is supposed to go out and visit the scenes and persons it dreams about, and in turn is visited by the masoku of others, dead or living. Pains in the body on rising from sleep in the morning are usually attributed to such nocturnal visits,
[753] while disease or pains of a severe type are ascribed to castigations by the whips of the masoku or more frequently of the witches who prowl around during the night watches.

774 Madness, idiocy and the ravings of delirium or disease are accounted for by a similar agency. The sufferers are wa masoku, they of the spirits, and a sudden fit
828 of epilepsy or insanity is described as gakamwili masoku, the spirits have seized him. Such persons are usually regarded with awe, as living in close contact with the unseen, but no incantations or enchantments are ever used to expel the spirit in possession. Some native doctors are credited with a knowledge of certain [755] medicines which they say are effectual in such cases, but their application in no way differs from those employed in treating ordinary types of disease. Idiots and the insane are allowed to wander at will about the village, and only when violent symptoms show themselves as a danger to the community is any physical restraint put upon them.

754 The masoku are also recognized as the inspiring agencies in the ravings of the witch detective. This person, usually a woman, is called in to discover who is the guilty agent in cases of mysterious deaths or outbreak of an epidemic at a village. She arrives on the scene and takes up her abode for a few days previous to her actual demonstration. She mixes with the people, learns all the scandal and gossip of the community, and at night prowls about the houses searching for evidence. On the appointed day she dances, kuyina masoku, to dance the spirits, or kuwwesta, to rave or prophecy, and in the ravings of the dance she calls out the name of some party who is afterwards accused of being the mauci or witch. Followed by a crowd of excited spectators she dances through the village spear in hand, stopping here and there to dig up charms or medicines which the supposed witch has buried in the ground as the instruments of his occult practices. It is only in cases of supposed special difficulty, or when the magnitude of the supposed crimes demands that special measures be adopted for their detection, that the services of such a witch detective are called in. In ordinary cases these appeals are made to the divining oracle who consults his "lota" as a means of discovering crimes of this nature. 754 [787]

7: Hetherwick M-5 (ca.1900) 1902 FT7 Yao FT7

Among the Yaos the human being is believed to be the sole possessor of a liaoka. I have been unable to discover any trace of a theory that the liaoka may pass into any animal or inanimate object and thus confer upon it the nature or power of a fetish. Such belief is cherished among the Angoni and Achowa tribes to the westward by Nyasa and the upper Shire River, and the intelligent Yao is aware of this, but he states that among his people no such belief exists. Even charms which have the effect of healing or warding off disease, or of protecting the wearer from war or wild beasts or other danger by land or water, are supposed to possess this power without any idea of their being possessed by a liaoka or other spirit influence. The nearest approach to such a theory is in the case of certain powerful "doctors" who have obtained special medicine by means of which, at death, they can transform themselves into lions, leopards, crocodiles, etc. Lepers also are sometimes supposed to become hippopotami. But both of these cases must be regarded rather as transmutations of body than transmigrations of soul. 774 [171] [751] 756 775

It will be thus seen that the nature of the human liaoka is closely allied to that of the masoku, which are the inspiring agents in madness and in the ecstasy of prophecy or incantation. What the origin of these inspiring masoku is, or to whom they belonged when in bodily life, the Yao holds no theory. He is content to accept them as they are, masoku ipopo, "Just masoku and nothing more," as he says. 774 828

It is, however, when we follow the disembodied liaoka after death and consider its position and power in the other world that we find ourselves in a region of higher spiritual activities. 775

In dreams or in fainting fits the liaoka leaves the body but only to return to it with the awakening consciousness. At death, however, it leaves its earthly abode never to return. It is now spoken of as having gone to malungu or mlungu. This word, which lies at the basis of all Yao theories of the place of the soul after death, will be dealt with later on as regards its derivation and connections in the Bantu family of languages. In its actual use it bears two significations.

I. The word malungu is in the first instance applied to the human soul or liaoka after death when it is considered as an inhabitant of the spirit world. Even in life a man, when he meets with any piece of good luck, will be heard to say, "It's my malungu," as if his soul had an influence in determining the character of his

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

Native Authority, to the Native Authority, and eventually to the District Commissioner if the case is one which he will countenance. In practice, most cases reach the chief and go no further. Most people accept his decision. Thus the chief has important judicial functions. 692 643

The Chief as his People's Representative

In special situations where the welfare of the chiefdom as a whole has been endangered by an infringement of the mores, the chief may take action. For example, a chief prosecutes a village headman who allows a woman in his village to bear her first child before she has been through the litiwo ceremony. Every woman who becomes pregnant for the first time must undergo this ceremony, during which she is instructed in child welfare and child care. If she bears a child without undergoing the ceremony, she is said to have 'spoilt the country' (ajalwice cilambo), in the sense that she has besmirched its reputation.[1] 643 687 843

Chiefs usually call in magicians 'to smell out' those responsible for keeping back the rain.[2] When the rains fail as they did in 1948–9, their failure is held to be due to the magic of some evilly disposed person. It then becomes the chief's duty to call in a magician to indicate who this person is. The fees for this duty are paid by the chief himself on behalf of his people. 643 787 821

The chief also acts as a representative of his people when they are affected as a whole. For example, Nyambi called in a magician after man-eating lions had taken some of his subjects. This magician called for the hearth-stones and domestic utensils from all the villages in the area, and built them up into a pyramid over which he made some anti-lion medicine. This was to clear the whole chiefdom of man-eating lions. 643 789 731

Nowadays, the chief's representation of his people is seen most clearly in his position in the Administrative framework.[3] The chief represents the Administration to his people since they approach it through him. At the same time the Administration clearly treats him as the representative of his people and consults 643

[1] I was told in Mponda's area that the women undergo this ceremony after the birth of the child, but that it is still obligatory.

[2] Kuiawa ula—lit. 'to tie or bind the rain', in the sense of to make it a prisoner.

[3] I have dealt with this aspect more fully in 'The Political Organization of the Yao of Southern Nyasaland',

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

contents. Here once again the women, though they may have no boys in the initiation ceremony, are called 'the mothers'. The ritual co-operation of the mothers in the initiation ceremonies is paralleled by that of mothers and sons in political affairs: here sons are in charge of the villages, while their mothers and sisters form the nucleus of the localized kinship group, which in turn is the core of the village. 562 601 881

The ritual importance of the mother is nowhere more clearly seen than in the curse. The Yao believe that a mother may curse her child if he or she is disobedient or otherwise beyond control. Not many mothers do curse their children; the threat to curse seems to be more often used. Informants have told me of some mothers who have cursed their children, and the procedure and the wording of the curse have always been very similar. It is usually not applied to young children who could be punished by other means, but to adults and particularly adolescents. Usually the mother lifts her breast and points the nipple upwards saying, 'If you have never sucked from this breast nothing dreadful will happen to you.' The consequences of this are greatly feared. Where I have been told of curses, each time the child has either died suddenly shortly after the curse, or at least it has gone mad. The curse is vaguely supposed to operate through the ancestor spirits, but I could get no clear statement on how this happens.[1] Whatever the cause, however, the symbolic action of lifting the breast and the dire effects which are supposed to follow from this, indicate the importance of the mother in the lineage. 562 861 789 769

The Yao attach this sentiment, in general, not only to the mother, but also to all senior matrilineal female relatives. In general speech all female members of the matrilineage in ascending generations are 'mothers', and all members in the descending generations are 'children'. This fundamental relation of mother and child extends throughout the lineage. The Yao term acinangolo, used for the senior female members of the matrilineage, embodies this idea of 'the mothers'. More specifically, as far as men are concerned, the matrilineage is classified into 562 601

[1] Further evidence that the ancestor spirits are involved in the curse may be that madness is called masoka—spirits—and that it may be said of a madman that the spirits are beating him (gakumputa masoka). A curse may be revoked by blowing water out of the mouth, an act which is also vaguely connected with the ancestor spirits.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

604 627 sister's son. This, however, is not common because matters such as these, the Yao feel, ought to be settled within the matrilineage, or at least among kinsmen. The more usual procedure is for the mother's brother to take his complaint to some senior matrilineal relative who may be a perpetual mother's brother of the mother's brother, as say Cibwana Kawinga is to Cikoja.[1] Or if the matrilineage is part of a village, the mother's brother may take his case to his village headman, who is as likely as not his perpetual father. The senior relatives have the force of authority and public opinion behind them and frequently some agreement can be reached at this level. Where this is not possible, say because the perpetual elder relative lives too far away, the mother's brother may take the sister's son to court and bring the sanction of the Native Authority's punishment upon him. This is very rare.

604 789 There is still a certain mystical sanction behind the mother's brother's control over his junior relatives. This is based on the curse, which in turn draws on the belief in common ancestor spirits. A mother's brother may say to a sister's son or other junior matrilineal relative: 'If you have never sucked from the breast of my sister, nothing dreadful will happen to you.'[2]

604 754 The fear of sorcery is another force which operates to control the wayward activities of a sister's sons. People in senior generations are usually looked upon as having particularly wide knowledge of potent medicines. Though a sister's son may sometimes use sorcery against his mother's brother, the reverse is believed to be more likely to happen. I have recorded elsewhere[3] the details of a case where a sister's son left a village, against his mother's brother's wishes, to find work in town. He subsequently met his death in an accident while trying to get the honey out of a wild bees' hive in a treetop. At home his death was attributed to the sorcery of his mother's brother whose will he had frustrated.

604 578 On the other hand the sister's sons, while bound by an ethical code to honour and respect their mother's brothers, find that in fact these stand in the way of their own personal ambitions. A man's heir is his sister's son and it is quite understandable that there should be some tension between a man and his heir. But

[1] See p. 132. [2] See Chap. VI, p. 135.
[3] 'A Note on the African Conception of Causality', 54–5.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

There has never been any shortage of land and therefore the plotting out of gardens was a matter which caused little trouble. A man wishing to make a new garden the next season simply marked the site in the bush by scoring some trees or hoeing around some patches of grass and tying the grass ends into a knot. If anyone else came along and hoed this plot, the man who had marked it out still claimed it and need not pay for the hoeing done. Whenever a man was doubtful about a piece of land, he would ask advice of the headman of the village. 423

When an abandoned garden had become overgrown, anyone wishing to take it up applied to the headman who sent him to ask the original owners whether they wished to take it up again. The newcomer could take possession only with their permission. 361

Often if a village were moved, during the first season the people simply put up shelters in their gardens. Later, the site of the village was chosen and around it a medicine man sprinkled medicine to insure happiness and prosperity. The tree from which this medicine was made became sacred to the village and might not be used for firewood, or was subject to any other taboo the medicine man might care to make. He might also say, "In this village there shall be no pounding of grain at night," etc. 423 [789] [778]

If a village were to be built near a spot previously inhabited, medicine and offerings were made to the departed spirits of the former occupants to put them at rest and "open" the place to the newcomers. The beer-pot from the grave of some former chief or headman, who was supposed to have directed the destinies of the old village, was brought to the new location and beer placed in it to insure his continued guidance. [769]

In the case of a village into which a number of men had married, the sponsors of the wives went to the sponsors of the husbands and asked permission to move the village.[1] Later, beer was brewed in the new village and the sponsors invited to come and drink and "put foot in the new village." [273]

Relationship. Family relationship among natives presents certain difficulties to the European accustomed to equivalent relationship of males and females on both sides of the family. In the diagram below (Fig. 1) the relationship of the two children (C 5) will be traced. The mother and father (B 10 and 9) are the achikulu and wese but are addressed as amao and atati. The maternal uncles older and younger than the mother (B 11 and 15) are called akwelume and their wives (B 12 and 16) akwegwe. The maternal aunts are addressed as amao, mother, anyone older than the mother being distinguished as amao wakulungwe, "the bigger" (B 13), a younger aunt as amao wanandi, "the lesser" (B 17); their respective husbands are addressed atati, atati wakulungwe (B 14), and atati wanandi (B 18). On the father's side the uncles are called atati wakulungwe (B 1) and atati wanandi (B 5), respectively, for those older and younger than the father, and their wives amao wakulungwe (B 2) and amao wanandi (B 6). The paternal aunts are called atati wakongwe (female uncles) (B 3 and 7), their husbands (B 4 and 8) atati. 593 601

[1] Vide supra, p. 236.

3:Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

Witch-medicine. The making of medicine against people has been shown to occupy an essential place in usawi, and it plays an important part in all occultism. So by insensible grades, the ordinary use of drugs in common diseases is reached, though it is probable that very much greater faith is placed in a packet of burnt roots put under the floor of the house than in the efficacy of any concoction taken by mouth. 754 [757]

There is a general belief that by medicine extra ability verging into supernatural power can be acquired. This power in a general sense is represented by the word ukoma and a man so possessed is spoken of as mundu jua komala. The desire for increased power may be a perfectly natural one, such as a desire for influence and popularity as a chief, or on the other hand, the power of usawi may be aimed at, or again, the knowledge of magic medicine for thieving or for any other practice. Ukoma is, therefore, a relative matter. The necessary medicine or initiation into the understanding of magic can be purchased from persons already practitioners, the honest herbalist merging by imperceptible degrees into the most criminal witch-doctor. A single practitioner may prescribe a charcoal dressing for an ulcer, exorcise an evil spirit by a vapor bath, sell medicine to enable the buyer to win a case at court, arrange medicine on a pathway to act as a selective love potion, or prescribe a drug to change a man into a lion. 756 787 791

Deserving of special mention are the people who thieve by the aid of medicine which they have either purchased or prepared themselves. Such a man is called chitaka and the medicine mala wa chitaka. The active principle of this medicine is said to be prepared from the tail of a hyaena, an animal which is said to be able to enter a house where people are sleeping and kill and carry off the fowls without waking the occupants. The medicine is often carried in a hyaena's tail. The chitaka is supposed to approach the house he would rob and chewing some medicine in the mouth, gently blow towards it to put everyone to sleep. The door is supposed to unfasten itself and the thief is free to take what he wishes. He is even said to kill, cook, and eat food in the house while the inmates remain unconscious. A special characteristic of the chitaka is that whatever he lays his hands on in the house he must remove, though he does not want it, so that in the morning many unwieldy, useless objects may be found outside the hut. 791 789

There are many other magic medicines. One of these, lwanga, if introduced into a village, will cause the illness and death of some inmate. Anyone handling the body of the sick man or the corpse after death, sickens and dies until the whole village is wiped out. There is a man serving a life sentence now at the Central Prison, Zomba, who was convicted of having caused the death of many people in a village in Angoniland. He is said cheerfully to have admitted the power of his medicine. 754

Medicine made from a cousin is supposed to be efficacious in various ways. The blood of a cousin is instilled into the ear for otorrhoea. Drinking the water which has been used by a cousin to wash his face relieves intestinal colic. Medicine is made from the hairs of the beard of a cousin or from an ubile and used for chest trouble. 757 605

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

832 Mpasi is a love potion. Men are often anxious that women should ask them for love (ku-pala). A man seeing a woman whom he fancies, takes up some of the dust where she has trodden and mixing this with medicine puts it in his hair. If he meet her again, though he takes no notice of her, she will come to him.

789 241 [826] When crops are harvested, a layer of the cereal is laid at the bottom of the corn-store, and umba, which consists of medicines contained in the skull of or made from the body of a still-born infant, is then put in and the store filled. In this way, he who has only a small garden may be sure that his grain will last a long time. Similar medicine is put in gardens with the first rains to insure heavy crops. A man on the approach of the planting season should never give away seed to anyone until his own seed is put in or it may bring bad luck to his crop. This is evidently a superstition arising from the fact that if he gives seed away, he may not have enough left to raise a crop sufficient to support his family. Some people are considered "lucky at planting pumpkins, other people when they plant, reap only watery pumpkins." A man, therefore, will often ask one of the lucky people to plant his pumpkins for him. My hospital boy always got the cook to plant his pumpkins.

789 824 A man wishing to become a person of importance, with a village of his own, takes a medicine made from a certain tree and then builds his hut in a new place, hoping people will flock to him. The tree is known as chukambili. Another medicine, taken in the belief that people will flock to a man in consequence, is made from the bush called ntola. Cf. litula planted at the threshold to attract visitors.

789 791 Conjuring. There are other performances akin to magic in the eyes of the natives, which I have never had the opportunity of witnessing but which would appear to be of the nature of juggling or possibly hypnotism; some resemble the tricks of jugglers; others are more like some of the performances in India. I naturally supposed that they had been learned from men at the coast (Zanzibar), but I am assured that they belong to the Yao themselves.

Kambenje, a Yao of Chiradzulu, well-known at dances and Usapo, after some preliminary dancing, stands still and is covered by a cloth; when the cloth is again removed, he is discovered with a number of squealing puppies held in his loin cloth, which he then hands round. He begins to dance again and the persons to whom the puppies have been given watch him and then find they are holding excrement, not puppies. Or mud-fish are handed round and the people find they are holding women's diapers.

Another trick often performed by Kambenje was the burial of a man in the ground, covered up completely with earth; at the sounding of the drums the buried man comes running in from the back of the watching crowd.

Kasonga, a Yao of Malemya's, priest, and medicine man, after an Usapo ceremony used to put on his red blanket and walk over the hot embers of an enormous fire in the village open space. He admitted that he smeared himself with medicine and an eyewitness told me that when he put his feet on the hot logs, it caused a sizzling sound.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT? Yao FT?

Tingulingu was another well-known performer; he used to do the same tricks as Kambenje. He also was possessed of an elastic skin and is said to have been able "to tie his ears together behind the back of his head." 789 791

Mpechetula, a Yao of Mkanda, is a man with considerable renown. He is said to be able to produce a lion at will from a lion's tail and claw. He would offer to show this if there were any brave enough to go through with it. On a moonlight night, he would expose on the ground in a cleared space near a village the tail of a lion held cross-wise in a piece of split bamboo. At the split end of the bamboo, he would place a lion's claw and round this, a woman's belt held in position by three bamboo pegs, around which he would draw a circle of ufuepwi flour. Everyone would then withdraw to a hut in which the seance was to take place. After an hour or so, Mpechetula would send some one out to inspect the lion's tail where probably all would be found intact. He might then pretend to be uninterested and sleepy and suggest that some one should go out again in half an hour. Sooner or later, a man would come back, having found the tail gone; then everyone would go out to see what had happened. The pegs would be found in place but the tail and claw gone. A little way off, the split piece of bamboo would be found and further still a bead or two from the woman's belt. These, Mpechetula would pick up, and leaving a little trail of flour on their way, all returned to the hut, while he whistled as if calling some one. Suddenly they would be aroused by the sound as of a lion brushing against the hut walls, as the beasts are known to do, and next, a loud roar. Mpechetula would immediately open the door half-way so that the people could look out into the moonlight and there, a little way off, would be the lion. It would immediately advance towards the house and then, as it prepared to spring for the door, Mpechetula would offer it some of the flour in his left hand, armed with a stirring-stick, mtiko, in his right hand. As the lion landed, he would strike it on the head with the stick and lo and behold! the lion would vanish and the tail and claw would be found in his hand.

Superstitions. Scattered throughout these notes, particularly under Usuwi and Diavoa, mention is made of practices which show a strong belief in superstition. Below are given a number of minor beliefs, and it is interesting to compare them with many well-known superstitions in other parts of the world. 771 784

1. A child who cuts the upper incisor teeth first will be unlucky. Such children used to be killed by the Yao. (Other tribes make medicine against the threatened ill-luck.) [777]

2. A woman with polydactylism may not take food out of a corn-store. Otherwise the stock of corn will not last long. (Rudimentary sixth fingers are not uncommon.) [732]

3. An insect called chiperu nusi which lives in the mud at the bottom of pools, if killed causes the water to dry up. [823]

4. If a boy puts a water-spider in the armpit when learning to swim, he will learn quickly.

5. A man wishing to prevent rain falling on a day he is making a journey, will wrap some of the leaves of the mtowowi tree in his loin cloth and go without drinking. [824]

3:Stanous D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

As an example of another kind of intermediary may be mentioned a woman called Binibi Chikanowa, who, though an Anyanja, was well known among the Yao of Zomba. She was consulted on many occasions about the future, about rain, or the prevention of disease. She was a woman of quiet ways and greatly respected; she had no fixed abode but was received everywhere and given food and shelter. She would sometimes disappear from the district and travel to far distant places. A son, born to her when a young woman, was lately a patient under my care, a man of about forty-eight. On one occasion she was consulted about an epidemic of ulcers among the people near Zomba. She asked all the people from the villages to go down to Lake Shirwa and to take a white fowl with them. When they had all collected, she appeared, carrying in each hand a little gourd containing ulupuwi flour, and a small open basket on her head. She took the fowl in one hand and then proceeded to walk into the water, saying she would have to go to a little hill on an island in the lake called Chidia Mpiri and that she would come back in three days. She then walked on into the water and disappeared below its surface. In three days time, she returned to the village and said that the women must give up dancing the chipunda dance for twelve months and all would be well.

On other occasions she usually worked along similar lines. Consulted as to whether or not some sick person would recover, she always answered with the same formula, if she thought he would die, "The house is prepared for him and medicine would avail nothing!"

There are certain other supernatural persons or spirits to which reference must be made. Chimalo-mazi has been mentioned above. Mamuna, a word which Hetherwick translates as "madness, idiocy,"[1] really refers to the delusions and hallucinations which form part of the perceptions of the insane. The word also has the meaning of obsession, phobia, and intuition; thus the natives say of an ox about to be slaughtered that shows signs of realizing the approaching evil, "it has mamuna." On the other hand, they say the hartebeest is a foolish animal that does not know what to do when hunted: "it has mamuna, it is a deluded animal." Again, the baboon and the crow "have mamuna"; they are possessed of senses or faculties which warn them of the approach of any enemies before they can be seen or heard; they cannot be stalked. In all these cases, the crowd of hallucinatory men pursuing were melancholic, the rats of the delirium tremens patient, and that which appears to warn the crow or the baboon, are all mamuna and are, I think, supposed by the natives to have some kind of materialistic form.

Ndodoka: when the wamori[2] do not wish immediately to devour the body of a deceased person which they have raised from the grave, they cut off the arms and legs at the elbows and knees and insert medicine into the stumps; these living-dead are then compelled by the wamori to live in caves and hollow ant hills during the day and to follow them at night in their travels, "like a herd of goats," to be eaten as required. The ndodoka may be heard as they wander along in the night, making sounds like a cat's mew. A woman will never leave any food outside at night, not even the chaff from the grain she has been pounding, lest these most miserable of beings be attracted by it.

[1] Yao language, op. cit., p. [illegible]. [2] Vide supra, p. [illegible].

3: Sumnner D-5 (on. 1912) 1922 FT7 Tao FT7

Chinsu is a word common to several tribes and among them appears to have various shades of meaning. Among the Wayao, the Jinsu are "the little people" of the leprechaun order. They rob the gardens and come out among the pumpkins; their little footprints can be seen where they have passed hither and thither; fruits and vegetables that they touch will become bitter. To prevent these disasters, the Yao, at the time when their crops are ripening, place different kinds of vegetables at cross-roads, hoping thereby to satisfy the Jinsu and prevent them coming into the gardens. As far as I am aware, the Jinsu have nothing to do with fundas and are in no way connected with M'ungu, to be mentioned below, as Macdonald believed.[1] The chinsu is variously said to be "like a man but rather like an animal." He has two legs but goes on all fours.

The Yao describe another legendary race of "little people" who used to live in this country and who may still be met with, — "who knows?" They were of a very small stature, grew long beards, were very tawny, quarrelsome, and fierce, and carried spears. When anybody met one, he was immediately asked: "M'wambonde kungi?", "From how far did you see me?" and it was always well to pretend to have seen the little man coming a long way off and make him believe he was considered quite a big person; if you said "Hallo, I have only just spotted you!", he would immediately spear you. They are commonly supposed to dwell on the tops of high mountains and are iron workers. They are called the M'wambonde kungi.

There is no relation so far as I know between these two classes of "little people," but I think these stories go to uphold the theory recently enunciated by Hastings Guilford in his Huntarian Lecture (1916) that folk-lore fables of lobgobbins, etc., have a basis in fact. He believes that dwarf races at one time were to be found, possibly over a very wide area of the globe. In this country, I think it may be that one sees the transition from historical facts to true fairy stories.

The Anyanja have the same legend about these "little people," the mwandi mwaloni ("where-did-you-see-me"); it is indeed not only widely spread throughout this country, (the Ahenga and Ankonde in North Nyasa district speak of the mwandimwaende who ask the same question), but there is a very similar legend among the Akikuyu in British East Africa.[2]

The chinsu is doubtless the chinsui of the Anyanja, mentioned in Scott's dictionary,[3] as Miss Werner[4] has supposed, for one finds that among the Anyanja at the southern end of the Protectorate, the chinsu is described as having only one side to his body so that he is invisible when viewed from the off side, thus resembling the chinsu who has one half of his body made of wax.

[1] Op. cit., vol. I, p. 75. [2] M. W. H. Beech, 'Pre-Bantu occupants of East Africa,' (Man, London, 1916, p. 40-41).
[3] Op. cit., p. 87. [4] British Central Africa, op. cit., p. 38.

3: Stanton D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Tao FT7

857 same time so that the bean is contained in one hand; the other player has to guess in which 524 the bean lies and this he does by striking with the finger the hand in which he imagines the bean to be. If the striker guesses correctly, he moves his man and his slave to the first sleeping-place. It is then his turn to hide the bean. So it goes on till one or the other arrives at the slave-market. Here he bartters his slave for trade-goods and returns in the same way; whoever gets home first wins, and the loser is said "to have died on the road," a not uncommon event in the old days. It is interesting to note that cheating is sometimes attempted by palming beans between the fingers, so that in the hand guessed, the bean is palmed between the fingers, and, in the other hand, a bean is released from between the fingers into the palm.

[788]

526 Njanga (native, Chin.): a kind of ninepins, which takes its name from the object which is thrown to knock down the ninepins. The game is played by youths and men, equal numbers sitting in two parallel rows fronting each other on the ground, the two rows composed of a dozen or more persons, a few yards apart. Each person has set up in front of him on the ground a maize cob from which the grain has been stripped, or each may have a number of them, perhaps six. In the former case, the cobs are perhaps two feet apart, in the latter only a few inches. Each player is provided with several njanga, from six to twenty-four in number. The njanga is a piece from the side of a gourd, slightly concave-convex and circular in plan, with the edge often cut into serrations. A piece of reed is fixed through a hole in the centre, projecting an inch or an inch and a half from the convex surface, thus forming a kind of tentorium, two or three inches in diameter (Pl. XXII, fig. 9). It is held between the thumb and second finger by the foot-piece; by a sharp movement of the fingers, it can be spun out of the hand and, at the same time, jerked forward by another sharp movement at the wrist. At a given signal, the players on both sides start launching forth their little tops which spin away towards the maize cobs of the opposing side, the object being to knock them down. When there are many on a side, each with a number of cobs, many fall with the first onslaught, but as fewer and fewer remain, it becomes more difficult, and players try to show their skill by aiming at the cobs farthest away from them, along the opposite line. The game goes on till only one cob is left standing; then, if a player of the opposite side knocks it down, he puts one of his own up again, and the side which had the one remaining puts one up, and so the game may go on. When they are tired of playing, they say, "Kwitula tonsuge," "We must finish the game," literally "Come on, we must smell."[1] A knife is then stuck in the ground on either side, the blade pointing to the opposite side, and each man, when he has hit the knife of the opposing side with his njanga, is considered to have shown his skill, and goes off. The last man remaining is laughed at as being a fool at the game. If a headman is playing, he makes sure of having his try first, so that he will not be left in to the last. The game has a great fascination for the natives and it is said of Malenya, the uncle of the present chief (1913), that he was

[1] Vide supra, p. 347.

4: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1909)1910 FT7 Yao FT7
Marav; FR4
Ngoni FR5
Bemba FR5

M 301 Necklaces, most commonly for children, are made of a number of little square pieces of hippo ivory strung together, ornamented with geometrical designs.

M 789 Medicine is often carried in a little packet suspended round the neck, as also charms of various kinds. The medicine may be some powdered charred roots or little twigs, leaves, etc., of some tree; these are sometimes now wrapped up in a Y [789] piece of paper on which is written some extract from the Koran (among Mohammedan Yao); this is then sewn in a little piece of calico and adorned with beads and suspended round the neck with a string.

Charms take various forms. Small pieces of wood or, to guard against attack M 301 by lion, teeth are worn. Armlets of the same kind are worn against sickness, and others are worn by Angoni, made of beads to which knives are attached. Bracelets of ivory, plaited grass and elephant tail hairs are also worn.

N 301 Metal and wirework bracelets are commonly worn by Angoni, also twisted wire finger rings and rings of lead and ivory. Heavy brass ankle rings and spiral brass leg and arm rings 6 inches and 8 inches wide are worn by some of the women (Atonga).

B 301 Bracelets cut from the nail of the elephant's foot are worn by Awanda hunters, and little finger rings cut from the scale of the ant-eater are worn as medicine against fever by headmen.

Belts made of wound copper wire are worn round the waists by Wankonde.

M 302 The use of pigments applied to the body is very limited. I have seen stripes of those, white and red, on the faces of young women, boys and dancers, generally M [439] after some ceremony. The significance I do not know. Pigments are now obtained from Indian traders, and I do not know how old the custom is. There is no beautification of face, body, nails, and eyes by pigments. The only application made to the skin is castor and ground-nut oils to keep it soft—no scents are used.

CLOTHING.

M Y N Among tribes of Nyasaland the amount of clothing worn varies very considerably from nothing to European garments.

291 Of the large majority, however, including Mafanja people, Yao and Angoni, one [855] may speak generally.

The young children commonly run about naked, or have a strip of cloth covering the pudenda, supported by a string round the waist.

M Y N Among the adult population the amount of clothing depends largely on the [556] affluence of the individual, and those who cannot afford much have little clothing. A man wears a strip of calico supported in front and behind by a string round the waist, a woman a piece of calico 18 inches wide reaching from the middle of the thighs to the umbilicus.

Of the more prosperous, the men wear calico from a little below the knee to the waist, carefully wrapped round the body, and kept in position by some kind of belt; sometimes it is folded across the upper part of the chest or sometimes crossed over in front and two ends tied behind the neck.

3: Stanner D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 F77 Tao F77

[281] The chief, having appointed a day on which the ceremonies shall begin, sends a messenger with a fowl to a medicine-man whom he asks to conduct the ceremonies. The medicine-man is called n'wishile "he of the tails." He carries his medicines stuffed in the tail-skin of a gnu or sable and we shall see that his tail or tails play a very important part. Having sent word back to the chief of his acceptance of the invitation, he gets his wife to prepare some fresh castor-oil with which he will remake his medicines, and sends out the boys of the village to collect firewood. A big bonfire is made and dancing goes on all that night in his village. Early next morning he returns to the door of his hut where his wife hands him his "tails." He then immediately departs for the village of the chief. His wife trills with her tongue, this being the sign of his departure, and dancing men, some friend (often his brother) who acts as his chief assistant, his wife, and others will go with him.

[534] He signals his approach to the chief's village by singing:

"Ee mwe'he nyeine, nyeine'ne! Tingwishe!"
"You at the village! I don't be long!"

As he enters the village, all the women hail his arrival by trilling the tongue (lu-lulula). He goes straight to the open space in front of the chief's house where the chief meets him. The chief immediately goes into his house and producing a cloth, gives it to the n'wishile who then places his "tail" on the ground, (ndubile, "things put down"); these are the signs of the compact. A house is given to the n'wishile wherein he may rest and sleep.

That night, all the mothers of the boys who are to undergo their initiation, now called wali (sing. wuali), pound flour for the morrow. Early the next morning, the n'wishile visits the place where the pounding is going on and collects a little flour from each woman's basket into a small basket he himself carries.

The chief then gives him a cock and a hen, an ass and a bow; with these he goes off accompanied by the fathers of the wali to the spot where Lepunda will be made. Arrived there, he first points out the spot where his own hut is to be erected. This is quickly built, followed by the shelters for the wali.

The cock and hen are then killed and cooked, also some porridge; the entire fowl is cooked; the liver is not cooked separately. When it is ready, the n'wishile takes a piece of the liver from the pot and some porridge from the other pot together in one hand and then throws them into a little hole where his "tail" has been resting. At this spot, Lepunda is made. The n'wishile then partakes of both again and eats; after he has finished, the other men eat.

[535] After the building of the shelters is finished, fire-wood is collected. On the roofs of the grass shelters figures of animals in grass may be strung up on posts, but they have no definite significance.

In the meantime in the village, the chief has had ukuyani (ceremonial flour) prepared. It is made from millet by his head wife, who must not be near a menstrual period.

3: Stanner D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

as to procuring medicine for him from a medicine-man. If the casting-of-lots is suspicious that some one has caused the illness, he will at the same time add, "Let us and so pray," mentioning the name of the man whom he suspects. Following the advice given, the medicine-man is consulted. He promises to get medicine for the sick man and goes into the forest to search for it. Having returned, he prepares his decoctions and having first partaken of a little himself, he gives it to his patient with further instructions. The friends of the sick man having returned to the village, indirectly ask the man on whom suspicion has been cast to pray for the sick man saying, "He is covered by some spirit." The man prays, sometimes using nkyowi and beginning chonde! chonde! "please! please!" and goes on to ask Mlungu to take away the spirit which has covered the sick man, adding that he himself is innocent of any ill doing against the man and that any grudge he may have had against him is now forgotten.

If the sick man recovers, well and good, but should he die, there is more to be done. The morning following the burial, the relatives go to the chief and in answer to his inquiry of what they are going to do, they say they must again consult the casting-of-lots. They will choose some one who lives a long way off and is not suspicious of the death of their relative: those who go to him have not been shaved after the funeral. Much the same business is gone through as on the first occasion but, in the end, the casting-of-lots is told that they suspect some one unknown to have brought about the death of their relative. The names of all the possible persons are given, the lots cast in each case and, eventually, one is picked out as the guilty man; the casting-of-lots saying, "If I am not telling the truth, you can test my words by giving mwai (ordeal poison) to a fowl; if it does not die, come back and break up all my properties."

He may have gained information from his lots that the suspect is a man of power gained by some special rite, e.g. the midnight bath on the ant hill, in which case he will insist that the fowl poison-ordeal must take place on an ant hill or he will give other specific instructions. On the way back, the relatives will buy two fowls; mwai will be prepared by a boy who has not passed through his initiation ceremonies, and two of the party will be chosen as pleaders, one for the demand, the other for the accused. One fowl is then selected to represent the accused and the poison administered according to the conditions laid down by the lot-thrower, while the two pleaders give injunctions to it, one saying, "You are guilty; you shall die"; the other, "You are innocent and you shall show your innocence by vomiting the poison and recovering." If the fowl dies, a third man cuts off its head, saying, "I am the bearer of the dead." Mwai is then administered to the second fowl to ascertain whether any other persons are involved. The head of the first fowl is singed, stuck on a stick and carried back with the party towards their village. A little way outside, they halt in the bush, and send word to the headman that they are returning. He then comes out privately to see them, asking what has happened, and is told all the events in sequence.

3:Stanna D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Tao FT7

village had its regular place of torture and mwai drinking, two or three miles from the village. Those used by Malemya, the old Zomba chief, may still be seen. 754

A clear way is made two feet broad and fourteen feet long in the bush and here the accused takes up his position attended on either side by the two pleaders, the defending pleader on the right, the prosecuting on the left. Facing east or west or following the directions originally given by the master-of-lots, that is, taking up the position in which the accused is supposed to take a midnight bath, or practise some rite under a tree or an ant hill, etc., he is given a decoction of mwai to drink from a gourd. This decoction is made on the spot, the bark being pounded up on a stone by one of the prosecutors. The accused must have had no food that day. He then starts to walk up and down the short cleared path with the two men, one on either side of him, the one saying, "Now you have drunk mwai, you shall die as you deserve; you did in fo-and-fo," the other denying the accusations, saying, "He shall vomit the poison." He is watched by the assembled crowd who note the various symptoms of which vomiting is the first and said to be the most characteristic. After this has gone on for some time, they watch for what is called the sponge which is said to be "a ball of bile formed in the mouth and expelled by vomiting so that it bursts on reaching the ground but not before", followed often by a second ball, twenty minutes later. Should this be expelled, recovery may be expected, foreshadowed by clearing of the vision. If he recovers, he is indeed a wonderful man and is hailed on all sides. The women trill with their tongues and shout, and he is carried back in triumph; the defending pleader will swagger about and demand anything he wants for his client. 695

A fatal termination is characterized by little and non-forcible vomiting. Purging is common but said to be painless. Vision is affected and as time goes on, the spectators ask what he can see, "Do you see that over there?" indicating a hill. If he makes mistakes, then they say, "Ah, he is going to die!"

The poison may not take full effect for three or four hours. The end is ushered in by a last stage when the legs become weak; he staggers, then unable to stand any longer, falls to the ground dead, encircled by the onlookers who rush in and hurl stones upon the body, crushing it. The relatives take the mangled corpse and lay it on logs covered with grass in the bush. No other covering is permitted. It may be placed in a tree by people acting as scouts. Burial is forbidden. 741

In some cases mwai used to be burned, not being given the chance of the poison trial. This took place at a recognized spot like where. The last man to be burned by Malemya was Mtulula in 1892. Burning was also a punishment in some bad cases of murder. Such was the fate of Chingale. The man was put in a stave-stick, a pile of logs was built round him and then set on fire. 63

White-doctor. In addition to ordeal poison, another method of discovering a mwai is by "smelling out." If a number of people have died in a certain village, the inhabitants may begin to think that there is a mwai among them, and procure the services of a mbindile. 754 695 741

3:Stanton D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

784
695
791

Mbinsile is a Chinyanja word from ku-bisa, "to hide," referring to his custom of hiding in the village; the practice is originally Mang'anja, since adopted by the Yao. Mbinsile is often a woman and may be young.[1] She comes to stay in the village unknown to the people, lives in a watch house in the gardens and is said to go about at night when she is able to summon wumi persons from their houses. The fee for her services is paid beforehand. Later, the villagers are assembled and going round the company holding out flour in her hand, she calls upon Ilo-and-Ilo as the guilty man saying, "This is his 'night-name.'" The villagers all answer, "There is no one of that name in the village." She then goes round again and throwing the flour over the accused, utters his ordinary name and runs off into the bush, not to appear again. The accused may then offer to take wumi (ordeal poison) to prove his innocence or if it is a case of illness only and not death, he may be treated by a medicine man, the process being called ku-lopolola, "to take evil things out of."

A wumi man is sometimes said to renounce his old practices and may then be received into the company of mbinsile. A famous mbinsile near Zomba affirms that he used to be wumi. The mode of action of mbinsile varies greatly with different men; for some the ceremony is quite a minor matter; in other cases, it is an important affair.

Witch-destroyer. Where death is suspected to have resulted from wumi, steps may be taken immediately to catch and kill the wumi. For this purpose, the help of the wundu jwanketete is sought. Ku-mketela means "to break off the end of a stick"; it appears to be both a Chinyanja and a Chiyao word. The word refers to the practice of the professional witch-killer who is supposed to run a stick through the anus up the bowel of his victim and then break it off, leaving part inside. The jwanketete having been informed of the approaching funeral hides in the bush near the graveyard and watches the interment. After everyone has gone, he is free to put in operation that for which he has been called. The following wundu ugwundi is related of a celebrated wundu jwanketete called Angoni of Zomba. The water in which the corpse had been first washed was obtained and put in an earthenware dish. He also provided himself with a gourd containing medicines and some stones, and another gourd filled with poison made from crocodile gall to anoint the mketela sticks. He also had a small antelope's horn containing medicine which when smeared on the head rendered him invisible, together with the stalks of a species of millet called mbulwe which shoots its grains at a touch, and a whistle made from the horn of a small antelope, the ulili.

So provided, he proceeded to the grave, around which he drew a ring with medicine contained in still another horn. Within this circle, all was safe. This was followed by a square immediately around the grave with a stone from the gourd placed at each side, north, south, east and west. The plate of water was placed on top of the grave. The wundu jwanketete then anointed himself with the medicine which made him invisible to the wumi

[1] Cf. Scott, op. cit., p. 388.

3: Stanman D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

and sitting within the circle, he blew his whistle which was irresistible to the nsusi man who was then induced to come out of his house. When he had reached the grave, the water was sprinkled over him by the jusekisela with the millet stalk from the dish on the grave, or he was struck with the gnu's tail; in either case, he fell to the ground senseless. He was then ready to be dealt with. The sekisela sticks, small bamboos filled with crocodile poison, were pushed up the anus and broken off to liberate the poison. Sticks might also be inserted behind the ear or in various other spots. The nsusi was then beaten to wake him up; he ran off to his own village and there, a little later, he sickened and died, telling no one the cause. After death, the ansilo when preparing the corpse of the hitherto unsuspected nsusi, might find the end of the stick projecting from the anus or see the punctures elsewhere with the medicine adhering to them, and the man was revealed in his true colors. 754 695 791

At Mtwiche's village, there was a man called Liunga who professed to be able to extract the poison injected by the jusekisela by causing his patients to undergo a vapor bath and to drink certain decoctions. This man would never reveal the name of anyone who came to him for treatment but would brag that "trade was brisk." The symptoms of the mortal malady caused by the sekisela are said to be intestinal obstruction with tremendous distention of the abdomen (peritonitis). [184]

Of this same village, a story is told which, if not true, at all events illustrates the sort of thing that is believed. As has been mentioned above, whenever the jusekisela blows his little horn, any nsusi will hear it and thinking it is one of their band calling, will go to meet him. A woman of this village told how she and her husband were sitting over the fire while the evening meal was cooking, when he suddenly jumped up and said he must go outside for a bit. She remonstrated and asked him to wait for his food, but he hurried off. Later he returned, complaining of feeling very ill; his belly swelled up and he died soon after. It was said that this man was very friendly with a woman named Abibi and that when he went out into the bush, he was heard calling in a low voice, "Is that you, Abibi?" When his body was examined, two punctures were found on the left side of the chest. It was supposed that it was Abibi he expected to meet and with her enjoy a cannibalistic repast, whereas it was a jusekisela who had called and killed him.

This brief outline of a case of sickness, suspicion of witchcraft, death, and the consultation with the easter-of-lots, the witch-finder, ordeal poison, death, and the catching of the cannibal witch, has been given as a more or less consecutive story in order that it may be most easily understood. Some further details concerning the lot-easter, witchcraft, etc., must be added.

Lot-casting. Medicine men who cast lots were at one time fairly plentiful and were consulted on many matters, often of small importance from a European point of view. Chief of all were questions of witchcraft. The modus operandi varied in different cases. In nsusi and other important matters, the medicine man always used the ukisanga (divining in- 787

3:Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

Witch-medicine. The making of medicine against people has been shown to occupy an essential place in usuwi, and it plays an important part in all occultism. So by insensible grades, the ordinary use of drugs in common diseases is reached, though it is probable that very much greater faith is placed in a packet of burnt roots put under the floor of the house than in the efficacy of any concoction taken by mouth. 754 [757]

There is a general belief that by medicine extra ability verging into supernatural power can be acquired. This power in a general sense is represented by the word ukoma and a man so possessed is spoken of as wundu jwa kowala. The desire for increased power may be a perfectly natural one, such as a desire for influence and popularity as a chief, or on the other hand, the power of usuwi may be aimed at, or again, the knowledge of magic medicine for thieving or for any other practice. Ukoma is, therefore, a relative matter. The necessary medicine or initiation into the understanding of magic can be purchased from persons already practitioners, the honest herbalist merging by imperceptible degrees into the most criminal witch-doctor. A single practitioner may prescribe a charcoal dressing for an ulcer, exorcise an evil spirit by a vapor bath, sell medicine to enable the buyer to win a case at court, arrange medicine on a pathway to act as a selective love potion, or prescribe a drug to change a man into a lion. 756 787 791

Deserving of special mention are the people who thieve by the aid of medicine which they have either purchased or prepared themselves. Such a man is called chitaka and the medicine wala we chitaka. The active principle of this medicine is said to be prepared from the tail of a hyaena, an animal which is said to be able to enter a house where people are sleeping and kill and carry off the fowls without waking the occupants. The medicine is often carried in a hyaena's tail. The chitaka is supposed to approach the house he would rob and chewing some medicine in the mouth, gently blow towards it to put everyone to sleep. The door is supposed to unfasten itself and the thief is free to take what he wishes. He is even said to kill, cook, and eat food in the house while the inmates remain unconscious. A special characteristic of the chitaka is that whatever he lays his hands on in the house he must remove, though he does not want it, so that in the morning many unwieldy, useless objects may be found outside the hut. 791 789

There are many other magic medicines. One of these, lwanga, if introduced into a village, will cause the illness and death of some inmate. Anyone handling the body of the sick man or the corpse after death, sickens and dies until the whole village is wiped out. There is a man serving a life sentence now at the Central Prison, Zomba, who was convicted of having caused the death of many people in a village in Angoniland. He is said cheerfully to have admitted the power of his medicine. 754

Medicine made from a cousin is supposed to be efficacious in various ways. The blood of a cousin is instilled into the ear for otorrhoea. Drinking the water which has been used by a cousin to wash his face relieves intestinal colic. Medicine is made from the hairs of the beard of a cousin or from an ubile and used for chest trouble. 757 605

3:Stanzus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

832 Mpasi is a love potion. Men are often anxious that women should ask them for love (ku-pala). A man seeing a woman whom he fancies, takes up some of the dust where she has trodden and mixing this with medicine puts it in his hair. If he meet her again, though he takes no notice of her, she will come to him.

789 When crops are harvested, a layer of the cereal is laid at the bottom of the corn-store, 241 and usala, which consists of medicines contained in the skull of or made from the body of [826] a still-born infant, is then put in and the store filled. In this way, he who has only a small garden may be sure that his grain will last a long time. Similar medicine is put in gardens with the first rains to insure heavy crops. A man on the approach of the planting season should never give away seed to anyone until his own seed is put in or it may bring bad luck to his crop. This is evidently a superstition arising from the fact that if he gives seed away, he may not have enough left to raise a crop sufficient to support his family. Some people are considered "lucky at planting pumpkins, other people when they plant, reap only watery pumpkins." A man, therefore, will often ask one of the lucky people to plant his pumpkins for him. My hospital boy always got the cook to plant his pumpkins.

789 A man wishing to become a person of importance, with a village of his own, takes a
824 medicine made from a certain tree and then builds his hut in a new place, hoping people will flock to him. The tree is known as ekukambili. Another medicine, taken in the belief that people will flock to a man in consequence, is made from the bush called mola. Cf. litula planted at the threshold to attract visitors.

789 Conjuring. There are other performances akin to magic in the eyes of the natives,
791 which I have never had the opportunity of witnessing but which would appear to be of the nature of juggling or possibly hypnotism; some resemble the tricks of jugglers; others are more like some of the performances in India. I naturally supposed that they had been learned from men at the coast (Zanzibar), but I am assured that they belong to the Yao themselves.

Kambenje, a Yao of Chiradzulu, well-known at dances and Unyago, after some preliminary dancing, stands still and is covered by a cloth; when the cloth is again removed, he is discovered with a number of squealing puppies held in his loin cloth, which he then hands round. He begins to dance again and the persons to whom the puppies have been given watch him and then find they are holding excrement, not puppies. Or mud-fish are handed round and the people find they are holding women's diapers.

Another trick often performed by Kambenje was the burial of a man in the ground, covered up completely with earth; at the sounding of the drums the buried man comes running in from the back of the watching crowd.

Kasonga, a Yao of Malimya's, priest, and medicine man, after an Unyago ceremony used to put on his red blanket and walk over the hot embers of an enormous fire in the village open space. He admitted that he smeared himself with medicine and an eyewitness told me that when he put his feet on the hot logs, it caused a sizzling sound.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

Tingulingu was another well-known performer; he used to do the same tricks as Kambenje. He also was possessed of an elastic skin and is said to have been able "to tie his ears together behind the back of his head." 789 791

Mpechetula, a Yao of Mkanda, is a man with considerable renown. He is said to be able to produce a lion at will from a lion's tail and claw. He would offer to show this if there were any brave enough to go through with it. On a moonlight night, he would expose on the ground in a cleared space near a village the tail of a lion held cross-wise in a piece of split bamboo. At the split end of the bamboo, he would place a lion's claw and round this, a woman's belt held in position by three bamboo pegs, around which he would draw a circle of mbepesi flour. Everyone would then withdraw to a hut in which the seance was to take place. After an hour or so, Mpechetula would send some one out to inspect the lion's tail where probably all would be found intact. He might then pretend to be uninterested and sleepy and suggest that some one should go out again in half an hour. Sooner or later, a man would come back, having found the tail gone; then everyone would go out to see what had happened. The pegs would be found in place but the tail and claw gone. A little way off, the split piece of bamboo would be found and further still a bead or two from the woman's belt. These, Mpechetula would pick up, and leaving a little trail of flour on their way, all returned to the hut, while he whistled as if calling some one. Suddenly they would be aroused by the sound as of a lion brushing against the hut walls, as the beasts are known to do, and next, a loud roar. Mpechetula would immediately open the door half-way so that the people could look out into the moonlight and there, a little way off, would be the lion. It would immediately advance towards the house and then, as it prepared to spring for the door, Mpechetula would offer it some of the flour in his left hand, armed with a stirring-stick, mako, in his right hand. As the lion landed, he would strike it on the head with the stick and lo and behold! the lion would vanish and the tail and claw would be found in his hand.

Superstitions. Scattered throughout these notes, particularly under Usewi and Disease, mention is made of practices which show a strong belief in superstition. Below are given a number of minor beliefs, and it is interesting to compare them with many well-known superstitions in other parts of the world. 771 784

1. A child who cuts the upper incisor teeth first will be unlucky. Such children used to be killed by the Yao. (Other tribes make medicine against the threatened ill-luck.) [777]

2. A woman with polydactylism may not take food out of a corn-store. Otherwise the stock of corn will not last long. (Rudimentary sixth fingers are not uncommon.) [732]

3. An insect called chiqwa. mesi which lives in the mud at the bottom of pools, if killed causes the water to dry up. [823]

4. If a boy puts a water-spider in the armpit when learning to swim, he will learn quickly.

5. A man wishing to prevent rain falling on a day he is making a journey, will wrap some of the leaves of the mimosi tree in his loin cloth and go without drinking. [824]

824 778 be supposed to live in such trees. They are convenient natural objects for them to occupy, in fact practically the only ones to be found in villages. Trees may secondarily, therefore, be looked upon as in some degree sacred. About such trees strings or pieces of calico may be placed as an offering to the spirits of the departed. But the Yao do not erect little huts in their vicinity, hung about with strips of calico as is the custom among the Anyanja.

775 Macdonald[1] mentions the spirits in connection with Soche and other hills round Blantyre and supposes them to be the spirits of the places themselves. This I think is unlikely; they would probably turn out to be spirits bearing the names of long departed Anyanja chiefs whom the immigrant Amangoche Yao venerated just "to be on the safe side," since they had come and taken the country which long ago belonged to the former tribe. When approaching or passing any spot held to be the dwelling place of spirits, salutation is made by clapping the hands.

Spirits of the departed may enter into animals or may take the form of animals, [825] commonly lions and sometimes large snakes (python), but this belief is not so general among the Yao as among other tribes, in my opinion. An animal which is so possessed is called liyuke, from lu-yuke, "to be transformed."

[774] Apart from this habitation of inanimate objects above mentioned by maimu, there is nothing that points to a belief in Animism among the Yao, so far as I know. Neither hills, rocks, streams, lakes, nor trees have their own spirits, nor are they endowed by the native mind with life.

Deceased persons appear to the living in dreams, the native apparently believing that the deceased appears in his material body.

775 787 791 They believe also in revelation of wishes of the deceased through the medium of the living. The spirit of the deceased is supposed to enter into the medium. The medium, I am informed, is always a woman, never a man. From the descriptions of some of these revelation séances, there can be no doubt that they are manifestations of la grande hystérie. The medium works herself up into a frenzy of excitement and in her delirium gives out the name of the deceased, the voice which speaks being that of the spirit within her. She rolls on the ground and foams at the mouth, uttering the word of revelation which is generally to the effect that some deceased chief's spirit is feeling aggrieved at the neglect of his tomb; the voice may go on to say that certain practices are forbidden, or demand that certain rites be observed by the people. The spirits which possess her are generally spoken of as masoko, a word which, though sometimes used as equivalent to maimu, usually seems to [158] have rather a sinister significance. Insane persons are called masoko and are thought to be possessed by a spirit, and vapor baths with eucalyptus may be practiced for their cure. In the case of the death of anyone who is possessed, in answer to my interrogation, I have [761] been told that both the spirit which has entered into the man and his own maimu leave his body.

[1] Op. cit., vol. I, p. 76.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

As an example of another kind of intermediary may be mentioned a woman called Bimbi Chikasowa, who, though an Anyanja, was well known among the Yao of Zomba. She was consulted on many occasions about the future, about rain, or the prevention of disease. She was a woman of quiet ways and greatly respected; she had no fixed abode but was received everywhere and given food and shelter. She would sometimes disappear from the district and travel to far distant places. A son, born to her when a young woman, was lately a patient under my care, a man of about forty-eight. On one occasion she was consulted about an epidemic of ulcers among the people near Zomba. She asked all the people from the villages to go down to Lake Shirwa and to take a white fowl with them. When they had all collected, she appeared, carrying in each hand a little gourd containing mbepesi flour, and a small open basket on her head. She took the fowl in one hand and then proceeded to walk into the water, saying she would have to go to a little hill on an island in the lake called Chidia Mpiri and that she would come back in three days. She then walked on into the water and disappeared below its surface. In three days time, she returned to the village and said that the women must give up dancing the chiponda dance for twelve months and all would be well. 791 789 755

On other occasions she usually worked along similar lines. Consulted as to whether or not some sick person would recover, she always answered with the same formula, if she thought he would die, "The house is prepared for him and medicine would avail nothing!"

There are certain other supernatural persons or spirits to which reference must be made. Chimela-mesi has been mentioned above. Manunu, a word which Hetherwick translates as "madness, idiocy,"[1] really refers to the delusions and hallucinations which form part of the perceptions of the insane. The word also has the meaning of obsession, phobia, and intuition; thus the natives say of an ox about to be slaughtered that shows signs of realizing the approaching evil, "it has manunu." On the other hand, they say the hartebeest is a foolish animal that does not know what to do when hunted: "it has manunu, it is a deluded animal." Again, the baboon and the crow "have manunu"; they are possessed of senses or faculties which warn them of the approach of any enemies before they can be seen or heard; they cannot be stalked. In all these cases, the crowd of hallucinatory men pursuing some melancholic, the rats of the delirium tremens patient, and that which appears to warn the crow or the baboon, are all manunu and are, I think, supposed by the natives to have some kind of materialistic form. 791 828

Ndondocha: when the wasawi[2] do not wish immediately to devour the body of a deceased person which they have raised from the grave, they cut off the arms and legs at the elbows and knees and insert medicine into the stumps; these living-dead are then compelled by the wasawi to live in caves and hollow ant hills during the day and to follow them at night in their travels, "like a herd of goats," to be eaten as required. The ndondocha may be heard as they wander along in the night, making sounds like a cat's mew. A woman will 791 789

[1] Yao language, op. cit., p. 238. [2] Vide supra, p. 292.

3: Stanmus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

never leave any food outside at night, not even the chaff from the grain she has been pounding, lest these most miserable of beings be attracted by it.

Chitowe is a word common to several tribes and among them appears to have various shades of meaning. Among the Wayao, the itowe are "the little people" of the leprechaun order. They rob the gardens and cause rot among the pumpkins; their little footprints can be seen where they have passed hither and thither; fruits and vegetables that they touch will become bitter. To prevent these disasters, the Yao, at the time when their crops are ripening, place different kinds of vegetables at cross-roads, hoping thereby to satisfy the itowe and prevent them coming into the gardens. As far as I am aware, the itowe have nothing to do with famine and are in no way connected with Mtanga, to be mentioned below, as Macdonald believed.[1] The chitowe is variously said to be "like a man but rather like an animal." He has two legs but goes on all fours.

The Yao describe another legendary race of "little people" who used to live in this country and who may still be met with, — "who knows?" They were of a very small stature, grew long beards, were very touchy, quarrelsome, and fierce, and carried spears. When anybody met one, he was immediately asked: "Mumbonele kwapi?", "From how far did you see me?" and it was always well to pretend to have seen the little man coming a long way off and make him believe he was considered quite a big person; if you said "Hullo, I have only just spotted you!", he would immediately spear you. They are commonly supposed to dwell on the tops of high mountains and are iron workers. They are called the Mumbonele kwapi.

There is no relation as far as I know between these two classes of "little people," but I think these stories go to uphold the theory recently reiterated by Hastings Guilford in his Hunterian Lecture (1914) that folk-lore fables of hobgoblins, etc., have a basis in fact. He believes that dwarf races at one time were to be found, possibly over a very wide area of the globe. In this country, I think it may be that one sees the transition from historical facts to true fairy stories.

The Anyanja have the same legend about these "little people," the mwandi onwakuti ("where-did-you-see-me"); it is indeed not only wide-spread throughout this country, (the Ahenga and Ankonde in North Nyasa district speak of the mwandionenanku who ask the same question), but there is a very similar legend among the Akikuyu in British East Africa.[2]

The chitowe is doubtless the chirwei of the Anyanja, mentioned in Scott's dictionary,[3] as Miss Werner[4] has supposed, for one finds that among the Anyanja at the southern end of the Protectorate, the chitowe is described as having only one side to his body so that he is invisible when viewed from the off side, thus resembling the chirwei who has one half of his body made of wax.

[1] Op. cit., vol. 1, p. 71.
[2] Op. cit., p. 97.
[3] M. W. H. Bunch, 'Pre-Bantu occupants of East Africa,' (Man, London, 1915, p. 40-41).
[4] British Central Africa, op. cit., p. 32.

nor is he "God the creator," of man or earth. He, however, receives the spirits of the dead. Should he refuse to do so, a man continues to live. When a man has recovered from some commonly fatal disease, the natives say, "Mulungu wakanile (refused him)!" or if he has been very near to death and then recovers, they say "Mulungu wamunile (spat him out)". 776

It would thus appear that among the spirit hosts there is a regular law of precedence, and presiding over all is a supreme being, but all this is so remote as to have little importance for the living. The vagueness concerning Mulungu, I must admit, has given rise to some doubt in my own mind as to how far he was a deity with an entity of his own in their religion of a little time ago.

Ancestors tend to be forgotten in proportion to the length of time which has elapsed since their death, unless they played some important part during their lives: then some particular one may be remembered to the exclusion of others, and to him prayers of intercession are offered. In the case of chiefs, the names of a long line of rulers may be remembered on occasions when all else about them has fallen into oblivion. It seems possible originally Mulungu was the oldest ancestral chief who was raised up as a supreme being but who, in the process, has lost all other attributes. On the other hand, the word often refers only to the place where the spirits dwell; this may have been the original meaning. 769 776

There is no religious worship in the proper sense of the term but only propitiation, prayer for intercession, and return of thanks for favors granted. The keynote of this ancestor worship, the sum total of their religion to the exclusion of the belief in a supreme being, is fear. We have seen at the funeral that everything is done to lay the spirit at rest. The people wish never to hear of the spirit again. It is chiefly with a view of averting some evil that worship takes place or with a view of expiating some crime that sacrifice is made or to alleviate some suffering that communication is sought with the spirits. It is a question of, "Do us no harm, do not vent your wrath upon us for what we have left undone," rather than "Keep us from doing evil, save us from being our own enemies." It would appear to be a religion of spite, not of love and kindness, though there are glimmerings of a search after "a hand to guide and protect," as in the prayer given below and also in the action taken when removing a village. 769 [771]

As a corollary of this system of ancestor worship, there is no real priesthood. A man asks for favors for himself; the head of a family petitions a deceased father or some more remote ancestor of greater importance; the headman intercedes on behalf of the village with the spirit of a predecessor; a chief takes the place of high priest on the occasion of a tribal supplication to a former ruler, though he may be replaced by some one of his wise men who acts as intermediary. [773]

Some form of sacrifice is offered with the prayer, and often some omen is sought as a sign that the prayer is granted. For this purpose, flour made from millet called ubepusi (ausuba, Chin.) is commonly used. The word ubepusi probably includes any sacrificial offerings.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

the Shire River to within about 15 miles from Liwonde's headquarters, and though he frequently tours his chiefdom in this area I have never known him to cross his boundary. The position of Nyambi here is interesting in that originally Nyambi's chiefdom was part of the Liwonde district. It was made part of this district in the early days of the Administration when Nyambi II, Nkata's sister's son who founded the chiefdom, opposed the reigning Jalasi and moved into the area where the chiefdom is now situated. The implication of Nyambi's being in Liwonde district was that he had to sit on District Councils in Zomba with Kawinga and Liwonde instead of with Jalasi in Fort Johnston. I understand that since the original Nyambi died his several successors have made requests to the Administration to be included in the Fort Johnston district. Finally in 1948 the request was granted and Nyambi's chiefdom was once more linked with his perpetual son's in Fort Johnston district. 631 643

The opposition of the chiefdoms as wholes appears in other situations as well, often when it is not expected. For example, there are two tobacco markets in the area studied. One is in Nyambi's area and the other is about 25 miles away at Mlomba's village in the extreme south of Kawinga's area. Mlomba is a uterine brother of the present Kawinga. Chiwalo's chiefdom abuts Nyambi's and tobacco growers need to transport their produce only six or seven miles to the market in Nyambi's area. Yet several growers told me that they were taking their produce the 25 miles to Mlomba market because they felt in some vague way that the Chiwalo people got lower prices for their tobacco in the Nyambi market than the Nyambi people.

The cleavage between the chiefdoms is also expressed in their religion. Kawinga, Liwonde, Jalasi and Nyambi are all Moslems and very few of their followers are Christian. Malemia is a Christian and very few of his followers are Moslems. But between Kawinga and Liwonde on one hand, and Jalasi and Nyambi on the other hand, there is a cleavage in terms of a schism among the Moslems. One group, the twaliki, became centred at Jalasi's court village Majuni. The twaliki believe that Islamic devotions should be accompanied by loud singing and chanting of Arabic tracts and by particularly vigorous dancing. Even at funerals this type of prayer is required. The other sect, the sukutu, centred at Kawinga's and Liwonde's court villages, 631 643 795

631 advocates the more orthodox type of Islamic devotion in which 643 a quiet restrained manner is emphasized. As far as I know the twaliki sect are confined entirely to Jalasi's chiefdom and the 745 sukutu to Kawinga and Liwonde. In this matter, Nyambi's people side with Kawinga's and Liwonde's.

On the other hand, local informal organization is well de-631 veloped so that Chiwalo who is at the point of juxtaposition of 643 Kawinga, Liwonde, Nyambi and Jalasi chiefdoms, may try cases
692 involving headmen from any of these areas, and they usually accept his arbitration. His is the nearest court house. The actual boundaries of the four areas, however, are very clearly recognized and Chiwalo realizes the limits of his jurisdiction. Though he may arbitrate in a difference between headmen, he would not dare to apportion land outside his area. Headmen living on the boundaries of two chiefdoms arbitrate in each other's cases; the villagers under them intermarry. A village in Chiwalo's may
621 procure garden lands in Jalasi's area, and children may be initiated
631 at ceremonies held by headmen in other chiefdoms. There is no
643 clear break in the normal social relationships of people across the boundaries of chiefdoms, and their members interact as freely with each other as members of two villages of the same chiefdom. The cleavage between the villages on different sides of the boundary of a chiefdom becomes apparent only in special situations.

631 The formal relationships of the chiefs, set by the history of 643 their conquests and their kinship, and incorporated in and slightly modified by the Administrative framework, are overlaid by an informal local organization where the interaction of village headmen only conforms to the formal pattern when no agreement can be reached.

The Position of the Modern Chief

643 In ritual situations a chiefdom is clearly differentiated from its 769 neighbours, and many of these situations arise in the cult of 782 tendence on the ancestor spirits. The ancestor cult has fallen away almost completely among village headmen, but among the chiefs it is still strong, and appears particularly in the rain-prayers and the initiation ceremonies. Later, I shall discuss at length the importance of the chief's sanction before headmen may conduct initiation ceremonies. This is because the spirits

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

622 hand, all villages tend to disappear in time. We should there-563 fore expect more of the headmen who came in during the 167 earlier decades to be forgotten, and the trend should be more pronounced than it is. In fact we know from other sources that immigration of the Nguru, who represent about one-half of the Newcomers, was greatest before 1930, and it is almost certain that the figures do reflect the change in the amount of Nguru immigration, and that the factors which may operate against the trend are not important. As a whole the set of figures suggests that immigration is slowly coming to an end.

622 The Aborigines are all Nyanja. Among the Invaders, 70·2 per 563 cent are Yao, 25·9 per cent are Mpotola, and the remainder 3·9 per cent are Nyanja and Nguru. The Mpotola Invaders are practically all in the Ngokwe and Chikweo areas, so that in the other areas (i.e. in Liwonde, Kawinga, Chamba and Mposa) the Yao represent 94·9 per cent of the Invaders; the remainder are Mpotola. Under Ngokwe and Chikweo who are Mpotola chieftains, 54·5 per cent (48 of 88) of the Invaders are Mpotola, and 37·5 per cent are Yao, and the remaining 8·0 per cent are Nyanja and Nguru. Among the 486 Newcomers, 35·8 per cent of the headmen are Yao, 15·4 per cent Mpotola, 43·8 per cent Nguru and 4·9 per cent are mainly Nyanja. In general, therefore, we may say that the Aborigines are all Nyanja; the Invaders are Yao in the major area and Mpotola in the other area; and the Newcomers are predominantly Nguru from Portuguese East Africa, though there is a fair proportion of Yao who have come from other Nyasaland districts.

There are significant differences among the three categories of 622 headmen in their religious affiliations. In general there are more •715 Moslems (71·8 per cent) among all headmen than Christians or 787 Pagans. But there are more Moslems among the Invaders than among either the Aborigines or the Newcomers.[1] There are more Pagans among the Newcomers, but the proportion of Christians among the Aborigines and the Newcomers is about equal (25·0 per cent and 21·9 per cent). These differences in religious affiliations are consistent with the different historical backgrounds of the two groups. The Invaders are the descendants of the Yao slavers, who in the past had been in intimate

[1] Invaders = 91·1 per cent; Others = 63·9 per cent; Diff. of per cent = 27·2; S.E. of diff. = 3·7; C.R. = 7·2; $p < 0{\cdot}0001$.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

TABLE VI

RELIGIOUS AFFILIATION OF ABORIGINES, INVADERS AND NEWCOMERS HEADMEN

622
785
797

Religious Affiliation	Numbers			Total	Percentages			Total
	Aborigines	Invaders	Newcomers		Aborigines	Invaders	Newcomers
Moslems . .	17	184	296	497	70·8	91·1	63·3	71·8
Pagans . .	1	4	68	73	4·2	2·0	14·6	10·6
Church of Scotland .	3	10	59	72	12·5	5·0	12·7	10·4
Roman Catholic .	2	1	33	36	8·3	0·5	7·1	5·2
Other Christians .	1	3	10	14	4·2	1·5	2·1	2·0
Total . .	24	202	466	692	100·0	100·0	100·0	100·0
Unknown .	1	3	20	24
	25	205	486	716

Combining Roman Catholic and other Christian totals.
$n = 6$; $\chi^2 = 36{\cdot}48$; $p < 0{\cdot}00001$.

contact with the Arab slave-traders and had taken over Islam from them. To-day the chiefs are still frequently called 'sultan'. All the chiefs in the Machinga area are Moslems except possibly the Malemia who was installed in 1947. He was brought up as a Christian but the strong Islamic tradition behind his status is reflected in the star and crescent on his ceremonial headdress. The Nyanja, however, were influenced by the Missions from the start and the Nguru were not as directly concerned in the slave-trade and were therefore less affected by Islam. They have been easily converted to Christianity. Among them too there are more Pagans. The difference in religion here is largely a reflex of the political relationships of the headmen. In other words, the Yao stoutly maintain that they are Moslems merely because Islam is one of the distinguishing marks of the Yao and of the Invaders in particular. It would be difficult for some of them to maintain their point in face of strict Moslems, for many of

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

622 them follow the tenets of Islam in only the most cursory way. An Nguru therefore admits to being a Pagan more readily than 785 a Yao, because he cannot identify himself with the Invading 787 group.

Kinship with the Chief

692 The most important way in which the three categories differ, however, is in the degree to which they are associated with the 693 chief. While the Invaders are identified with the chief because of their association with him in the invasion, they are also tied to him to a greater degree by various kinship links than the other categories of headmen.

Although the exact composition of the Invading groups will never be known, it appears from the accounts of old men, that the groups were made up primarily of the chief and his younger brothers, together with their sons and slaves, and some unrelated followers. Other chieftaincies and village headmen have sprung from the chief's lineage. For example, Kawinga was the leader who brought the present Kawinga-Liwonde group into Nyasaland. The first man to be called Kawinga left the Lujenda River where he was living with an elder relative called Nsanama, whose exact genealogical connection I have never been able to determine. Accompanying them was Liwonde, a younger brother of Kawinga. As they passed through the country just west of Lake Chiuta they encountered the Mpotola under Chikweo, and these joined up with Kawinga and his relatives and went to Kongwe on the west side of Lake Malombe (in the present Kalembo's area). From this place they were displaced by the Ngoni and returned east and south to the Chikala Range where they displaced Malemia and occupied the heights. Subsequently, Liwonde left the mountain and went to live on the Shire River where the old Government station used to be. From this point on, Kawinga and Liwonde seem to have acted almost independently. Nsanama seems to have stayed with Kawinga. Chamba who was the son of the first Kawinga now set himself up as a chief on the south side of Chikala and Chaoni. Mposa, the son of the first Liwonde, moved to the shores of Lake Shirwa and set himself up there. Chiwalo, a sister's daughter's son of the first Kawinga, set himself up on the northern fringe of the area. Recently Stora, a sister's daughter's daughter's the last rite the owner of the oblational basket exacts a payment of threepence or so from each parent. The headman does gain financially from the initiation ceremony, but it would be wrong to imagine that this is the only reason why he should want to have the right to hold it. The competition for the rights, which are limited to a few, is part of the general political process whereby village headmen compete for privileges and advantages over their fellows.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

Village headmen may hold either the boys' or the girls' initiation ceremonies, or both. Sometimes, when they hold both, they delegate the girls' ceremony to a younger brother or some other relative without referring to the chief. For example, Kawinga's clan relative and important retainer, Ngalawanga, had the rights to both initiation ceremonies, and he allowed his perpetual 'son' Isa [1] to hold the girls'. Also in Nyambi area, Majaja, who had both initiation rights, allowed his perpetual 'son' Nantunga to have the girls' ceremony. It is generally conceded that the right to hold the boys' initiation ceremonies is more valuable than the right to hold the girls'. H. L. Duff, writing in 1906, had also noticed this when he wrote:

> The respective ceremonies seem to be considered as on a somewhat different footing, for the boys' inyago can properly be held only at the village and under the patronage of, so to say, the paramount chief of the neighbourhood, whereas the girls' initiation may take place under the auspices of an inferior headman. This distinction is still jealously observed and any breach of the chief's privileges is apt to lead to bitter dispute.[2]

The sanction the chief holds over the headmen in this respect is mystical. A village headman believes that the initiation will be a success (that is, that the initiands will be free from the harm of wild beasts and illness, or the circumcision wounds of the boys will heal quickly and well), only if the approval of the chief's ancestors is obtained. He cannot hold the initiation ceremonies, unless he has obtained the basket from the chief.

Most people still follow tribal initiation customs, but in the extremes of the area in which I worked, religious ideas are bringing about a change. In the north in Jalasi's area where Islam

[1] The first Isa was the son of Ngalawanga and this relationship is preserved by the modern incumbents of the headmanships. See Chap. V, p. 122.

[2] Duff, H. L., Nyasaland under the Foreign Office (London, 1906), 312.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

is most powerful, there is a tendency for the Islamic initiation ceremony for boys, fanda, and the Islamic initiation ceremony for girls, namda, to displace the tribal equivalents, lupanda and ciputa. These Moslem initiations are conducted by Moslem teachers (mwalimu) and are not controlled by the chief. Though it also involves the circumcision of the boys, fanda is very much shorter and the boys are secluded for only a week. Some say it is becoming more popular because it is less expensive for the boys' parents. In Chiwalo's area the two ceremonies are run concurrently. The boys and girls go through the normal segregation rites at the beginning of the ceremony, but an mwalimu circumcises the boys according to Islamic practice. At the aggregation rites at the end of the period of seclusion, the star and crescent appears as one of the symbols along with the whale (namungumi), antelope (mbalapi), leopard (ziwuwi), and the other tribal effigies which are shown to the boys. Christianity in the south has had a similar effect. The Missions actively discouraged initiation ceremonies in the past. Many of the people in Mposa's and Malemia's area have dropped the custom, or have integrated prayers and other parts of Christian ritual into the ceremonies, though circumcision is steadfastly retained. The effect of these changes is that the important ritual control the chief had over the ceremony has been undermined, and so the prestige attached to it has also begun to fade in these areas. What I describe about the prestige of village headmen and the rights they have to initiation ceremonies is only partially true, and is falling away daily. The correlation I seek to establish is also disturbed by the fact that among the Nguru there is a slightly different initiation ceremony (ridodete) for boys. Most Nguru send their boys to the Yao initiations but there are still some who hold their own traditional ceremonies. These are not within the mystical control of the chief so that some Nguru headmen are outside the competition for the initiation rights. I should say, however, that most compete with the Yao for Yao initiation rights so that this factor is not as disturbing as appears at first sight. In addition, village headmen who move into a new area usually must obtain the permission of the chief before they may use the initiation rights they hold before coming into the area.

There are other indicators of the general high rank of village headmen. Junior headmen, like commoners, must give a special

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

TABLE XX

WHO INITIATION RIGHTS WERE GRANTED TO NEWCOMERS AND INVADERS

622
643
554
881

Type of Initiation Right	By early Chiefs		By recent Chiefs*		Total
	Invaders	Newcomers	Invaders	Newcomers
Both init. . .	8	6	3	2	19
One init. only .	9	10	3	14	36
Total . . .	17	16	6	16	55

* This is obviously a crude classification. I have taken roughly 35 years as the dividing line. As the early chiefs I have classified all the Kawinga before and including Kawinga V who died in 1915; all the Liwonde before and including Liwonde III who died in 1901; all the Ngokwera before and including Ngokwera IV who died in 1905; all the Mpeme before and including Mpeme II who died in 1913; and all the Chikwere before and including Chikwere II who died in 1914.

In other words, recent chiefs have been granting single initiation rights to Invaders in the same proportion as they have been granting both rights, but they have been granting Newcomer headmen the right to hold only one ceremony more often than the right to hold both. Of the six sets of rights to initiation ceremonies granted by recent chiefs to Invader headmen, three were rights to hold only one ceremony, while 14 of the 16 initiation rights granted to Newcomer headmen were for one ceremony only.[1]

622
554
881
715
619

Headmen do not make use of their bonds of common religion or tribe with the chief in their competition for initiation rights. Table XXI sets out the numbers of headmen of different religion. There is a substantially smaller proportion of Pagan headmen (9·7 per cent) holding initiation ceremonies than either Christians (25·5 per cent) or Moslems (24·4 per cent).[2] Most Pagans, however, are also Newcomers so that this difference is actually a reflex of the generally lower rank of Newcomers. Table XXII sets out the number of headmen of the chief's tribe and of other

[1] i.e. 30·0 per cent against 87·5 per cent; diff. of per cent = 57·5; S.E. of diff. = 20·08; C.R. = 2·87; p = 0·0014.

[2] Pagans = 9·7 per cent; Others 24·6 per cent; diff of per cent = 14·9; S.E. of diff. = 7·94; C.R. = 1·88; p = 0·0605.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

632
654
681
715
619

TABLE XXI

THE DISTRIBUTION OF INITIATION RIGHTS AMONG HEADMEN OF DIFFERENT RELIGIONS

Type of Initiation Holder	Moslems	Christians	Pagans	Total
Both init. rights . .	25	4	1	30*
Boys' init. rights only .	12	4	—	16
Girls' init. rights only .	31	6	2	39†
No init. rights . . .	211	41	28	280‡
Total	279	55	31	365

$n = 6$; $\chi^2 = 5.05$; $p = 0.53778$.

* Excludes 1 headman whose religion was unrecorded.
† Excludes 4 headmen whose religion was unrecorded.
‡ Excludes 2 headmen whose religion was unrecorded.

TABLE XXII

THE DISTRIBUTION OF INITIATION RIGHTS AMONG HEADMEN OF THE SAME AND DIFFERENT TRIBE AS THE CHIEF

Type of Initiation Holder	Same Tribe	Different Tribe	Total
Both init. holders	20	11	31
Boys' init. holders only . . .	7	9	16
Girls' init. holders only . . .	23	20	43
No init. rights	156	126	282
Total	206	166	372
% Init. holders	24·3	24·1	24·2

$n = 3$; $\chi^2 = 0.17$; $p = 0.34165$.

tribes who hold initiation rights. Once again the proportion of headmen of the same tribe as the chief who hold initiation rights is the same as that of headmen of different tribes from the chief. We may say, therefore, that membership of tribe is not an operative factor in the granting of initiation rights.[1]

[1] The factors contributing to the granting of initiation rights are obviously all interrelated.

1: Tew E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

return to the lupanda, where the initiates are welcomed by their friends. An essential part of the ceremony which takes place at this stage is the exhibition of animal shapes made by the n'mizwa, with mounds of earth outlined in flour. These animal shapes differ from lodge to lodge. On the last night before the return to the village the initiates undergo a ceremonial bathing, each boy being carried to the stream by a woman, who thereafter is addressed as 'elder sister'. Finally, with new names, and freshly oiled and decorated, they march to the chief's village to be redeemed by him from the n'mizwa with gifts of cloth. After initiation it is a deadly insult to call a boy by his child-name. All who pass through initiation together consider themselves bound by mutual obligations of hospitality.[1]

Girls' initiation takes place in three stages. First, there is ciputa, the general initiation before puberty, which corresponds to the boys' lupanda. It takes place at the same time of year, and though it lasts for less than a week, its conclusion is celebrated at lupanda jointly with the conclusion of the boys' initiation. A hut is built in the bush, like the long dormitory of the boys, and four days are spent in dancing and singing. Each girl (aged about eight years) is accompanied by a sponsor, a woman friend who continues to be her mentor during subsequent rites, and who assists in giving the girl instruction in her womanly duties. At the end the girls are bathed and anointed, dressed in new clothes, and each is carried to lupanda by her sponsor. Here they prove their skill in dancing and receive gifts from their friends. Ritual defloration follows the ciputa initiation.[2] Among Mohammedans, clitoridectomy used to be performed by a woman operator, but, it is said, was discontinued in about 1903 on account of the heavy mortality.[3]

After this first general celebration, first pregnancy and first birth are the occasions of separate rites for each girl. According to some informants there were once two ceremonies connected with pregnancy. One, for the young married men whose wives had not yet conceived, used to take place at the same time as ciputa; each man was attended by a woman sponsor not his wife, given good advice, and put through various tests of manhood. Mitchell does not confirm the present existence of this ceremony, but in the old days if a man was betrothed or married to a child going through her ciputa he had to accompany her.

The lisiwo ceremony takes place when a young married woman quickens with child for the first time.[4] The woman, with her sponsor and the married women of the neighbourhood, went out in procession for a ceremony of singing and dancing and instruction to the young couple, followed by a feast. Nowadays no men are allowed to attend lisiwo. A child born of a woman who had not undergone this rite used to be buried alive; nowadays her anyesu ndumba is charged by the chief.

Finally, six days after the first child is born, its naming ceremony forms a last initiation rite for its mother. The husband is formally led into her hut by her sponsor and the married women of the neighbourhood, and the child is taken out for the first time to the accompaniment of feasting and dancing.

Most Yao men and women act as sponsors of initiates at least once, and all parti-

[1] Sources for boys' initiation: Swanson and Dewey, 1913; Werner, 1908, pp. 124-6; Swanson, c. 1900, pp. 127-63; Hodder, 1933, pp. 19 sq.; Johnston, 1897, p. 409; Weule, c. 1900, p. 304.
[2] Swanson, c. 1900, p. 159. [3] Ibid., c. 1910, p. 198.
[4] Ibid., c. 1900, p. 172; Hodder, 1933, p. 23, ulile le ciwanda (Sally).

10: Sanderson D-5 (ca. 1920)1922 FT7 Yao FT7

A Note on Ceremonial Purification among the WaYao, Nyasaland. 55

By Meredith Sanderson, M.R.C.S., F.R.G.S.

One of the effects of European influence in Africa is the breaking up of tribal organization and discipline. The rights of the individual being no longer subordinated to the common good, customs formerly observed by the village community as a whole die out, while those affecting the individual are still practised. 191

This tendency is well seen in the ancient ceremonies of purification among the WaYao, which are now rarely performed collectively, though the native, however highly "educated," still goes to the doctor to obtain the necessary medicines for removing, for instance, the contamination caused by contact with a corpse. [75] [764]

These collective ceremonies have already been described by various writers in respect of both Nyasaland and elsewhere;* but the Yao rites have not, I think, been given in detail, and the following notes may not, therefore, be altogether valueless. 114

The Pyajila ceremony (kuppajila, "to sweep") is common to most Bantu tribes. In its simplest form it used to be performed annually by the WaYao, at the beginning of the twelfth month, count of the months (lunar) being kept by means of a "calendar."‡ The whole village is thoroughly "spring-cleaned," all rubbish 796 [191] [805]

* At Sia, where the game is played — All Souls' night is the anniversary, Father Dornelas Myer tells me, the song in Spanish runs:—

Yaun, yaun, quando tu vengo,
Yaun, yaun, hay vinin.

Yaun, yaun, vino yon ustan,
Yaun, yaun, I shall not be there any more.

Words imported, presumably, to the hidden hall.

† See Sanderson, M. C., "The Bali Indians," pp. 333-341, XXIII. Annual Report, Bureau American Ethnology, 1904.

‡ Frazer, "Golden Bough," II., 178, sqq.

§ A "calendar" consists of a string tied to two pegs in the wall of the house, or between two poles, on which are threaded twelve pieces of reed, bamboo or cornstalk. One of these is moved to the other end of the string each time a new moon is seen. [24]

10:Sanderson D-5 (ca. 1920)1922 FT7 Yao FT7

THE WHOLE VILLAGE IS THOROUGHLY "SPRING-CLEANED", ALL RUBBISH

swept up, the ground round the houses is hoed clean, and the interiors remodelled.
(364) Ceremonial beer is brewed by the head-wife of the chief, and after this has been drunk the ashes of the fire used in the brewing are carefully collected and taken to a meeting-place ("cross-roads," or "diverging of paths") where they are deposited.
(763) The chief, as representative of his people, bathes in special medicated water, a decoction made from the bark of ng'ungu and mkuru, and the root of mpingo.
(327) This completes the ordinary annual ceremony, at which new fire is not made.
(622)

On certain special occasions a more elaborate ritual is carried out; such occasions are the death of a chief, a threatened epidemic of infectious disease, a murder (especially by shooting) and the frequent occurrence of quarrels in the village.

In such circumstances, in addition to the ordinary ypujilo ceremony described above, the porridge sticks of the whole village are removed and all fires extinguished. The discarded sticks and all ashes of the old fires are carried to the meeting of paths, where the former are stuck upright in the ground and the ashes piled together;
(372) this is done in procession, all the people taking part. On their return to the village new fire is made by friction by either the chief or his younger brother—usually the latter; fire procured in any other way would nullify the proceedings. Finally
(763) all the people bathe in the medicated water used only by the chief at the ordinary ceremony.

751 In addition to this special form of the ypujilo ceremony, another rite is sometimes 776 performed after the occurrence of a murder or as prophylactic against the spread of epidemic disease. The doctor first makes a kind of trough (lukungwa) from the bark of mtondowalo or mpingo, and procures a chichiko (or chipungulo) basket—used as a strainer in salt-making. Having collected his medicines he proceeds to the bank of the stream near the usual bathing-place of the village and digs a shallow hole, in which he places the basket; in this he puts the leaves of a certain thorny shrub and covers the whole with the trough, which is banked up with earth so as to be perfectly firm. He then puts his "medicines" into the trough; these are, first, the head of an iron hammer and a piece of slag, both from a smelting furnace. On top of these he puts pieces of the root of a certain tree which has many and particularly sharp thorns, and bits of bark from two trees peculiar for having very straight stems. Having distributed these evenly along the floor of the trough, he fills it with water and then proceeds to construct an arch over the end of the trough furthest from the stream. Two long poles, cut from a kind of tree particularly rich in sap, are planted in the ground, one at each side of the trough and close to it; these are bent over towards each other, and fastened together by means of a strip of their own bark. A bamboo is now planted alongside each, and similarly tied to its fellow. During all these preparations and throughout the ceremony it is essential that the doctor has no knots in any part of his clothing.

The preparations are now complete, and when all the fires in the village have been extinguished the people go in procession to the spot where the doctor awaits them. All must be purely clad and must have no metal about them.

(622) The chief opens the ceremony. He steps into the trough and taking some of
(763) the medicated water therefrom in his hands he rinses his mouth with it. He then offers a prayer to the spirits of his ancestors, first stating the emergency and detailing the measures which are to be taken to deal with it (new fire, sweeping, discard of porridge-sticks and shooting). The prayer over, he splashes the water in the trough over his body and passes through the arch, first throwing some gift (beads or, in more modern times, money) into the trough. These gifts, presumably intended as an offering to the spirits, are the perquisites of the doctor, and everybody
(756) is supposed to contribute in turn.

10: Sanderson D-5 (ca. 1920)1922 FT7 Yao FT7

The men and boys now pass through the arch in order of seniority; each splashes himself with the water in the trough, but neither speaks nor rinses the mouth. The women come next, led by the head-wife of the chief; the latter rinses her mouth and, instructed by the doctor, repeats a prayer similar to that offered by her husband. The remainder of the women merely splash themselves, like the men, before passing through the arch. All then return to the village, where the ppajila is continued. 751 796

Finally the doctor takes the hammer-head from the trough and hands it to the chief, who rubs the haft into it, and, a hoe having been placed on the ground, goes through the form of forging the latter by beating it with the hammer. He then scrapes the ground with the hoe as if clearing a piece overgrown with grass; he does not dig with it as in hoeing up the ground for planting seed. After this rite the chief again bathes in medicated water similar to that in the trough, and the ceremony is complete.

Whereas the ppajila ceremony and its adjunct, the rite of the arch, are now but rarely performed, no Yao will omit the rite of purification after a death in his family. This ceremony consists of two essential parts, both protective against the ndoko, a disease characterised by dropsy and supposed to be contracted by contact with a corpse, or by association, especially by sharing a meal, with those who have been in such contact. The first of these parts is bathing in certain medicines, which protects the bather from ndoko, and the second consists of a sort of communion meal, shared by all friends and especially relatives with those who have been contaminated, and designed to protect those friends and relatives. [178] 751 764 796 783

The decoction for bathing is made by soaking the roots of Isopodendrali and Isodendrale in water, together with the bark of mbawaw, one piece each from the east and west aspects of the tree; the water assumes a reddish tint, and the whole body is bathed. 751 783 829 765

The communion meal consists of porridge made from any kind of flour or of rice, and some squash beans. In the latter some scorched and powdered root of mwandangalala is mixed, with a little salt. All near relatives of the deceased must partake of this meal, as well as their wives and their near relatives; part is carefully put aside for the use of any relative unable to be present at the ceremony. [262]

Latterly, since the spread of Islam among the WaYao, this rite has become confused with the distribution of food to the poor at the funeral of a Muslim, and the Arabic word sadaqa ("charity") is now generally used for it, to the exclusion of its wider, correct meaning. [177] [777]

It may be mentioned here that after the death of a child the father is denied access to his wife for a period of about three weeks, and the first act must be one of entire interruption. 765 783

MEREDITH SANDERSON.

1: Tew E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

even competing with the Arabs for the inland trade.[1] At some uncertain date there were two migratory movements away from the original home of the Yao. The first was a scattering from Hill Yao to surrounding hills, possibly due to internal dissension.[2] The next movement was caused by an attack of the Makua between 1850 and 1870.[3] One party moved northward, finally settling in Tanganyika, as has been mentioned. Four parties moved south into Nyasaland.

(a) Achisi Yao, who first moved from Mwombe to Mchisi hill, and then to Nyasaland, where they are represented by those under Katuli Native Authority.

(b) Amasanings Yao, who first moved to Lisanings hill, near the Lutwisi river, and then to the south-east of Lake Nyasa, where their descendants are now under Makanjira Native Authority.

(c) Amangoche Yao, first went to settle at Mangoche, near Fort Johnston. They were later driven out of Mangoche, by the last group, and scattered.

(d) Amachinga Yao, first went to the vicinity of Mandimba hill, near the source of the Lujenda river. They were ousted from this fertile valley by the attacks of the Lomwe, and came into Nyasaland in four parties.

One party of Machinga Yao under Nkata (later called Jalasi, or Zarafi) attacked the Yao at Mangoche, drove them south and themselves finally settled there. Another party under Nsamala came with Nkata as far as Mangoche, then turned off to Chiusi hill in the Fort Johnston area. A third group, under Malemia and Mtumanja, moved down to the Domasi valley via Isule hill, where they were attacked by the fourth Machinga group, under Kawinga. The latter had also accompanied Nkata's party as far as Mangoche, then crossed the Shire river to the west; here they were attacked by the Maseko Ngoni under Chidiamanga and moved south-east to Chikala, which they occupied until defeated by the British. Liwanda, the brother of Kawinga, moved to the Shire river.

The Amangoche Yao, after they had been scattered by the Amachinga, settled some in the Chimanda part of Dedza district, some at Mount Zomba, some migrated to Ndirande hill near Blantyre, some to Ilache hill, some to Chiradzulu, Nguludi, Malawi, and Ndindo hills. These Amangoche Yao constitute about half the Yao population in Nyasaland.[5]

The Yao invasion of Nyasaland was not an organised military expedition, like that of the Ngoni. The first immigrants came peacefully in small kinship groups. They took advantage of Nyanja factions to consolidate their position, until, by 1876, when the Church of Scotland Mission was established at Blantyre, the Yao were a ruling class dominating the earlier inhabitants.[6] At the same time they vigorously carried on their slaving activities. In 1893 Thompson noted that the fertile country of the watershed between the Ruo and the Shire rivers was uninhabited because of Yao raids.[8]

The Yao of Nyasaland suffered from Ngoni raids, but were never subject to them. Several tributes have been paid to their soldierly qualities,[7] and indeed it took five years from 1891, when the Protectorate was declared, before the Yao were subdued and the slave trade, to which they had been principal parties with the Arabs, sup-

[1] Burton, 1872, p. 30. [2] Abdallah, 1919.
[3] Hetherwick, 1922, p. 3; Murray, 1929.
[4] Historical notes in unpublished administrative papers.
[5] Du Plessis, 1929, pp. 198 and 302.
[6] Murray, 1897, p. 19, and Stigand, 1909. [8] Thompson, 1882, p. 99.

1: Tew E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

Land Tenure

The rules governing land tenure were those which would be expected of a society which suffered from no land shortage. A man was entitled to as much land as he could cultivate, the limitation being that he should consult the headman as to his neighbours' boundaries. Abandoned gardens could only be taken up with the permission of the original cultivator.[1] 423

MAIN CULTURAL FEATURES

Religion

The Yao are largely Islamized. Codrington remarked that the perpetuation of this faith was distinctly antagonistic to British influence, and it received considerable attention from chiefs and headmen. Schools for the instruction of youth in reading and writing Swahili in Arabic characters were established in nearly every village, where also prayers were made at regular intervals in the day. The Moslem fasts and feasts were also observed, and the Yao were not inclined to embrace Christianity.[2] Their conversion to Islam did not take place till the nineteenth century, long after their first introduction to the Arab traders at Kilwa and Zanzibar, although they had adopted Swahili modes of dress much earlier.[3] 771 787

According to Hetherwick, Islam is strongest on the lake shore and on the east border of Nyasaland, chiefly round the old slave-trade centres. Makanjira's on the south-east side of the lake, and Domira Bay on the west, were the centres of Moslem propaganda. The Moslem population around Zomba and Blantyre consists mainly of Yao men, who have built themselves mosques in their own villages, or use the large mosques of Indian Moslem merchants. In the west districts, lower Shire, Ruo, central Shire, Likongwe, Fort Manning, the Moslem population does not total more than 732. In the districts round Fort Johnston and Kotakota, the Moslems are one-ninth of the total population, while in Zomba district they number one-fifth.[4]

The Yao pagan religion was a form of ancestor worship. Apart from diviners and medicine men, there was no regular priestly profession. Intercession with the ancestors was performed by the chief, on behalf of the chiefdom, by the headman on behalf of the village, and by the head of the matrilineal kin for his dependents.[5] A man was qualified to approach his ancestors individually only if he had been initiated and had a house of his own.[6] 771 769

Some of the ritual duties of the chief have already been mentioned. When his people were visited by drought or epidemic, or when he fixed the day for the beginning of the millet harvest, he made an offering of flour and of beer poured into a pot in the ground at the grave of a dead chief. The village headman made similar offerings to the spirit of his dead predecessor. The spirits of the dead Nyanja chiefs, ousted by the Yao invasion, were regarded as still powerful in the homeland of their people. For instance, Kangumba, whose shrine was on Mount Soche, used to be appealed to for rain, and on the principle that the most appropriate mediator between a dead man and the living is a descendant of the former, the Yao chief, Kapeni, when he wished to propitiate 771 631 622 775 782

[1] Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, pp. 177-9; Swanson, 2, 1923, p. 280.
[2] Codrington, 1898, p. 310; see also Shepiro, 3, 1893.
[3] Young, T. C., 4, 1932, p. 37.
[4] Hetherwick, 4, 1907, p. 129.
[5] Werner, 1906, p. 270; Swanson, 4, 1922, p. 311.
[6] Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, p. 63.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

slavery in that a trader could at any moment send some of his own slaves to the coast, was actually quite a separate institution.

Although the advent of the White Administration stopped both domestic slavery and the slave-trade to the coast, both of which were vitally important elements in Yao economy, it did nothing to decrease or reduce the variety of the wants of the Africans. On the contrary, it obviously increased those wants. The missionaries, who were the first Whites to settle in Nyasaland, were forced to import large quantities of cloth and beads so that they could buy foodstuffs and pay their labourers. They quite unintentionally, therefore, became competitors with the Yao in this trade. By some accounts their goods were both superior and cheaper. As early as 1878 the African Lakes Company was sponsored by the Church of Scotland Mission, so that it could take over the trading part of their dealings with the Africans. The planters and traders who began to settle in the highlands after 1890 brought more and more cloth, beads and other trade goods into Nyasaland to pay wages and buy foodstuffs.

When the Protectorate was proclaimed in 1891 and the Administration started to put down domestic slavery and the trade in slaves to the coast, the monopoly of trade in goods fell directly into the hands of the Whites. After 1893, when coinage was introduced, the economy of the country rapidly changed from one based on barter with slaves and ivory as the main outgoing commodities, and slaves, calico, beads and brass rings as the incoming commodities, to an economy in which the wants had become even more diversified. In 1895, the British Central African Gazette could record:

> The wants of the people of this part of the world not long ago were limited to sufficient calico to clothe the family, but in one short year their wants now include boots, size and quality a minor point, turbans, coats, and in fact at a distance the half-naked native of yesterday has the appearance of Sikh soldiery.[1]

That the Yao took to the use of money is illustrated by the Acting Commissioner's statement in 1897: 'The Yao thoroughly appreciate having a currency. It has proved, in fact, a great step towards civilizing the native of this part of Africa. He is now able to accumulate his earnings, which formerly in the days of a [1] Vol. i, 2 (Sept. 26th, 1894).

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

175 When Livingstone passed the Lake in 1866 he found Mponda living in approximately the same place as his successor does to-day, and he mentioned that Kawinga was living on the west of Lake Malombe.[1] He also mentioned that the Machinga dominated the whole of this area, showing that by this time there had been considerable movement into it. When the Church of Scotland Mission was established at Blantyre in 1876, Duff MacDonald recorded that the disposition of the chiefs was as follows: Mlumbe to the north-west of Zomba; Kapeni near Blantyre at Sochi; Mpama at Chiradzulu; Kawinga at Chikala; Malemia on the south-west side of Mount Zomba, and the Matipwiri at Mount Mlanje.[2] These groups, except for Kawinga, still occupy the same positions to-day. At this time most of the movement into Nyasaland had ceased, and the Yao invaders had already set themselves up as rulers over the indigenous Nyanja. At the same time the Ngoni were making frequent forays into the Shire Highlands and the rest of Southern Nyasaland, so that the position was far from stable.

162 The distribution of the Yao to-day reflects the history of their movement into Nyasaland. The districts nearest and fanning out from the point of entry into Nyasaland, viz. the area due east of Fort Johnston, contain the largest proportion of Yao. The more distant the districts are, the smaller the proportion of Yao in them.

The Entry of the Missionaries

797 The Missionaries were the first Whites to settle in Nyasaland. When he was in Britain in 1858, Livingstone had recommended 175 the Shire Highlands as a suitable place for the establishment of a Mission. Inspired by his reports, the Universities Mission to Central Africa was founded, and in 1861 Dr. Mackenzie was sent out to establish the Mission. It was an ill-starred venture.[3] From the sociological point of view its significance is that it

[1] Waller, Last Journals, 109.

[2] MacDonald, D., Africana or The Heart of Heathen Africa, Simpkin Marshall (London, 1882), i, 31.

[3] Rowley, H., The Story of the Universities Mission to Central Africa, from its commencement under Bishop Mackenzie, to its Withdrawal from the Zambezi, Saunders, Otley & Co. (London, 1866), and Twenty Years in Central Africa, Wells Gardner, Darton & Co. (London, 1889), 3rd Edition.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

initiated the relationships of Black and White in Nyasaland; and its failure was partly a result of the ambivalent attitude to colonial peoples at that time. The people of Britain were horrified at the cruelties of slavery, but the Mission drew upon itself severe public censure because it took up arms against the Yao slavers in its vicinity. The Mission had to face a very difficult problem. It was ostensibly a teacher of the Gospel. Yet about it the Yao were performing deeds of violence, robbery and murder, and were taking slaves from the Nyanja inhabitants in the area. At the same time hundreds of fugitives and runaway slaves were seeking protection at the Mission. To take in fugitives and runaway slaves was, in African eyes, as political an action as to take physical action against the slavers. Should the Mission close its eyes to these un-Christian barbarities, since they were a part of the secular life of the people, or should it take action against them? Livingstone had had no compunction in releasing slaves, and the U.M.C.A. followed his lead, and not only took in fugitives but actually carried out assaults on parties of slave-raiders. This was the time when the first of the Yao groups under Mpama and Kapeni were penetrating into the highlands. The indigenous Nyanja, whose political and military organization was very weak, ranged themselves around the Missionaries, and tried to use them against the Yao invaders. The situation soon developed into a struggle between the Missionaries and the Yao slavers, in which the Nyanja headmen played very little part. Disaster followed upon disaster, and eventually the Missionaries decided that it would be politic to withdraw from the highlands and allow the situation there to stabilize before they returned. In Britain, however, public opinion had been roused by their militant treatment of the slavers, and the Mission, after losing three of its members, including Bishop Mackenzie, through illness, was moved to Zanzibar in 1862.

After 1862 there were a few expeditions to Nyasaland, but none of great political importance. In 1876, a second and this time successful settlement was made in the Shire Highlands. The Church of Scotland founded a Mission in Blantyre, which comprised a lay section of artisans and a clerical section of preachers. It was particularly careful that any political action should be taken by the lay, and not by the clerical, members, because it was anxious to avoid the censure which its earlier colleagues had suffered. This Mission also felt it could not stand by and see cold murder done in front of its eyes. Yet fugitives came to it as they had to the U.M.C.A., so that the Mission, despite its unwillingness, was inexorably drawn into political relationships with the Yao in the area. The lay members severely punished certain wrongdoers. Eventually an African was murdered at the Mission. They tried the murderer, found him guilty, and allowed a local headman to execute him. The Home Authorities looked upon this action as a trespass from the Mission's proper function. The Mission suffered severe public censure, and several of the lay members were dismissed. It was clear that a Mission in the Territory could not be a mission alone; it could not escape the political implications of the situation, and for the success of its venture some civil authority had to be established.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

The Establishment of British Rule

In the meantime Livingstone's publications were bringing the horrors of the slave-trade home to the people of Britain, and more and more pressure was exerted to bring it to an end. As a result, in 1878, Captain Elton, the Consul at Mozambique, obtained permission to conduct an expedition to Lake Nyasa to enquire into the slave-trade. The British population in the Shire Highlands was now increasing so much that in 1883 a British Consul was appointed. From then on, until the close of the century, Britain followed a militant policy against all slave-traders, amongst whom were the Yao. No active steps were taken to institute a formal government over the territory, until in 1889 the Portuguese appeared at the confluence of the Ruo and Shire Rivers with a large military expedition which they maintained was scientific. Accordingly, on November 21st, 1889, the Acting-Consul declared the territory north of the Ruo to be a British Protectorate. The next year, Mr. A. Sharpe made treaties with most of the Native chiefs in the area. These treaties were later ratified by the Anglo-Portuguese convention of June 1891. It is clear that the British Government was protecting the treaty chiefs against the slave-raiders, and ensuring that no other European power assumed responsibility for this service.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

622 563 167 hand, all villages tend to disappear in time. We should therefore expect more of the headmen who came in during the earlier decades to be forgotten, and the trend should be more pronounced than it is. In fact we know from other sources that immigration of the Nguru, who represent about one-half of the Newcomers, was greatest before 1930, and it is almost certain that the figures do reflect the change in the amount of Nguru immigration, and that the factors which may operate against the trend are not important. As a whole the set of figures suggests that immigration is slowly coming to an end.

622 563 The Aborigines are all Nyanja. Among the Invaders, 70·2 per cent are Yao, 25·9 per cent are Mpotola, and the remainder 3·9 per cent are Nyanja and Nguru. The Mpotola Invaders are practically all in the Ngokwe and Chikweo areas, so that in the other areas (i.e. in Liwonde, Kawinga, Chamba and Mposa) the Yao represent 94·9 per cent of the Invaders; the remainder are Mpotola. Under Ngokwe and Chikweo who are Mpotola chieftains, 54·5 per cent (48 of 88) of the Invaders are Mpotola, and 37·5 per cent are Yao, and the remaining 8·0 per cent are Nyanja and Nguru. Among the 486 Newcomers, 35·8 per cent of the headmen are Yao, 15·4 per cent Mpotola, 43·8 per cent Nguru and 4·9 per cent are mainly Nyanja. In general, therefore, we may say that the Aborigines are all Nyanja; the Invaders are Yao in the major area and Mpotola in the other area; and the Newcomers are predominantly Nguru from Portuguese East Africa, though there is a fair proportion of Yao who have come from other Nyasaland districts.

622 795 797 There are significant differences among the three categories of headmen in their religious affiliations. In general there are more Moslems (71·8 per cent) among all headmen than Christians or Pagans. But there are more Moslems among the Invaders than among either the Aborigines or the Newcomers.[1] There are more Pagans among the Newcomers, but the proportion of Christians among the Aborigines and the Newcomers is about equal (25·0 per cent and 21·9 per cent). These differences in religious affiliations are consistent with the different historical backgrounds of the two groups. The Invaders are the descendants of the Yao slavers, who in the past had been in intimate

[1] Invaders = 91·1 per cent; Others = 63·9 per cent; Diff. of per cent = 27·2; S.E. of diff. = 3·7; C.R. = 7·2; $p < 0{\cdot}0001$.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

TABLE VI

RELIGIOUS AFFILIATION OF ABORIGINES, INVADERS AND NEWCOMER HEADMEN

Religious Affiliation	Numbers			Total	Percentages			Total
	Aborigine	Invader	Newcomer		Aborigine	Invader	Newcomer
Moslem . .	17	184	296	497	70·8	91·1	63·5	71·8
Pagan . .	1	4	68	73	4·2	2·0	14·6	10·6
Church of Scotland .	3	10	59	72	12·5	5·0	12·7	10·4
Roman Catholic .	2	1	33	36	8·3	0·5	7·1	5·2
Other Christians .	1	3	10	14	4·2	1·5	2·1	2·0
Total . .	24	202	466	692	100·0	100·0	100·0	100·0
Unknown .	1	3	20	24
	25	205	486	716

Combining Roman Catholic and other Christian totals.
$n = 6$; $\chi^2 = 56{\cdot}48$; $p < 0{\cdot}0000$.

contact with the Arab slave-traders and had taken over Islam from them. To-day the chiefs are still frequently called 'sultan'. All the chiefs in the Machinga area are Moslems except possibly the Malemia who was installed in 1947. He was brought up as a Christian but the strong Islamic tradition behind his status is reflected in the star and crescent on his ceremonial headdress. The Nyanja, however, were influenced by the Missions from the start and the Nguru were not as directly concerned in the slave-trade and were therefore less affected by Islam. They have been easily converted to Christianity. Among them too there are more Pagans. The difference in religion here is largely a reflex of the political relationships of the headmen. In other words, the Yao stoutly maintain that they are Moslems merely because Islam is one of the distinguishing marks of the Yao and of the Invaders in particular. It would be difficult for some of them to maintain their point in face of strict Moslems, for many of them follow the tenets of Islam in only the most cursory way. An Nguru therefore admits to being a Pagan more readily than a Yao, because he cannot identify himself with the Invading group.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

622 785 787

Kinship with the Chief

692 693

The most important way in which the three categories differ, however, is in the degree to which they are associated with the chief. While the Invaders are identified with the chief because of their association with him in the invasion, they are also tied to him to a greater degree by various kinship links than the other categories of headmen.

Although the exact composition of the Invading groups will never be known, it appears from the accounts of old men, that the groups were made up primarily of the chief and his younger brothers, together with their sons and slaves, and some unrelated followers. Other chieftaincies and village headmen have sprung from the chief's lineage. For example, Kawinga was the leader who brought the present Kawinga-Liwonde group into Nyasaland. The first man to be called Kawinga left the Lujenda River where he was living with an elder relative called Nsanama, whose exact genealogical connection I have never been able to determine. Accompanying them was Liwonde, a younger brother of Kawinga. As they passed through the country just west of Lake Chiuta they encountered the Mpwela under Chikwero, and these joined up with Kawinga and his relatives and went to Kongwe on the west side of Lake Malombe (in the present Kalembo's area). From this place they were displaced by the Ngoni and returned east and south to the Chikala Range where they displaced Malemia and occupied the heights. Subsequently, Liwonde left the mountain and went to live on the Shire River where the old Government station used to be. From this point on, Kawinga and Liwonde seem to have acted almost independently. Nsanama seems to have stayed with Kawinga. Chamba who was the son of the first Kawinga now set himself up as a chief on the south side of Chikala and Chaoni. Mpusa, the son of the first Liwonde, moved to the shores of Lake Shirwa and set himself up there. Chiwalo, a sister's daughter's son of the first Kawinga, set himself up on the northern fringe of the area. Recently Sowa, a sister's daughter's daughter's

?: Hetherwick M-S (ca. 1908) 1952 FT7 Yao FT7

SOME ANIMISTIC BELIEFS AMONG THE YAOS OF BRITISH CENTRAL AFRICA.

By the Rev. Alexander Hetherwick, M.A., F.R.G.S., of the Blantyre Mission, British Central Africa.

The original home of the Yao tribe may be roughly described as the large and lofty plateau which lies to the east of Lake Nyasa, and is bounded by the Rivers Rovuma and Lujenda. Forty years ago, about the time that Livingstone first entered the country, they began to be pressed on the north by the Magwangwara, and on the east by the Makowa tribes. These invasions caused them to move, some westward down to the shores of Lake Nyasa or the banks of the Upper Shire River, and others northward to the Shire Highlands, Mount Zomba and the eastern slopes of Mount Mlanje. In every case they succeeded in either subjugating or expelling the original Mazwi or Manglanje inhabitants of those districts, and in no case have they lost their own independence.

Till about fifty or sixty years ago the Yaos were untouched by any external influences, and when at last the Arab and coast traders from Kilwa and Zanzibar began to visit and trade with them they appear to have been little affected by contact with these visitors. Only a few of the younger men aped at following Mohammedan tenets, and these only grafted on to their still cherished belief in the old fetiche of their fathers. The Koran, or a few of its texts, was added to the many other charms they had already hung about their necks. The faith which the first missionaries found them in possession of when they entered the country twenty-five years ago may therefore be held to be the constituted creed of the tribe from time immemorial.

The foundation of the Yao religion is to be found in the lindo, the soul, shade or spirit which every human being possesses, and which is the inspiring agent in his life. They profess to give no definite description of the nature or characteristics of this soul. In their minds however it is allied with the shadow, and would seem to bear to the body the relation which a picture has to the reality. Their word for a shadow is chiwili, which is also the term that they use to denote a picture, and pictures they associate with the shades or shadows of the dead. I have known native women to enter a room where pictures were hung on the walls "because of the mondo, souls, which were in them." The photographic camera was at first an object of dread, and when it was turned upon a group of natives they scattered in all directions with shrieks of terror. "The European,"

III. THE ENTRY OF THE WHITES

175 The first settlements in Nyasaland were in
● 177 the Shire Highlands where a Church of Scotland
649 Mission was built in 1876. In 1878 the African Lakes Company was founded to take over the trading activities of the Mission. As the White population grew the necessity for some non-missionary organization to regulate the relationships between Africans and the growing body of White settlers, who now included planters and traders as well as missionaries, became more and more pressing. Eventually in 1883 a British Consul was appointed. In 1891 to meet the activities of the Portuguese, a Protectorate was established and the military measures that had been proceeding against the slave traders were now intensified.

175 The military police used by the British author-648 ities had arms which the Yao could not withstand, and even the most successful of Yao military groups was soon destroyed. Breech-loading rifles outshot the Yao's muzzle-loading guns and cannon were also used by the British in some actions. The British had a force of Sikhs well-trained in military manoeuvres. Even the previously impregnable Mount Cikala, so long held by Kawinga and his forces, was successfully assaulted. The superior arms of the British left an indelible impression on the Yao who had long conducted successful military campaigns, and in due course these arms came to be identified with the force of the white tyrants of the Whites.
One of the more immediate results of the success of White armaments was that certain Yao chiefs seized the initiative and used the British forces as a tool in their own political machinations.
The history of the rise of Kalembo, although his country is outside the area of study of this paper, is interesting in this respect. Before the Whites came Kalembo, younger brother of Mwaula, who was the father of the notorious Mpondo, was an insignificant character. Just before the

10: Sanderson D-5 (ca. 1920)1922 FT7 Yao FT7

The men and boys now pass through the arch in order of seniority; each splashes himself with the water in the trough, but neither spouts nor rinses the mouth. The women come next, led by the head-wife of the chief; the latter rinses her mouth and, instructed by the doctor, repeats a prayer similar to that offered by her husband. The remainder of the women merely splash themselves, like the men, before passing through the arch. All then return to the village, where the pyapile is continued. 751 796

Finally the doctor takes the hammer-head from the trough and hands it to the chief, who refits the haft into it, and, a hoe having been placed on the ground, goes through the form of forging the latter by beating it with the hammer. He then scrapes the ground with the hoe as if clearing a place overgrown with grass; he does not dig with it as in hoeing up the ground for planting seed. After this rite the chief again bathes in medicated water similar to that in the trough, and the ceremony is complete.

Whereas the pyapile ceremony and its adjunct, the rite of the arch, are now but rarely performed, no Yao will omit the rite of purification after a death in his family. This ceremony consists of two essential parts, both protective against the ndala, a disease characterised by dropsy and supposed to be contracted by contact with a corpse, or by association, especially by sharing a meal, with those who have been in such contact. The first of these parts is bathing in certain medicines, which protects the bather from ndala, and the second consists of a sort of communion meal, shared by all friends and especially relatives with those who have been contaminated, and designed to protect those friends and relatives. [178] 751 764 796 783

The decoction for bathing is made by soaking the roots of lapodondoti and lambonda in water, together with the bark of mbonwa, one piece each from the east and west aspects of the tree; the water assumes a reddish tint, and the whole body is bathed. 751 797 828 765

The communion meal consists of porridge made from any kind of flour or of rice, and some ngunda beans. In the latter some scorched and powdered root of mtondangalala is mixed, with a little salt. All near relatives of the deceased must partake of this meal, as well as their wives and their near relatives; part is carefully put aside for the use of any relative unable to be present at the ceremony. [262]

Latterly, since the spread of Islam among the WaYao, this rite has become confused with the distribution of food to the poor at the funeral of a Muslim, and the Arabic word sadaqa ("charity") is now generally used for it, to the exclusion of its wider, correct meaning. [177] [177]

It may be mentioned here that after the death of a child the father is denied access to his wife for a period of about three weeks, and the first act must be one of coitus interruptus. 765 797

MERRIATH SANDERSON.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

months November to March inclusive. Diagram 1 shows the distribution of the rainfall during the year. Very little rain falls during other months. The initial rains of the year are ushered in by convectional storms and very heavy downpours. This causes a heavy run-off, flooding of the rivers and lake shores, and much erosion of the parched land which by this time has become very dusty. During December there is usually little rain for a short period of a week or two. After that the rains change their character and become more steady and drenching. They decrease in March and April, and thereafter, little rain falls.

Diagram 1. Rainfall in Lowdoo and Four Jomoroo Districts. This diagram shows that almost the whole of the rainfall occurs between November and April.

The Yao concept of the seasons follows this feature of the climate. The year is divided into two seasons, called cuku, the wet season, and cuu, the dry season. The wet season is the one in which most agricultural activity is carried out. The gardens are hoed up and planted, weeded and tended, and the crops harvested, between the months of October and May. During the dry season, in contrast to the busy wet season, there is much visiting and social activities are resumed. Dances and initiation ceremonies also are mostly held during the dry season. The only agricultural work done during this time is the clearing of the bush and the stacking of the brushwood ready for burning.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

The temperatures are high. I have no records for the three stations in the area because recording has started only recently. It is hottest during the months just preceding the rains, i.e. September to December, and coldest during May to August. I have never heard of frosts in the area so it is unlikely that the temperature falls below freezing point. Hornby records the mean maximum temperature for Liwonde as 82·3° F. and the mean minimum temperature as 59·3° F. These are for Liwonde station which is in the Shire Valley. The temperature for the plains and the highlands is probably a few degrees less.

Vegetation

The natural vegetation in this area varies from thick rain forest along the permanent watercourses to open grassland in the marshy patches. In forestry reserves and other places where the vegetation has not been cut out, trees 20 to 30 feet high predominate with thin undergrowth. Along the Shire Valley much of the vegetation is untouched, but in the highlands and on the plain most of the unprotected forest has been cut out for garden lands. In the open spaces between trees the land is covered by elephant grass six to eight feet high.

Population

The density of the population in Nyasaland as a whole is high in comparison with that in the surrounding territories.[1] Within the Territory itself the densities in some districts are as high as anywhere in Africa.[2] The population as a whole is concentrated in the highland districts of Dedza and the Shire Highlands. The districts in which I worked are less densely populated than most of the districts in the Southern Province, but of average density

[1] Expressing densities as total population per square mile. Nyasaland, 155 (1945); Tanganyika, 170 (1948); Portuguese East Africa, 125 (1938); Southern Rhodesia, 115 (1948); Northern Rhodesia, 30 (1948).

[2] Chiradzulu district, 1949; Chola, 1919; Zomba, 1514. Nyasaland Census, 1945, Table 8.

121 impressed on people's memories and remembered by most of the people. Thus it 125 was desirable to find a useful reference date between 1910 and 1940. It might be thought that the death of King George V would be memorable. However, though all who were old enough at the time could remember the witchdoctors, only a few could remember the death of King George.

125 This skeleton chronology was filled in by events of more local significance. For example, Kawinga's brick house was built in 1929, the present Nyambi succeeded in 1931, &c. In addition, in particular hamlets there were men who had been in the Army, or had been to work in South Africa or Southern Rhodesia. Usually they could recall the date of going and sometimes of return, though they may have lost count of the intervening years. Both dates were often useful points. A small minority had actually recorded the dates of birth and death of children.

In addition to this, it was possible to fix the ages of the young children by reference to harvests, since the Yao reckon two years in retrospect, 'last year' meaning before the last harvest and 'the year before last' meaning the period before the harvest before last. Before the year before last, all time is merely date-less, the only indication of the period being the pitch of the voice in which it is said or the presence or absence of an exclamatory 'E!' before speaking.

125 Particular care was taken to secure the ages of women and the dates at which they had borne children. There was, as mentioned above, some reticence in mention-
(129) ing the names of dead children, but this was usually met successfully by questioning the women's male relatives who were generally more communicative on these points.
(129) In spite of the care taken to obtain this information, it was impossible to fix the ages of six women in the sample, and they have been excluded from the major part of the analysis. In addition, there were thirty-nine men who were not available for questioning. These were all adults, the husbands of women in the hamlets. The 105 Yao are matrilineal and matrilocal, and men tend to spend much of their time away from the hamlet of their relatives-in-law. Since they are in many ways strangers in the hamlets no information could be obtained about them.

2. The Ethnical Background to Fertility

All the hamlets visited were occupied by members of the Yao tribe. The Yao are an Islamized people who achieved the questionable distinction of being efficient slave raiders at the end of the nineteenth century. They are a matrilineal and predominantly matrilocal people living in hamlets of from about 5 to 100 here or more.

(262)

Table 1. Age of Women at First Marriage

Date of birth	Age of women at first marriage												Date of birth
	12–14	15–17	18–20	21–23	24–26	27–29	30–32	33–35	36–38	39–41	42–44	Total
Under 40	1	6	1	18	6	6	1	1	—	—	—	33	18·1
40–49	6	6	1	10	5	6	1	1	—	1	1	42	18·1
Over 49	—	1	1	1	6	1	1	1	—	1	—	14	18·6
Totals	7	14	13	30	17	13	3	3	—	2	1	100	100

10: Sanderson D-9 (ca. 1920)1922 FT7 Yao FT7

A Note on Ceremonial Purification among the WaYao, Nyasaland.

By Rowlands Sanderson, M.B.C.S., F.R.G.S.

One of the effects of European influence in Africa is the breaking up of tribal organization and discipline. The rights of the individual being no longer subordinated to the common good, customs formerly observed by the village community as a whole die out, while those affecting the individual are still practised.

This tendency is well seen in the ancient ceremonies of purification among the WaYao which are now rarely performed collectively, though the native, however highly "educated," still goes to the doctor to obtain the necessary medicines for cleansing, for instance, the contamination caused by contact with a corpse.

These collective ceremonies have already been described by various writers in respect of both Upper[1] and Lower,[2] but the Yao tribe have not, I think, been given in detail, and the following notes may not, therefore, be altogether valueless.

The Pepele ceremony (Ungapele, "to sweep") is common to most Bantu tribes. In its simplest form it used to be performed annually by the WaYao, at the beginning of the twelfth month, most of the months (lunar) being kept by means of a "calendar."[3] The whole village is thoroughly "spring-cleaned," all rubbish

* In this, when the game is played on Old Boxing Night in the morning, Father Christmas Myer calls out, the song in Swahili runs:—

Tuwe, pawe, ugonda na mwaga,
Tuwe, pawe, Bwana mzee.

Tuwe, pawe, ulipo pata mwaga,
Tuwe, pawe, I shall not be there day more.

Words repeated, antiphonally, by the bidden hall.

† Sir Harry Johnston, K.C., "The Bantu Tribes," pp. [illegible], [illegible], Annual Report, Bureau American Ethnology, 1901.

‡ Duncan, "Before the Mountains" [illegible], 1906, [illegible].

§ A "calendar" consists of a strong twig in two pegs in the wall of the house, or between two poles, on which are threaded twelve pieces of wood, bamboo or cornstalk. One of these is moved to the other end of the strong twig when a new month is seen.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

Native Authority, to the Native Authority, and eventually to the District Commissioner if the case is one which he will countenance. In practice, most cases reach the chief and go no further. Most people accept his decision. Thus the chief has important judicial functions. 692 643

The Chief as his People's Representative

In special situations where the welfare of the chiefdom as a whole has been endangered by an infringement of the mores, the chief may take action. For example, a chief prosecutes a village headman who allows a woman in his village to bear her first child before she has been through the lisiwo ceremony. Every woman who becomes pregnant for the first time must undergo this ceremony, during which she is instructed in child welfare and child care. If she bears a child without undergoing the ceremony, she is said to have 'spoilt the country' (ipalowe ilambo), in the sense that she has besmirched its reputation.[1] 643 687 843

Chiefs usually call in magicians[2] to smell out 'those responsible for keeping back the rain.'[3] When the rains fail as they did in 1948-9, their failure is held to be due to the magic of some evilly disposed person. It then becomes the chief's duty to call in a magician to indicate who this person is. The fees for this duty are paid by the chief himself on behalf of his people. 643 787 821

The chief also acts as a representative of his people when they are affected as a whole. For example, Nyambi called in a magician after man-eating lions had taken some of his subjects. This magician called for the hearth-stones and domestic utensils from all the villages in the area, and built them up into a pyramid over which he made some anti-lion medicine. This was to clear the whole chiefdom of man-eating lions. 643 789 793

Nowadays, the chief's representation of his people is seen more clearly in his position in the Administrative framework.[4] The chief represents the Administration to his people since they approach it through him. At the same time the Administration clearly treats him as the representative of his people and consults 643

[1] I was told in Mpondo's area that the women undergo this ceremony after the birth of the child, but that it is still obligatory.

[2] Kamwe ulo—lit. 'to tie or bind the rain', in the sense of to make it a prisoner.

[3] I have dealt with this aspect more fully in 'The Political Organization of the Yao of Southern Nyasaland'.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

TABLE IV

ORIGIN OF VILLAGES WHICH HAVE ARRIVED IN THE KEWINGA-LIWONDE AREA SINCE THE WHITE CONQUEST AND ARE STILL THERE

Origin	1946–1949	1950–1953	1954–1957	1958–1961	1962–1965	1966–1969	Total
Northern Areas:
Fort Johnston . . .	—	—	—	6	—	1	7
Nyambi	—	3	—	1	1	2	7
Jalali	1	—	10	6	1	3	21
Southern Areas:
Malemia and Nsanungi	—	—	—	1	7	18	43
Zomba	—	—	—	4	7	4	15
South of Zomba . .	—	—	—	2	1	3	6
Other Nyasaland Areas:
Port. E. Africa . . .	—	—	—	3	—	2	5
Unknown	13	36	111	37	6	30	233
	—	—	—	2	1	31	34
Total	14	39	121	60	24	104	411

Africa. We have no record of how many villages have been lost to the Southern or Northern area from Kewinga-Liwonde area, so that we cannot evaluate the significance of the gain of 64 villages from Southern areas, and of only 15 from the Northern areas. The density of population in Malemia's area is 268 per square mile, and the average density of the Shire Highlands is about 156·6. It may well be that there is now a movement out of the Shire Highlands into the less densely populated Liwonde-Kewinga area.

THE PRINCIPLE OF PRIMACY

Migration and invasion have been the keynote of Machinga histories: village headmen recount with pride how their ancestors moved into Nyasaland with their bands of slaves and followers. 'The East' is the traditional home of the Yao and even young men who have never been there proudly say, 'We come from the East'. This sentiment is reflected in the belief that the rains from the east are beneficial and give rise to good crops, while the rains from the west are detrimental and cause crop failures. Also I was told that important village headmen are buried with their heads pointing to the east.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

The Yao concept of the past is reflected in the principles of political organization of these Machinga chiefdoms. The invasion is the datum point from which rank mainly stems. We may classify modern headmen into: those who were in the area before the Yao invasion, i.e. the Aborigines; the invaders; and those who have come in since the invasion and have had to submit themselves to the Machinga chief, i.e. the Newcomers. The principle behind this classification of headmen is fundamental to Yao political structure. Stated most simply it is the rule that MacDonald quoted in describing the development of local organization: 'However large the settlement may become the man that is first in is the chief or headman.'[1] This is, of course, somewhat of a simplification, but the rule contains the essence of the principle. It was reversed for the Aboriginal Nyanja because the Yao subjugated them. But the claims of the Nyanja chiefs to rank because they had occupied the land first were recognized by the Yao who absorbed them into the social structure in positions of high rank.

But the principle holds among the Yao themselves, and for the Ngoni in their movements after the White conquest. The operation of the principle is clearest in the structure of small local areas such as Chiwalo's. When Chiwalo's area was first settled, just after World War I, there were large tracts of unoccupied land. The first headmen to move into this region were Cigwaja, Kapulusu, Nyanja, Makata and Mumbwa. The local chief Chiwalo followed Cigwaja, but as Cigwaja was one of the leader headmen under Chiwalo during the period of invasion, he now recognized Chiwalo as the chief. The area that is now Chiwalo's chiefdom was divided out among these five headmen. As other headmen came into the area they had to approach one of these five for land rights. These, when granted, were granted irrevocably to a block to the new village headman who then had sole rights to distribute the land afterwards. If he had the land to spare, he may have granted a portion of it to yet another village headman, and this action was also irrevocable. The land occupation pattern in any particular area is therefore extremely complex, because in addition to the village garden areas, indivi-

[1] MacDonald, Africana, i, 141. See p. 11 above.

Schwanse D-5 (no. 1910) 1922 FT7 Tsa FT7

Lomdzi Mlungu is the prophet of Isandzu, a man of great height who walks the round of the country, stopping from kill-up to kill-up along "the fairy way," the "Mlela wa Lomdzi Mlungu," which is supposed to run right around Nyamdzeni and never to cross a river, starting and ending somewhere near the junction of the Skiri with the Sandzeni river. As he goes, he can be seen from a hundred miles away. He carries the Isilimbo instrument and plays on he violin, singing:

"Kulwa [illegible] mapu Gungupu Lutiga mapu [illegible] mabiwa [illegible], mabi"—
"You my cat (in trouble) with the antique theodolite I must roll up the maps, this season of Sandzeni" which might be rendered, "You people grumble about small troubles, so I will teach you to know better by inflicting great ones." Where he is seen, there will be famine.

It will be convenient here to allude briefly to some of the beliefs concerned with meteorological phenomena, as some of them have a bearing on native religious beliefs. The remarks made under this heading for the Amayeni hold good for the Yao. The morning and evening stars are called Nyamdzeke and Nyamyalungu, the good crab and the bad crab. They are looked upon as the two wives of the moon, one of whom feels him as well that he grows fat, the other who does not, so he wastes away. The constellation of the Pleiades is called Dzuka; the Milky Way, Lutinga mulu, "the warriors of the night," when high in the heavens, dawn is near. When shooting stars are seen, natives exclaim "mapulo mlungu!" Mapulo is a many-pointed arrow. Eclipses are recognized but no explanation is vouchsafed. Thunder is supposed to be the noise of rain falling in the heavens before it reaches the earth. The rain is sometimes supposed to be the condensing steam from an enormous pot of water boiling over a furnace fire in heaven. The lightning is conceived as a lizard-like animal which dwells in the clouds and darts out from behind them and comes to earth and breaks up trees and may kill a man. Mire is supposed by the Yao to be its movement. The animal is called Njoni, and is the same as Mjoniko of the Ankipsia who consider the mire to be the broken eggshell of the lightning dragons' eggs. There is a large red wingspread fly, a species of Hymenoptera also called Njoni, which is in some way connected with the lightning. No Yao child would ever touch this fower. Children are always advised never to seek shelter under a big tree but always to make for a bamboo thicket, for if the lightning strikes the bamboo and splits it, it will get caught inside the hollow stem.

Gales of wind are said to emanate from a plant called Chungulu. It is described as having two prongs like an elephant's trunk and others like two fingers. It is found on the tops of very high mountains, growing alone and surrounded by bare rock. This plant is used by medicine men to gain supernatural powers. Chungulu is also the name of a parasitic plant on the diseased trees in Nyamdzeni.

The world is taken by the natives as they find it; to them no explanation for its being is necessary. So far as I can find out, there is no idea among the Yao of a Creator. The

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

Further enquiries may reveal that this is only a section of a larger village, possibly a hundred or more yards away.

The boundaries of a village may not always be clear. Clusters of huts which are part of one village may be physically nearer another, but in the minds of the Yao, who see not only the huts but also the social relationships of the people occupying them, there is no confusion at all. As a general rule the villages are fairly compact and clearly demarcated from others, and even strangers have no difficulty in recognizing the autonomy of the group which is expressed in many different ways. MacDonald recorded that formerly a headman performed a certain amount of ritual which symbolized the unity of the village.[1] Much of this has fallen away, but the unity remains.

The ritual surrounding the foundation of a new village bears testimony to its persisting political significance. In this ritual the unity of the group, against other similar groups, including the village from which it has sprung, is expressed. On first arrival at a new village site the men build grass sheds, beginning with that of the headman. That night the headman pours a cone of sacred flour at the root of a tree on the site, and asks the spirits of his ancestors whether the site is propitious. Early next morning he examines the cone to see the answer. If a side of the cone has collapsed it does not augur well and another site is selected. If the cone is still whole it is taken that the spirits acquiesce, and permanent huts can be started. The headman then goes into the bush to find medicines[2] which he mixes with groundbeans. That night, with the medicated groundbeans in the hut, the headman has intercourse with his wife. In the morning those who are not sexually active come to the headman's grass shed to drink some water in which the medicine has been steeped and eat some of the medicated beans with a little porridge, which the headman's wife has prepared from the sacred flour. This medicine is called 'the medicine to strengthen the village' (mitwa wakulimbika mwai). Until then all members of the village should have been continent but after this sexual relationships may be resumed. The object of the medicine is to prevent those

[1] See pp. 31-2.

[2] Nkhalangwa and ulwa, two plants commonly used for protection against witches. See i.e., p. 111.

3:Stanner D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

764

toward the east. After adjusting the body in its place, the adzie would tear open the shroud over the sun, and pour on to the place some powdered beads to be used by the dead man as money in the hereafter. Except in the case of chiefs, no objects were buried with the dead, contrary to Macdonald's description[1] of the Amangoche. The pole on which the body had been carried to the grave was broken into bits and together with any stick that had been used to measure the body for the cave, was placed in the grave. The opening into the chamber was then closed by a mat fastened over it by pegs and supported by pieces of wood. The men chambering out of the well, pushed the first earth backward into the grave with their elbows, after which the rest of the earth was shovelled in quickly, and a heap made at the surface. The ground about this mound was swept clean with a bunch of leaves by some one walking backward so that no footprints were left; the bunch of leaves was thrown on top of the mound. No medicine was put in the grave, nor were the household utensils placed on the mound, as Macdonald states concerning the Amangoche.[2]

[114]

For some years past, the type of grave made among the Yao has resembled that of the Angoniyo,[3] a long pit with a chamber scooped out along the whole length of one side. In this, the corpse is placed in a fully extended position so that it lies on its back with the feet toward the east. With this exception, the account given above holds good for the present day. The method of suspending the corpse in a mat slung on forked sticks within the grave, mentioned in Africana,[4] is not found among the Amachinga Yao.

764
765

On the way back to the village, two men lead, followed by the men, the women, and lastly, by the other men. First, all wash, the men upstream, the women downstream; no one may wash another's back. The hoes used in digging the grave are also washed; hoes are never washed on any other occasion.

During the funeral, some responsible old man is left in charge of the village with several younger men to assist him. Just before the return of the funeral party is expected, the old man sends one of the younger men to set medicine at the side of the path along which the mourners will pass. This medicine is made from the bark of the mpingo tree and is used for purification; it is placed in a shard. Each person as he arrives at the spot squats down, dips the little finger of each hand into the medicine, and passes the fingers between the little toe and the third toe of the corresponding foot. The last mourner throws any remaining medicine into the bush. As they near the village, a gun is fired and wailing is renewed for a few minutes, after which it ceases altogether. The old man who has been left in charge of the village always inquires whether all has gone well at the interment.

[114]

765

That evening, the time is passed in singing chinkhoko.[5] All those who attended the burial, sleep in the village, and if the deceased's relatives can afford to provide the necessary food, all remain in the village for a number of days equal to the period which elapsed between death and burial. Sometimes, when burial was long delayed, the mourning party

[1] Op. cit., vol. 1, p. 90.
[2] Ibid.
[3] Stanner, "Some as sections of British Central Africa," op. cit., p. 210.
[4] Macdonald, op. cit., p. 90.
[5] Vide infra, p. 347, 370.

759 A sonsi may be met with under different circumstances. An educated native told me of his experience one night when riding a bicycle back to a township where he was employed. Coming along a smooth-faced path with his lamp alight, he became aware of the presence of something in the bush in front and at the side of him. Suddenly his lamp was extinguished and he was left in darkness, while something pushed him over so hard that he fell off his cycle. Picking himself up, he started to wheel his cycle on, when there appeared on the path in front, figures who, rubbing their hands together to produce a phosphorescent glow, held them up in front of the boy's face. He was, however, not molested further, and coming to a group of huts he knew, he went in and made inquiries as to the cause of his experience and was promptly told that there was a sonsi living in a hut near the spot on the path where they had encountered who was supposed to be sonsi. Such a story is given for what it is worth. The boy was about twenty-two years old, a highly educated native with an intelligent appreciation of the worth of superstition.

Some sonsi demonstrations can have no object but to strike terror and keep up the prestige of the sonsi class. Mr. Maggridge wrote me, "A boy of mine was certainly attacked and squeezed about the neck by a sonsi whom he described as naked, huge, and slightly luminous, on the road at the back of my house in Shaniyen. The boy was strolling up and down in the dark and had nothing about him to provoke robbery; he was almost choked before he managed to let out a yell which determined his assailant to let him go. He was not a local boy and no theory of personal spite was supportable. I thought and still think that the motive was to show that even the President's servant (twenty yards from the President's house was not safe from sonsi." It seems possible that some natives with intent to rob had pretended to be sonsi but recognizing that their victim was likely to cause trouble, they went no further.

[924] It is said that the phosphorescence is produced by rubbing in the hands two vegetable substances from local trees and that this is the method the sonsi adopt to announce their presence.

759 Poison Ordeal. As I have said above, when anyone sickens or dies, the illness or death is likely to be considered the work of some sonsi who is sonsi, and action will be taken by the relatives to find him out. The proceedings in such a case where witchcraft is suspected will now be briefly sketched; though I give an account of a case from beginning to end as it is occurred at the present time, it must be understood that the giving of sonsi, the ordeal poison, is now much less common than formerly. A man becomes ill in some village and does not get better, so the matter of him is considered. The sick man's relatives or friends go to the lois-sonsi and approach the subject indirectly by asking him his advice about a number of imaginary cases; they may say, "Things have been stolen from our house." The lois-sonsi and the sonsi replies, "Yes, you have not come to see me about that." This may go on for hours before the facts of the case proper are mentioned to him. Finally, they tell him that one of their relatives is ill in the village, the lois-sonsi consulted and advice is given.

[N]

S-Dunne D-4 (ca. 1912) 1922 ??? Tao ???

632 Myoni is a love potion. Men are often anxious that women should ask them for love (ku-pula). A man seeing a woman whom he fancies, takes up some of the dust where she has trodden and mixing this with medicine puts it in his hair. If he must her again, though he takes no notice of her, she will come to him.

787 When crops are harvested, a layer of the sand is laid at the bottom of the store-house, and some, which consists of medicines contained in the skull of or made from the body of a still-born infant, is then put in and the store filled. In this way, he who has only a small 249 garden may be sure that his grain will last a long time. Similar medicine is put in gardens with the first ripe or lowest heavy crops. A man on the approach of the planting season should never give away seed to anyone until his own seed is put in or it may bring bad luck to his crop. This is evidently a superstition arising from the fact that if he gives seed away, he may not have enough left to raise a crop sufficient to support his family. Some people are mentioned "lucky at planting pumpkins, other people when they plant, reap only watery pumpkins." A man, therefore, will often ask one of the lucky people to plant his pumpkins for him. My hospital boy always got the cook to plant his pumpkins.

787 A man wishing to become a person of importance, with a village of his own, takes a
● medicine made from a certain tree and then builds his hut in a new place, hoping people will flock to him. The tree is known as shakamiti. Another medicine, taken in the belief that people will flock to a man in consequence, is made from the bark called mnin. Cf. Mnin placed at the threshold to attract visitors.

787 Conjuring. There are other performances akin to magic in the eyes of the natives,
79 which I have never had the opportunity of witnessing but which would appear to be of the nature of juggling or possibly hypnotism; some resemble the tricks of jugglers, others are more like some of the performances in India. I certainly suspected that they had been learned from men at the coast (Swahili), but I am assured that they belong to the Tao dynasties.

Kaonkenje, a Tao of Chimdumbe, well-known at dances and Ungapa, after some preliminary dancing, stands still and is covered by a cloth; when the cloth is again removed, he is discovered with a number of squealing puppies held in his bare cloth, which he then hands round. He begins to dance again and the persons to whom the puppies have been given watch him and then find they are holding environment, not puppies. Or small fish are handed round and the people find they are holding women's diapers.

Another trick often performed by Kaonkenje was the burial of a man in the ground, covered up completely with earth; at the sounding of the drums the buried man came running in from the back of the wondering crowd.

Kanenge, a Tao of Mahenye's, priest, and medicine man, after an Ungapa ceremony used to put on his red blanket and walk over the hot embers of an enormous fire in the village open space. He admitted that he smeared himself with medicine and an eyewitness told me that when he put his foot on the hot logs, it caused a sizzling sound.

Thegelage was another well-known performer; he used to do the same tricks as Kambonje. He also was possessed of an electric chair and is said to have been able "to tie his ears together behind the back of his head." [787] [788]

Mpankatola's Tao of Mpankatola, is a cage with considerable concern. He is said to be able to produce a lion, or, rather, from a lion's tail and claw. He would offer to show this if there were any brave enough to go through with it. On a moonlight night, he would expose on the ground in a cleared space near a village the tail of a lion held cross-wise in a piece of split bamboo. At the split end of the bamboo, he would place a lion's claw and round this, a woman's belt held in position by three bamboo pegs, around which he would draw a circle of adequal flour. Everyone would then withdraw to a hut in which the course was to take place. After an hour or so, Mpankatola would send some one out to inspect the lion's tail where probably all would be found intact. He might then pretend to be uninterested and sleepy and suggest that some one should go out again in half an hour. Sooner or later, a man would come back, having found the tail gone; then everyone would go out to see what had happened. The pegs would be found in place but the tail and claw gone. A little way off, the split piece of bamboo would be found and further still a head or two from the woman's belt. Then, Mpankatola would pick up, and leaving a little trail of flour on their way, all returned to the hut, while he whistled as if nothing were wrong. Suddenly they would be aroused by the sound as of a lion breaking against the hut walls, as the beasts are known to do, and next, a loud roar. Mpankatola would immediately open the door half-way so that the people could look out into the moonlight and there, a little way off, would be the lion. It would immediately advance towards the house and then, as it prepared to spring for the door, Mpankatola would offer it some of the flour in his left hand, armed with a stirring-stick, strike, in his right hand. As the lion landed, he would strike it on the head with the stick and lo and behold! the lion would vanish and the tail and claw would be found in his hand. [787]

Superstitions. Scattered throughout these notes, particularly under Usual and Disease, mention is made of practices which show a strong belief in superstition. Below are given a number of minor beliefs, and it is interesting to compare these with many well-known superstitions in other parts of the world. [789]

1. A child who cuts the upper incisor teeth first will be unlucky. Such children used to be killed by the Tao. (Other tribes make medicine against the threatened ill-luck.) [775]

2. A woman with polydactylism may not take food out of a cow-store. Otherwise the stock of cows will not last long. (Rudimentary sixth fingers are not uncommon.) [776]

3. An insect called shiguse used which lives in the mud at the bottom of pools, if killed causes the water to dry up. [777]

4. If a boy puts a cotton-spinner in the armpit when learning to swim, he will learn quickly.

5. A man wishing to prevent rain falling on a day he is making a journey, will wrap some of the leaves of the cotonnut tree in his bale cloth and go without detaching. [778]

3:Hanson D-5 (ca. 1912) 1921 FT7 Yao FT7

516 738 769

knees and elbows, at intervals swaying their bodies from side to side and clapping their hands. Sunset then ordered all to go and bathe, men and women separately. As they returned from the stream, rain began to fall.

Intercession on behalf of the sick may be made, especially by anyone who is likely to be accused of causing the illness by witchcraft.[1] The man standing with arms outstretched, downwards and a little in front of his body, the hands supine, takes some water in his mouth and discharges it in a stream on the ground, (probably as a sign of purification of his tongue), and then invoking "all the spirits above," asks that they will intercede to restore health to the sick man and bear witness to his own innocence of any wish to do the sick man injury. Ku-pepa is the word meaning to offer sacrifice and prayer.

755 769

Harvesting and hunting are occasions when sacrifices may be offered. It was formerly the custom for the chief to determine the day on which harvesting of millet should begin. On the day appointed, a big drum was beaten in the village and word passed round; then everyone would go down to his garden, gather a head of millet, and bring it back to the village where it was all handed over to the chief's headwife. After drying and threshing, a little of the grain was laid at the grave of an old chief by one of the reigning chief's advisers, the remainder being again distributed to all the people gathered together in the village meeting-place, who ate it raw. After this ceremony, harvesting began.

769 241 782

In passing through a millet garden, if a child asks his mother to give him some to eat, she plucks a branch or two and reverently laying one at the foot of a mwavu tree for the spirits or at the base of some other tree, if she cannot see a mwavu, she gives the rest to the child.

When a hunting expedition makes its first killing, part of the flesh of the animal is laid at the base of a tree as a thank offering to the spirits and in anticipation of further favors to be vouchsafed. All such offerings are supposed by the natives to be partaken of by the spirits, though they are well aware that they do not actually diminish in quantity. There is an interesting point in this connection: any man who has acted as ndola (undertaker) to some well-known man may appropriate these offerings. In the case of the hunting offering, he will run round the tree, saying, "I am a hyaena, the spirits will not mind me," and will then take part of the flesh-offering and eat it.

782 224

In the same way, a ndola may drink from a grave beer-pot after three days, when the spirits are supposed to have taken what they want.

With the exception of the mwavu tree above mentioned (ndema, Chin.), and possibly another called ndola-ngama (Chin.), which is never used as firewood and which is supposed to be used by women, I do not think there are any sacred trees properly so-called. Miss Werner supposes that many of the big trees (often a species of Ficus) in villages are sacred.[2] The truth is, I believe, simply that a village is made naturally round a big tree which conveniently offers its shade for the village meeting place. The spirits of deceased chiefs may

824 778

[1] This supra, p. 207. [2] The authors of British Central Africa, op. cit., p. 40.

[514] [778] be supposed to live in such trees. They are convenient natural objects for them to occupy, in fact practically the only ones to be found in villages. Trees may secondarily, therefore, be looked upon as in some degree sacred. Almost each town shrine or place of sacrifice may be placed as an offering to the spirits of the departed. But the Tao do not erect little huts in their vicinity, hung about with strips of cotton as is the custom among the Anyanja.

[775] Macdonald* mentions the spirits in connection with Kudu and other hills round Blantyre and supposes them to be the spirits of the places themselves. This I think is unlikely; they would probably turn out to be spirits bearing the names of long departed Anyanja chiefs whom the immigrant Amangoniin Tao conquered just "to be on the safe side," since they had come and taken the country which long ago belonged to the former tribe. When approaching or passing any spot held to be the dwelling place of spirits, salutation is made by clapping the hands.

Spirits of the departed may enter into animals or may take the form of animals, commonly lions and sometimes large snakes (python), but this belief is not so general among the Tao as among other tribes, in my opinion. An animal which is so possessed is called kapolo, from ku-apola, "to be transformed."

[774] Apart from this habitation of inanimate objects above mentioned by natives, there is nothing that points to a belief in Animism among the Tao, so far as I know. Neither hills, rocks, streams, lakes, nor trees have their own spirits, nor are they endowed by the native mind with life.

Deceased persons appear to the living in dreams, the native apparently believing that the deceased appears in his material body.

[776] [787] [791] They believe also in revelation of wishes of the deceased through the medium of the living. The spirit of the deceased is supposed to enter into the medium. The medium, I am informed, is always a woman, never a man. From the descriptions of some of these revelations obtained, there can be no doubt that they are manifestations of a pronounced hysteria. The medium works herself up into a frenzy of excitement and in her delirium gives out the name of the deceased, the voice which speaks being that of the spirit within her. She rolls on the ground and froths at the mouth, uttering the word of revelation which is generally to the effect that some deceased chief's spirit is being neglected at the neglect of his tomb; the voice may go on to say that certain practices are forbidden, or deceased that certain rites be observed by the people. The spirits which possess her are generally spoken of as mzimu, a word which, though sometimes used as equivalent to nature, usually seems to have rather a sinister significance. Insane persons are called mzimu and are thought to be possessed by a spirit, and vapor baths with exorcism may be practised for their cure. In the case of the death of anyone who is possessed, in answer to my interrogation, I have been told that both the spirit which has entered into the man and his own mzimu leave his body.

[514] [784]

* Op. cit., vol. i, p. 92.

Lwembe Mtungi is the prophet of Isoma, a man of great height who walks the round of the country, stepping from hill-top to hill-top along "the fairy way," the "Mlele wa Lwembe Mtungi," which is supposed to run right around Nyamlond and never to cross a river, starting and ending somewhere near the junction of the Shiri with the Sambezi river. As he goes, he can be seen from a hundred miles away. He carries the bilimbo instrument and plays as he walks, singing:

"Kulwa [illegible] mwe [illegible] bulya mwe [illegible] mwembe mwembe ndo"
"Too my out (in trouble) with the midge (bulya) I must call my the wraps, this master of Isoma!"

which might be rendered, "Too people grumble about small troubles, so I will teach you to know better by inflicting great ones." When he is seen, there will be famine.

It will be convenient here to allude briefly to some of the beliefs connected with meteorological phenomena, as some of them have a bearing on native religious beliefs. The meteorite made under this heading for the Anyanja hold good for the Tao. The morning and evening stars are called Kwamlaba and Kwampulungu, the good work and the bad work. They are looked upon as the two wives of the moon, one of whom feeds him so well that he grows fat, the other who does not, so he wastes away. The constellation of the Pleiades is called Ilimbi; the Milky Way, Lidzinga mwlu, "the watcher of the night," when high in the heavens, dawn is near. When shooting stars are seen, natives exclaim "mwapulo wlinjal" Mwapulo is a many-pointed arrow. Eclipses are recognized but no explanation is vouchsafed. Thunder is supposed to be the noise of rain falling in the heavens before it reaches the earth. The rain is sometimes supposed to be the condensing steam from an enormous pot of water boiling over a furnace fire in heaven. The lightning is conceived as a lizard-like animal which dwells in the clouds and darts out from behind them and comes to earth and breaks up trees and may kill a man. Mice is supposed by the Tao to be its excrement. The animal is called Kjiwi, and is the same as Mjumbe of the Ankjaria who consider the rains to be the broken egg-shell of the lightning dragons' eggs. There is a large red compound fly, a species of Hymenoptera also called Kjiwi, which is in some way connected with the lightning. The Tao child would ever touch this flower. Children are always advised never to seek shelter under a big tree but always to make for a bamboo thicket, for if the lightning strikes the bamboo and splits it, it will get caught inside the hollow stem.

Gales of wind are said to emanate from a plant called Chungulu. It is described as having one process like an elephant's trunk and others like two fingers. It is found on the tops of very high mountains, growing alone and surrounded by bare rock. This plant is used by medicine men to gain supernatural powers. Chungulu is also the name of a parasitic plant on the diamond trees in Nyamland.

The world is taken by the natives as they find it; to them no explanation for its being is necessary. So far as I can find out, there is no idea among the Tao of a Creator. The

The hair of the axilla is always removed in men and women, usually by shaving but sometimes in the case of women it is dealt with as in the case of the pubic hair. A man with underarm axillae would be laughed at and referred to as "a man carrying a level in his armpit." The axillary hairs are called mandanga pe mimpanpe (mpanpa, the armpit). 302

The pubic hair, mandanga, is removed by both men and women; in men by shaving, in women sometimes by shaving, but preferably by plucking out after the application of a medicine called mamandanga (ba-mam, to pluck a leaf), which renders the operation easy. It is prepared from the juice which exudes from the bruised bark of the mam-mandanga tree. There is a woman at Malanpa's who has never grown any axillary or pubic hair; she is called "the ragan elephant"; a ragan elephant has no tusks. It may be noted in passing that the woman has borne children. [124]

A few men leave the hair round the anus shaved. Such a service can only be asked of a man's closest intimate, such as a brother-in-law. [607]

I have dealt with tattooing among the Tao in an article, as yet unpublished, on tattooing among the natives of Syamaland.

The teeth among the Tao people are never mutilated in any way, though the Amangoda go in for small file marks at the cutting edge of the incisors. 304

The old Tao women, of whom some may still be seen, used to pierce the upper lip and wear a circular disc of wood often two inches in diameter in the hole; this is called hapidik (Pl. VII, fig. 4). The disc was often made of lead and sometimes of ivory. The lead might be hammered out on the upper surface; it was then called hapidik ba ulali. The disc caused a considerable projection of the upper lip which was much admired. A man, on the other hand, with protruding lips would be nicknamed "the warthog," mamapinda, and considered ill-bred. 304 301 [632]

This hapidik fashion has gone out of late years the shipini or disc worn in the left ear of the men has become more and more fashionable (Pl. II, fig. 2). Originally the shipini consisted of a small disc of lead not larger than a three-penny piece, which lay on the outer surface of the ear, held in place by a stem, hobinji, which pierced the ear and passed into the meatus. Now the fashion is to wear a very large disc, often an inch in diameter, which itself occupies a hole in the substance of the ear of the man; it may be flat-topped and called shipini ska vinaga ("mushroom"), or the upper surface may often be concave, in which case it is called shipini ska utuli (Utuli, a grain mortar). These disks are made of lead and are sometimes called lidini, a recent word and doubtless a corruption of "lead." Others are made of ivory, which may have some geometric pattern on the exposed surface. A shipini used to cost a lead.

Among Tao men and women, the lobule of the ear is often pierced but nothing is worn in the hole except possibly a stalk of grass.

Combs for use and for ornament are worn in the hair by both men and women. The ordinary comb without decoration is called lilumalaga; it is made of a number of pieces 301

301 of bamboo fastened together at one end on the flat side by binding with string, the free ends being sharpened to form the teeth of the comb. If the fastened end is ornamented with beads sewed on in patterns, the comb is called lisumulo (lu-sumulo, to comb). Lisumulo lin [824] shinyombolo from lu-syombola, to be sticky, is the name of a small comb worn purely for ornament. On either side of the base of this comb, pieces of wood variously shaped are glued with the sticky juice from the root of the shinyombolo tree. In this way, a sort of inlay is produced. Pieces of tin cans are sometimes substituted for wood. Women commonly wear in their hair the small shiawolo knife used for tattooing and shaving.

302 The native takes readily to perfumes of European introduction, but previously he was [177] not an entire stranger to the use of such unguents. M'bolo, the bulbous root of a kind of grass which grows near water, contains some aromatic principle which has a pleasant odor. The stem is bent around and fixed into the bulb; this is then covered with beads and slung around the neck. M'ungwa, the Mlanje cedar, is also used, as well as the fruit of a shrub called chiungwa. These substances are scraped into the castor oil used for anointing, and give it a pleasant odor.

No pigments are used on the body. As a sign of great rejoicing, the head and face and perhaps the whole body are covered with ashes, but the natives do not even paint the face with flour on ceremonial occasions.

301 Bands of beadwork are worn around the head, either as a simple band or a band finished off with a bunch in one spot, or with a tassel. Finger rings are worn made of ivory, elephant hoof and horn, lead, and iron wire. There is also a great variety of bracelets and anklets, a list of which is given below.

Chipanda: made of plaited grass, worn chiefly by little girls and women who cannot afford more expensive bracelets. As many as half a dozen may be worn on the wrist.

Likangala (pl. makangala): single circles of solid brass, one half to three quarters of an inch in diameter, worn by women usually as anklets, one or two on each limb. They may still be seen on some of the old women, but as they cause much discomfort, they have gone out of fashion. A man used to be very proud to see his wife adorned with so much wealth and she was content to be so hobbled by her vanity. The hammering up and pulling open of the likangala circle in order to remove it cost a fowl.

Chikungu: a brass bracelet of small calibre; ikungu (pl.) signifies a spiral cylinder made from the same thick brass wire covering the entire forearm.

Likwinjili: like chikungu of thin brass or iron wire, worn on arms and ankles.

Ching'ande: a bracelet of fine brass wire wound round a circular core. All the brass comes from the coast.

Likoso: a large ivory bracelet worn by men and women.

[237] Ukungu: ("stiff tail hairs of an animal"), the bracelet made of the tail hairs of the elephant or the gnu.

Lichuka: the bracelet made from elephant hoof.

776 THE [illegible] TRANSLATED "[illegible]", [illegible]

[364] is swept up, the ground round the house is hoed clean, and the interior scrubbed. Ceremonial beer is brewed by the head-wife of the chief, and after this has been drunk the ashes of the fire used in the brewing are carefully collected and taken to a medicine ("ocan-ruada," or "divinging of paths") where they are deposited. [783] The chief, as representative of his people, bathes in special medicated water, a decoction made from the bark of ng'ungu and ashoan, and the rest of mpingo. [327] This completes the ordinary annual ceremony, at which new fire is not made. [622]

On certain special occasions a more elaborate ritual is carried out; such occasions are the death of a chief, a threatened epidemic of infectious disease, a murder (especially by shooting) and the frequent occurrence of quarrels in the village.

In such circumstances, in addition to the ordinary pyapile ceremony described above, the cartridge sticks of the whole village are removed and all fires extinguished. The discarded sticks and all ashes of the old fires are carried to the meeting of paths, where the former are stuck upright in the ground and the ashes piled together; [372] this is done in procession, all the people taking part. On their return to the village new fire is made by friction by either the chief or his younger brother—usually the latter; fire procured in any other way would nullify the proceedings. Finally [783] all the people bathe in the medicated water used only by the chief at the ordinary ceremony.

751 776 In addition to this special form of the pyapile ceremony, another rite is sometimes performed after the occurrence of a murder or as prophylactic against the spread of epidemic disease. The doctor first makes a kind of trough (lokongwe) from the bark of mtondondo or mpingo, and procures a chirbilibo (or chipungulo) basket—used as a strainer in salt-making. Having collected his medicines he proceeds to the bank of the stream near the usual bathing-place of the village and digs a shallow hole, in which he places the basket; in this he puts the leaves of a certain thorny shrub and covers the whole with the trough, which is banked up with earth so as to be perfectly firm. He then puts his "medicines" into the trough; these are, first, the head of an iron hammer and a piece of slag, both from a smelting furnace. On top of these he puts pieces of the root of a certain tree which has many and particularly sharp thorns, and bits of bark from two trees peculiar for having very straight stems. Having distributed these evenly along the floor of the trough, he fills it with water and then proceeds to construct an arch over the end of the trough furthest from the stream. Two long poles, cut from a kind of tree particularly rich in sap, are planted in the ground, one at each side of the trough and close to it; these are bent over towards each other, and fastened together by means of a strip of their own bark. A bamboo is now planted alongside each, and similarly tied to its fellow. During all these preparations and throughout the ceremony it is essential that the doctor has no knots in any part of his clothing.

The preparations are now complete, and when all the fires in the village have been extinguished the people go in procession to the spot where the doctor awaits them. All must be poorly clad and must have no metal about them.

[622] The chief opens the ceremony. He steps into the trough and taking some of [769] the medicated water thrown in his hands he rinses his mouth with it. He then offers a prayer to the spirits of his ancestors, first stating the emergency and detailing the measures which are to be taken to deal with it (new fire, sweeping, discard of porridge-sticks and shaving). The prayer over, he splashes the water in the trough over his body and passes through the arch, first throwing some gift (beads or, in more modern times, money) into the trough. These gifts, presumably [756] intended as an offering to the spirits, are the perquisites of the doctor, and everybody is supposed to contribute in turn.

19: Sanderson D-9 (ca. 1920)1922 ??? Yao ???

The men and boys now pass through the arch in order of seniority; each splashes 751 himself with the water in the trough, but neither spreads nor rinses the mouth. The 796 women come next, led by the head-wife of the chief; the latter rinses her mouth and, instructed by the doctor, repeats a prayer similar to that offered by her husband.
The remainder of the women merely splash themselves, like the men, before passing through the arch. All then return to the village, where the ngwijile is continued.

Finally the doctor takes the hammer-head from the trough and hands it to the chief, who rubs the haft into it, and, a hoe having been placed on the ground, goes through the form of forging the latter by beating it with the hammer. He then scrapes the ground with the hoe as if clearing a place overgrown with grass; he does not dig with it as in hoeing up the ground for planting seed. After this rite the chief again bathes in medicated water similar to that in the trough, and the ceremony is complete.

Whereas the ngwijile ceremony and its adjunct, the rite of the arch, are now (198) but rarely performed, as Yao will omit the rite of purification after a death in his 751 family. This ceremony consists of two essential parts, both protective against 764 the rebels, a disease characterized by dropsy and supposed to be contracted by 796 contact with a corpse, or by association, especially by sharing a meal, with those who 783 have been in such contact. The first of these parts is bathing in certain medicines, which protects the bather from rebels, and the second consists of a sort of communion meal, shared by all friends and especially relatives with those who have been contaminated, and designed to protect those friends and relatives.

The decoction for bathing is made by soaking the roots of Superbombacaceae and 751
Sanderania in water, together with the bark of mkomwa, one piece each from the 783 east and west aspects of the tree; the water becomes a reddish tint, and the whole 824 body is bathed. 762

The communion meal consists of porridge made from any kind of flour or of (262) rice, and some spinach leaves. In the latter some mashed and powdered root of mtondongolola is mixed, with a little salt. All near relatives of the deceased must partake of this meal, as well as their wives and their near relatives; part is carefully put aside for the use of any relative unable to be present at the ceremony.

Lastly, since the spread of Islam among the WaYao, this rite has become (177) confused with the distribution of food to the poor at the funeral of a Muslim, and (177) the Arabic word sadaqa ("charity") is now generally used for it, to the exclusion of its wider, correct meaning.

It may be mentioned here that after the death of a child the father is denied 766 access to his wife for a period of about three weeks, and the first act must be one 787 of coitus interruptus.

MEREDITH SANDERSON.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Tao FT7

strike out with his adherents to found a new village. A sum of £6 or £7 is a considerable amount in everyday Yao life where the annual cash income of the average individual is not much more. The leader of a dissident group is prepared to forgo this wealth to get one foot on to the lowest rung of the political ladder—that is by becoming a village headman.

Obviously there is a great deal of sentiment attached to the idea of a united village. To the Yao way of thinking a village is broken by fighting or death, and these evils are linked by witchcraft beliefs. The association of death and the break-up of the village is brought out clearly by the funeral ablutions of villagers after the burial of one of their number. An important ingredient in the medicine with which the mourners wash themselves after the funeral, is ikala. It is the earth from a particular type of terminary which is usually about 12 to 18 inches high, upright and almost cylindrical. The crust is very brittle and it is comparatively easy to chip off a piece. When this is done a mass of internal chambers and passages is revealed. The soldier ants, unlike those of other species that retreat into the darkness of their passages as soon as they are exposed, come into the open daylight and swarm in confusion over the fractured terminary. When I questioned my informant about ikala, he kicked the crust off the top of one of the hills and said, 'See all the houses in the village of the ants? I have broken their village. So it is with death. It breaks the village.'

The Yao believe that death 'breaks the village' and that conflicts through sorcery lead to death. Therefore, conflicts are the real cause of village splits. Hence differences must be settled immediately if the village is to persist, because if they last too long one of the aggrieved parties is sure to start using sorcery against its opponents. Those who do move away, go to a distant place because they believe that sorcery operates only where there is social interaction. But the fear of sorcery on the other hand is just as strong a force in maintaining the physical unity of the village. It is while the migration is being planned that sorcery is most likely to be used. This is particularly so if the village break is taking the form of a lineage split. This happened, for example, in Lupunje village.

Kalambo, the sister's son of Lupunje, wanted to leave the village and had gone to seek a suitable site. When he returned he found that one of Mahomet's sons died, after giving birth to quintuplets, some thirty years ago. Deformed children are buried alive. A large number of children is always hoped for and where polygamy is practised, some families are of considerable size, although the mortality among young children is very high. It is, of course, very difficult to state the child-bearing period among natives. It does not start as early as is commonly supposed, and I think the conception is found within about the same limits as among Europeans.

Death. Natives of Nyamlanzi live to a good old age. That such is not the case I have found to be one of the many fallacious beliefs concerning natives which should be relegated to the realm of exploded theories, as I have pointed out elsewhere.[1]

Death in old age is recognized as a natural event but apart from this, all sickness and death were formerly and are still to a large extent looked upon as the result of the machinations of some person, an idea which forms the outstanding feature in their belief in witchcraft, magic.[2]

Here I shall mention the ordinary customs in the case of death. During the last hours of a mortal illness, a man is tended by his wife or wives, the head wife she constantly supporting his head on her lap or against her breast. A woman is similarly tended by her mother, sisters, and friends. As unconsciousness sets in and the extremities become cold, they say, "His spirit has gone and only the heart remains alive."

The native does not like the idea of lingering on and a man on his death-bed will say to his sons, "Now watch me that I die quickly." He may take medicine to help him over that time or he may give his sons instructions as to what to do. Should a man linger unconscious for a long time, friends will ask his sons, "Did he give you any instructions?" If he has done so, the sons will then carry them out. This perhaps consists of building themselves in medicines left by their father, while they stand on the roof of his house. Sometimes, the natives say of a lingering man, "Ah, perhaps he has eaten of a tortoise's heart!" Knowing the phenomenon of the tortoise's heart and believing that by partaking of it, the same property can be conferred on the heart of a man.

When death is manifest, the body is covered with a cloth by a brother, a son, or some other person in attendance. The eyes are closed, the mouth shut, and at the present time, the body straightened out. This, however, is a recent practice copied from the Anyanja, Europeans, and Mohammedans.

Horn of the death must be sent to the chief, and a messenger goes to his village where the chief and his people sit in the village open space. He carries a fowl in his hand. The [illegible] of a single fowl calls the chief and his people. One of the chief's men, seeing the messenger approach with the single fowl, will jump up and take the bird. He is joined by the others and they go away to the cross-roads where they kill the fowl, pluck it, cook it and eat it. In the meantime, the messenger delivers his news to the chief who will produce from his house about eight yards of white calico; if the deceased has been a much respected against all evils — witchcraft, attack by lions, etc. The elements then set about building 981 shelters in which the wali will remain during their term of instruction. According to the number of the wali or the number of places where shelters are built may vary from one, two, or three, to as many as eight. Each of these places is called N'dapalo. They may be many [394] miles apart and are so placed for the convenience of the mothers in various groups of villages who bring the food daily to the group of boys from those villages.

[1] Hugh S. Stevens, "The Witchcraft of Angoni", (Lancet, April 11, 1914, p. [illegible]). [2] Vide infra, p. [illegible].

The boys when they originally left the village were wearing a large bark-cloth covering, with beads and collar, which latter articles have been taken by the n'mbiliko and his assistants. At N'dapalo they wear simply a loin-cloth of bark.

During their stay at N'dapalo, the wali are given animal names by the elements who [333] carry on the instruction of the boys until their return to Lapanda, the n'mbiliko having gone back to his village immediately after the circumcision. The names given to the boys [551] are commonly names of beasts of prey such as Ndibule (Ndule = the jackal), Ndimwani (ndimwani = the leopard), etc.

Certain restrictions as to diet are laid upon the wali by the n'mbiliko, e.g. no meat of 88 an animal killed by a beast of prey, no mushroom, ndumbule. He will not allow any villager 264 to visit N'dapalo after seven p.m. and visitors may only be men who have been through the ceremony. An uninitiated man is called ndulule, one who has not been to his Unyago.

Other restrictions as to foodstuffs may be made by the elements, generally in connection with the mythical origin of such food substances. A finger-shaped yam called Ipate is taboo, as it is said to have first sprung from the grave of a leper, the inference being obvious.
After the Unyago, the boys have to undergo a special doctoring before they may partake of them. Bananas and rice are similarly refused them, the latter on account of a story to the effect that rice grew from the nostrils of a dead man, the idea doubtless having relation to the resemblance of rice grains to maggots. Fish is denied them by some masters of ceremonies, as it is said to have originated from the diaper of a woman which she threw away [325] while bathing.

Each n'mbiliko may have special observances of his own. One near Zomba caused all camera to be roasted in a certain way. Rows of pieces of camera were placed in split [252] bamboo spits and so roasted before the fire in the manner of fish. If roasted in the ordinary way, the camera would split and show the white floury material inside, signified by the yarb ka-kapale. If this is eaten by the wali, it is said that the prepatial wound would reopen.

The length of time spent at N'dapalo varies from four weeks to as long as three or four 881 months. In the first place they must wait till the circumcision wounds of all are completely healed. Delay may be occasioned by complications having arisen in some cases.
Again, permission to return may be withheld by the chief for some reason or other.
Should one of the wali die at N'dapalo, the body is buried out in the bush and nothing [766] is said to the parents until after the ceremonies are over and all have returned to the village.

3: Stevenson D-5 (im. 1918) 1952 FT7 Tue FT7

or after the return to the village. The boys often wear all their headwear and new cloth for several days; after carrying their ngaage for a similar period, they give them up to their elements. Together they go into the bush where they break up their wands and put them either into a pit or in the forked branch of a tree. Before the n'ninkile leaves, he brings to the chief all his takings and these are divided between them.

Mention has been made above of the ngaage and it now remains to consider them more fully. The figures vary in subject, in number and in arrangement. At the ceremony at Kwoimma's, the following were arranged in a long line beginning with the whale and ending with the python before shing'ambong'ngo (Pl. X, fig. 2).

1. Hakangwai ..... the whale (Pl. XI, fig. 7).
2. Ngwem ..... the crocodile (Pl. XII, fig. 1).
3. Chimi ..... the leopard (Pl. XII, fig. 3).
4. Mbanda ..... the zebra (Pl. X, fig. 6).
5. Ngoko ..... the only animate (Pl. XII, fig. 2).
6. Nimmanda ..... the hippopotamus (Pl. XIII, fig. 4).
7. Kwapo (unknown?) ..... (Pl. X, fig. 5).
8. Mbalapi ..... the white antelope (Pl. XI, fig. 8).
9. Wakangwa na shimm-kalala ..... the woman dead in child-birth (Pl. XIII, fig. 3).
10. Lyamo ..... the sun (Pl. XI, fig. 4).
11. Likalam ..... the scorpion (Pl. XII, fig. 6).
12. Mbala ..... the plate (Pl. XI, fig. 6).
13. Limmanda ..... a kind of cloth (Pl. XI, fig. 5).
14. Ngwi ..... the lightning-dwarf (Pl. XIII, fig. 4).
15. Bakam ..... the iguana (Pl. XII, fig. 4).
16. Wanda ..... the moon (Pl. XIII, fig. 1).
17. Lipakam ..... the wild pig (Pl. XI, fig. 1).
18. Sangala ..... the hare (Pl. XI, fig. 2).
19. Kam ..... the python (Pl. XIII, fig. 2).

Beside these, Ngwem, the lake, nearly always appears;[1] Mwezi, the moon, the drunken woman, and certain animals may be represented, and in addition, shinto, "the dwelling place of all the old spirits." Each particular n'ninkile has his favorite figures about which he sings, always commencing, however, with the whale.

Reproduced here is the series of ngaage at Kwoimma's village sketched at the time of my visit. It seems probable that originally the same set of figures was always reproduced. It is hard to trace their significance with any certainty. Natives aver that they are made only for instructional purposes. "The animals are made so that the boys may recognize them, while some of the other figures have reference to customs." They deny the more in-

[1] Cf. Stevenson and Dayas, 'The initiation ceremony for boys among the Tao of Symbaland,' op. cit., Pl. III, fig. 2.

D-Stacks D-6 (no. 1912) 1952 F'57 Tue F'57

T18
B6

interesting possibility of a totemic origin and it is, of course, true that at the present time the Yao have few clan names referring to animals and practically no clan food taboos.

At Mlungwila's village in September 1953, I saw the ingoge figures being made. The long grass was cleared away and the earth heaped up into heaps, roughly of the shape and size of the figures to be made. A number of women were employed carrying water from the stream with which the mounds were well moistened and moulded into more definite form. The outlines of the figures were then drawn in, all by one elderly man, with flour measured on by hand. In drawing nahungwani, it was interesting to note how the efforts to keep to symmetry failed.

Of ngwenu, chinei, ngulu, ndumuulu, mbulupi, mbiti, lipulowe, ntu, I have little to add; the well are told of their habits, whether they are good to eat, whether they are dangerous, etc.; and all the stories about them. Mbunda, the zebra, is always represented in duplicate for some unknown reason. Swapulo is pointed out in reference to a story the boys have been told at Ndapulo, namely, that the hare is good to eat but they must not eat it till after they are married and their wives have borne children; otherwise they will be children. The superstitions regarding the hare is mentioned elsewhere. Njoni is the hypothetical knife-like animal which flies above the clouds and is seen as lightning. Lilembulu is a cloth which the Yao used to wear. In the presence of his chief, a man must not throw a fold over his shoulder. Mbulu, the plain, refers to the chief's plain from which he rule. Likolowe: It is said that the old people used to eat scorpions and the people of Mangoche, Amangoche Yao, used to call the Amachinga Yao the "Mikolokolo eaters." Lipuwe is the sun, the giver of daytime. Wakungwe is a representation of a pregnant woman who has died unchildbirthed because her husband was unfaithful. This is a well recognized superstition and one among others of equal moral value, introduced into the youths during their stay at Ndapulo. Though rough, wakungwe is a very realistic figure. The woman is evidently lying down, as one hand supports the head, the other hand grasps the thigh as if she were in pain; the breasts are made large and the figure being in relief, the prominent abdomen, and expanded umbilicus are noticeable features. The face and pudenda are moulded in clay and superimposed on the earth figure; a maize cob stalk is placed in the anus to counteract the sole-bottom worn by women.

In contradiction to wakungwe, mundu is symbolic of the man who has led a proper life and is blessed with a child. The child is shown on one side. On his other side is seen a conventional illustration of a spear, possibly to indicate that the figure is that of a man. I am not very sure about Kanga; it may be meant for wakungwe, the woman who officiates at Liliuw; there is nothing about the figure to suggest a woman and I could learn nothing concerning it.

Nahungwani: There appears to be some difference of opinion about this animal. Formerly I accepted the translation given by Scott,[1] namely, the whale. Others have supposed that the word refers to some large animal which lived or may still live in the big lakes. The older natives say of nulungwani that "It lived in the big sea at Zanzibar. It would come and lie on the surface of the water, maybe near a village; then the people would go down and set harpes of sand off without its knowledge; the wounds healed up immediately. Meat from different parts differed; some was nasty to taste. It was a very large animal indeed and never lived in the lakes." They distinguish it from Ngwe of the Anyanja which was "bigger than a hippopotamus but not as big as nulungwani, lived in the lakes of Nyasaland, in the deep parts as at Tundu on Lake Chilwa; was very fierce and killed the hippopotamus; would upset canoes. There are no more Ngwe but probably there might be." One of my informants, a man of forty, said his father had been told of them by his father, but he had never seen them. At the present time, older natives say that the nulungwani used to live in the lakes but they seem really to refer to Ngwe and I think lessness of speech only accounts for the idea that the word refers to anything but the whale. Hetherwick translates nulungwani as a large fish figuring in the initiation ceremonies;[1] a poor description, since it always has four limbs. The word nulungwani meaning a whale, occurs among the Mchiwambo people who live at Quilimane. These people do not make any figures on the ground at their circumcision ceremonies but it is interesting to note that their well carry stuffs similar to the sponge on their return to the village. I think, therefore, there can be little doubt that the word refers to the whale which was probably well known to the Yao before they migrated so far inland as Nyasaland. Whether the word was adopted or not in these parts in the past and used for some indigenous animal now extinct, one cannot be quite sure, but I think it is improbable; I believe the confusion with Ngwe is of quite recent date. Ngwe itself appears to have been some large mammal of the hippopotamus type, extinct probably for some time. The ch'ma of Ngwe resemble those of the monster of Lake Ngami and are not without interest. The most weighty evidence against the animal now depicted at the Ungwe and called nulungwani being a whale, is found in the representations themselves. It has a neck with a knob at the junction of the head with the body and a second knob at the junction of the body, tail and hind limbs; the tail is well marked. The "webbing" between the limbs is, I think, a means of finishing the figure and is not supposed to represent some anatomical feature of the beast. The same is, I think, true of the markings, lines, dots, etc., which are purely decorative. Reference has already been made to its tusks. The little mounds on either side of the body of the animal, on one side within the "webbing," are spoken of as the "little hills" and are not suggested breasts as one might imagine. The hollows have no significance according to my informant except that they are where the n'wichila stands; the mark which looks like a native hoe, I believe, is meant to represent the hoe which has been used in making the figure.

[1] David Clement Scott, 'A syllabic dictionary of the Mang'anja Language,' Edinburgh, 1892, p. 431.

9: Oceania D-5 Jan. 1910: 1932 ?"? Yes ?"?

Chinyam, the lake: the photograph in the article by Dr. Davey and myself of Nyam[2]

[1] Op. cit., p. 300. [2] Op. cit., Pl. XII, fig. 2.

D-Sweeney D-5 (on. 1912) 1922 F'27 Yes F'27

[illegible] 1913 [illegible]

of the hut, chwipiala, and the end part of the house of the women, doubtless on account of its shape, are used as medicine for this disease.

Entolopepere or Ndoko: If a man dies and his relatives eat of the food-stuffs left by him, such as corn from his grain-store, before they have been cleansed by medicine, they will sicken with ndoko, the symptoms being anorexia and vomiting. The word kotoko which is also used for sickness due to partaking of food cooked by an unfaithful wife.

Chiputo is a word used by both Tao and Anyanja to denote a disease which a man contracts from adulterous intercourse. Scott[1] derives the word from ku-puta, to stick to; the woman is so bewitched by medicine made by her husband that should any man have adulterous intercourse with her, the disease will "stick" to him, while it will not affect the woman herself nor her own husband. Both the disease and the medicine made to cause the disease are known as Chiputo. Secondarily, the word has come to be used for any disease which may be gained by sexual intercourse and is sometimes used as a general term for venereal disease.

Chiputo cha chipala (chipala, a knife): A man who is going away from home obtains medicine and destroys his knife with it. As he leaves his house to go on his journey, he pretends just to remember his knife and calls for it. His wife brings it to him and it is put into his sheath; he then goes out and sticks it in the grass of the roof of the house. The medicine is made from the tail of a dog, an animal in which coitus is prolonged and the two animals cannot separate. Should the wife commit adultery, it is supposed that just as the knife was condemned and destroyed with dog medicine, so the adulterous pair will remain fixed to each and be found out. This may be called chiputo cha kutoga (kutoga — to set a trap).

The Anyanja make medicine with the same idea, chiputo cha kutowa (ku-towa, to set a trap, Chin.); medicine is put round the house and any man crossing the medicine and committing adultery with the wife will be trapped. In all cases, the man will become ill.

Chiputo cha mimi, mimi, blood (mwazi, Chin.): disease caused by intercourse with a menstruating woman. Blood is passed in the urine.

Chiputo cha mwera, mwera, pus (mafuqa, Chin.): practically means gonorrhœa.

Chiputo cha timoji, timoji, cotton (ponje, Chin.): the discharge from the urethra resembles a thread of cotton; it is supposed that this thread can be pulled out endlessly.

Chiputo cha nzimbu, nzimbu, the white-ants (chiuza, Chin.): so called when a man passes whitish-yellow debris in the urine. It is supposed that when he has finished passing water, white ants rush up the penis and enter the bladder, thus causing the pain which characterises this affection. The origin of the idea lies in the fact that if one sprinkles water or urine on the ground near white-ant burrows, the ants will come to the surface of the ground in numbers and make a rustling sound.

[1] D. C. Scott, A syllabic dictionary of the Mang'anja language, op. cit.

Other hypothetical diseases which are caused by disturbance to nature are mentioned under various other headings. Kwiye: a disease generally characterized by ulceration of the legs but in some cases by pains in the back, or loosely used for a variety of symptoms. It is said to be caused by the entry into the body of a worm which lives in water-pools. This worm which I have had identified is a gordian worm and not known to be parasitic in man. Lumi: When a man kills another in battle, he will sit upon the belly of his victim; otherwise he believes he will sicken with lumi and his own belly will swell up like that of the corpse whose putrefaction sets in. He is supposed also to hunger after more killing and blood. Lilungu is the name of a supposed disease which kills off one child after another in a family when they are about six months old. Congenital syphilis naturally suggests itself but I have never been able to verify this idea. Lilungu lya kututa: a supposed disease which causes the death of the first child when the second is born, the second when the third is born and so on, whatever the intervals between the births. Each child is said to push (ku-tuta) the previous one out of this world. Under these circumstances the disease is ascribed to something wrong with the mother or father and they are examined by a medicine-woman or medicine-man, and any curcumbas or an external pile found will be cut away.

If a snake inflicts two bites, the case will prove fatal. If a crocodile emits a grunting sound when seizing its victim, though he escape he will certainly die.

Treatment of diseases. Of surgical treatment there is very little to be noted. Nothing in the way of operation is performed with the exception of circumcision (see Legends).

An abscess is allowed to burst, the smallest tumor is left untouched, but accessory digits which are not rare, attached only by a fine pedicle, are snipped off.

The natives cannot extract teeth. They are incapable of rendering any assistance in cases of difficult labor. Dislocations are not recognized as such, but fractures are treated by the application of wooden sticks placed at intervals round the circumference of the limb parallel to it and held in position by twisted pieces of bark string (Pl. XXII, fig. 3). The principle of the tourniquet appears to be unknown.

The only instruments used consist of a small knife for incision, a cupping-horn, and a primitive form of funnel for administering enemata (Pl. XXII, figs. 1, 2, 4). The knife has a triangular blade with a stem which is commonly twisted at one of the corners. The knife is used for wet-cupping, tatooing, and circumcision (Pl. XXII, fig. 2). The cupping-horn is a small horn of a calf. The apex is pierced and after application to the part, suction is made with the mouth and then the hole sealed by working a piece of beeswax over it with the tongue. Six small incisions are made in the skin for the withdrawal of the blood. The cupping-horn is called chuni (ichuwiko, Chin.). Cupping is used for headache and for pain in the chest and back. The enema funnel, chipulya (ntimbiri, Chin.) is made from the neck of a gourd to which is attached a hollow straw for introduction into the anus. Half a pint of an infusion of nsungwi is injected for constipation associated with pain.

Again, charm medicine may be contained in various articles which are also generally worn round the neck. The teeth and claws of the beasts of prey are so employed, generally arranged in pairs bound together so as to form a crescent and suspended from a string. The teeth of crocodiles, lions, leopards, and the claws of the same beasts and of some large birds of prey are thus employed. The teeth etc., are in themselves charms against injury, probably against what one might call homœopathic injury. The idea of stuffing them with medicine is probably a secondary consideration, a process of fortification of the charm so that its use seems to have a more powerful influence. It is interesting to see of late years that the natives, recognising the decorative value of these crescent-shaped amulets, has begun to copy them in lead and ivory. A series of them of graduated size is worn as a necklace by women.

When a medicine-man is consulted, part payment is made in advance, "payment to go and dig medicine (roots)." The rest of the payment is made when the cure is effected. Should a patient not be satisfied with his treatment and wish to consult some other medicine-man, he pays to the first a quarter of the fee he would have paid if his cure had been effected; this is called "paying him to get his medicine away." Unless this is done, should he recover later, he will be liable to claim for full fees from all of the medicine-men he has consulted; each will say his own medicine has gone on acting and has effected the cure. A medicine-man may take a man he is treating into his own house.

In prescribing medicine, very particular instructions are given with an embargo on certain things which may or may not have some use and significance. A medicine-man in 1901 at Malenya's, who inoculated every one in the foodstuff with bullet proof medicine, said that no one must step across a mortar (pestle for pounding grain), and no one must eat the leaves of the sweet potato.

A medicine-man always partakes of part of the decoction he is giving to a patient to show that it is harmless; I think these preparations are mostly inactive. I should hate to sample all the castor oil I have prescribed, though many natives have had suspicions about me when I have not done so.

Poisons. Though there are a large number of species in this country, both vegetable and animal, from which poison might be extracted, those that have gained any reputation among natives and have come under my observation are but few in number. Mwai (Mwabwi, Chin.) "the ordeal poison," is the bark of Erythrophleum guineense. The natives distinguish two varieties of mwai, the two trees differing slightly in leaf, flower and bark; mwai is the Erythrophleum guineense, the second variety known as mpanyijile is doubtless an allied species. Mwai is the poison employed in the poison ordeal.[1] It is administered in a poisonous dose as a decoction of the bark, recovery or otherwise depending on whether or not the poison is voided by vomiting. Natives give as the symptoms headache, giddiness, disturbances of vision, vomiting and purging, with slowing of heart beat. Mpan-

[1] Vide infra, p. [illegible].

The father of one of my servants helped to clear out the remains of a body from his grain store on one occasion and shortly afterwards, it is supposed that his own sons who had said they could not allow it to go on any longer, employed some one to kill him, so he was found, one day, with his head smashed in. There are, I believe, a number of similar cases known. 266

A person is supposed to gain the powers of wusai by procuring medicine from some one willing to sell his secrets at a price, and by performing certain rites usually associated with his method of bathing. It is said that "such and such a one takes his bath on the top of an ant hill" or "on the roof of his house by moonlight." The usual initiation into wusai is a long business, the individual being successively initiated into all the various practices of sikoma, the supernatural. Medicines are made from a still-born child, from various plants, from the hyaena, etc., and used for preparing the individual to the new sikoma. He is introduced to the hyaena, the fox, etc. It is also asserted that a man may acquire supernatural powers by having sexual intercourse with a near relative, a sister or mother. I have had pointed out to me an old man who is said to have wished thus to acquire power but the women refused and he has been a laughing-stock ever since. 754 576 [838]

On one occasion, a man related to me the pathetic life story of his attempt to find his favorite sister who, like himself, had been taken away to the coast as a slave. In desperation he has adopted the above procedure to try to gain supernatural powers to help him but without result. It would therefore seem to be a method not particularly associated with wusai.

The wusai is supposed to bring about the death of his victim not by administering poison or other such direct means, but by the more subtle mode of making medicine "against" him. When the victim has succumbed and is in due course buried, the wusai arrives at the grave to secure that for which he has been working. To the wusai is attributed the power of making himself invisible, and of taking the form of an animal; owing to the carrion-eating habits of the hyaena, this animal form is most commonly taken. Other animal forms which are associated with the wusai are the leopard, the fox, and the owl, all night-going animals. The Yao say, "The cry of the fox (ambal) is heard at night because he meets he associates with wusai doings." 754 [825]

Arrived at the grave after sunset, the wusai blows his horn, the horn of a small antelope, to call his brethren; a fire with a blue flame is made by the grave and around it they dance, or the grave may be illuminated by blue flames without a visible fire. The wusai calls upon the deceased to rise from the grave, addressing him by the name he bore before he was initiated, i.e. his child-name. Obeying the summons, the dead man rises to the surface of the ground, though how he comes out is not quite clear — " the hole may be over so small." The risen dead is then killed again by magic medicine and his body divided to be eaten by the congregation of wusai. It is said that the skull is made into a gourd, the eyes are used as beads, and the ribs formed into a girdle. [264]

Tagalogo was another well-known performer; he used to do the same tricks as Kawanja. He also was possessed of an elastic skin and is said to have been able "to do his own tricks together behind the back of his head." [illegible]

Mjoekutula, a Tao of Mikanda, is a man with considerable resources. He is said to be able to produce a lion at will from a lion's tail and claw. He would offer to show this if there were any lions enough to go through with it. On a moonlight night, he would require on the ground in a cleared space near a village the tail of a lion held some-wise in a piece of split bamboo. At the split end of the bamboo, he would place a lion's claw and round this, a woman's hair held in position by three bamboo pegs, around which he would draw a circle of whipped flour. Everyone would then withdraw to a hut in which the women was to take place. After an hour or so, Mjoekutula would send some one out to inspect the lion's tail where probably all would be found intact. He might then pretend to be uninterested and sleepy and suggest that some one should go out again in half an hour. Sooner or later, a man would come back, having found the tail gone; then everyone would go out to see what had happened. The pegs would be found in place but the tail and claw gone. A little way off, the split piece of bamboo would be found and further still a head or two from the woman's hair. Then, Mjoekutula would pick up, and leaving a little trail of flour on their way, all returned to the hut, while he whistled as if nothing were wrong. Suddenly they would be aroused by the sound as of a lion breaking against the hut walls, as the beasts are known to do, and next, a loud roar. Mjoekutula would immediately open the door half-way so that the people could look out into the moonlight and there, a little way off, would be the lion. It would immediately advance towards the house and then, as it prepared to spring for the door, Mjoekutula would offer it some of the flour in his left hand, around with a stirring stick, swiftly, in his right hand. As the lion landed, he would strike it on the head with the stick and lo and behold! the lion would vanish and the tail and claw would be found in his hand.

Superstitions. Scattered throughout these notes, particularly under Usual and Unusual, mention is made of practices which show a strong belief in superstition. Below are given a number of minor beliefs, and it is interesting to compare them with many well-known superstitions in other parts of the world. [771] [784]

1. A child who cuts the upper incisor teeth first will be unlucky. Such children used to be killed by the Tao. (Other tribes make medicine against the threatened ill-luck.) [777]

2. A woman with polydactylism may not take food out of a corn-store. Otherwise the stock of corn will not last long. (Rudimentary sixth fingers are not uncommon.) [732]

3. An insect called chiqueo ceni which lives in the sand at the bottom of pools, if killed causes the water to dry up. [723]

4. If a boy puts a water-spider in the armpit when learning to swim, he will learn quickly.

5. A man wishing to prevent rain falling on a day he is making a journey, will wrap some of the leaves of the mimosa tree in his loin cloth and go without drinking. [824]

16. That portion of the gut of animals having holes of some membrane beside, may be seen only by old people past the child-propagating age. If a young woman should see it, she would have difficulty in labor.

17. It is believed that people who see two [illegible] of a little fish like [illegible] called [illegible] get abortion of the breed by the wedging together of the two. The treatment adopted is to pass up the rectum a smooth stick with a pad of rag at the end. This means be done by the person himself and as the aid of another has to be called in, only an intimacy, such as the relationship of brother-in-law gives, will warrant this service being asked.

18. The Tao believes that there is a little insect which lives in the ear, called [illegible] Spiriggle, which tells the person what is said to him, the ear being its resort. The pupil is called [illegible] jan kin, the child of the eye.

19. Among women, the uterus is called [illegible] (uterus = eyes). It is supposed to be a little person who holds the foetus. When the child is born, [illegible] and starts looking about, the [illegible] causing the afterpains.

20. A man making his first journey to the coast used to sprinkle himself with water from every stream he crossed to give him a safe journey. In the same way, women at the present day going between Kanka and Manyuw sprinkle their babies with water from each stream.

21. An anti-like insect called [illegible] (Lumbricus, Chin.) [illegible] is lucky. On seeing it a native puts his belly and then rubs his eyes, wishing for plenty of food that day. If he is embarking on a journey or beginning some enterprise, he will wrap one of these insects in a fold of his loin cloth and take it with him for luck.

22. When a native hears the mango bird call (its call is like the mew of a cat), if he wants something, he immediately says, "Oh mango, I want so-and-so. Be quiet and I will then be quiet, too!" If the bird ceases calling, he knows the wish will be granted. The female bird is said to be the more certain prophet.

23. The snake, [illegible], which lives in trees and is of a buff clay color with green markings, is said by natives to pierce the chest and tie a knot in itself on each side so that it can only be withdrawn by cutting off one knot. When the snake is thus withdrawn, its blood mixes with that of the man and he will die.

24. Najiwes have a habit of marking the spot where any event takes place by a stone by the side of the path, and every passer-by will add a stone for luck. In this way some large piles of stones have been made.

25. A man resting on his way home from a long journey places a stone in the fork between the branches of a nearby tree, so that on his arrival he may find his wife has put by some food for him and has not used up the day's stock of flour.

26. A shamadown found digging in the path is said to presage the death of the finder's nearest relative.

[illegible] 30. If a shamelessness is found holding on to the grass at both sides of the path, the path is "closed" and a man will turn back to his home and not proceed on his journey. It would be unlucky to continue.

[illegible] 31. Snakes seen in sofa are a bad omen.

[illegible] 32. The slow-worm known as Shambala mangala ("the native opon. of not kills"), and the only antimier, if seen on the path, are of bad import.

33. To knock the toes against a stone on a journey is bad luck; if blood flows from the big toe, it portets to good luck.

34. A man knocking the side of his foot against a stone knows that some one is speaking ill of him.

35. A person whose hands itch knows he will receive a present.

36. Tremor of the circumorbital muscles of the right eye indicates that something good will be seen. When the left eye is affected, the outcome is less sure.

37. The cry of the bird ngulubulu (the green turaco), indicates to the hearer that he is about to meet some one, either friend or enemy.

38. Anyone who kills one of the large chik-lizards (Phacochoerus) knows no chikuse chinjiga, will always be breaking the cooking pots afterwards.

[illegible] 39. The natives believe that the caterpillar of the Hippotion celerio moth will jump at the breast. It is called chikumbilo mumalo, "that which jumps at the breasts," and children seeing it will cover up their nipples with their hands.

40. Of Lindu, the Mongoose, there is a saying:

[539] "Lindu pagwichimpuse ukilu!"
"The hooded mongooses relieve each other (at) the mound!"

It is said that mongooses assist one another when being hunted. When one is tired, a fresh one runs in to show to the pursuer that he goes after this one and leaves the tired one, and so they keep it up till the pursuer is exhausted.

41. Chiula, the frog. Children are told they must never kill a frog, or his spirit will come at night with porridge made of excrement and make them eat it. If a small child playing with a frog kills it by mischance, he will tear off a small piece of his native cloth and place it by the frog as an offering.

42. Chindindi (Kimpuse, Chin.) the wound. It is said that the wound hides its body and leaves exposed its nose, so that a chiduna seeing it, goes up to peck at it, whereupon the wound turns round quickly and catches the chiduna with its mouth.

43. Chingwe, the skunk (from kwenga, to go to steal), so named on account of its odor, is said to apply the nose to a rat-hole and make wind. This will render inaudible all the rats in the burrow and he can then dig them out at leisure.

44. Mbuli, the honey badger, when hunted is always said to attack a man by attempting to seize the testicles. Natives who hunt this animal, tie stones in their kilu clothes so that they hang down between the legs to defeat the badger.

[illegible] setting out on a journey may ask the intercession of his deceased father to secure his safe conduct.

The spirits of the dead are in general said to dwell "above." They haunt the graveyard or visit the scenes of their life, and may be associated with natural objects or with certain animals, into which they are supposed to enter temporarily. Thus a dead man's spirit will visit the earth mound which marks the site of his old house in the village. The spirits of headmen are often thought to haunt the big trees of the village open space; such trees are held sacred for this reason. Some time ago in the old village of the chief, Malenga, a party of women cut down one of these trees for firewood, ignorant of its sacred character. With the crash of the falling tree, they became frightened, and one of the present Malenga's elders came upon the scene, predicting all kinds of evil to follow unless reparation were made to the insulted spirits of the dead chiefs. The remains of the tree lie there to this day, untouched except by natural decay.

To quote another example, near a bathing pool called japanali (from ba-jipa, to bathe, and nali, the initiates) where boys bathe after initiation, on the Dzenzi river, there is a small cataract whence a cloud of spray rises and a continued rumbling sound comes forth. Here, the old men say, you can hear the drumming of the spirits, while you may see pythons and the crowing cobra in whose bodies the spirits live.

As I have already mentioned, the spirit-world so far as the native has speculated on the problem is "above" in a semi-materialistic heaven. If questioned closely, the phrase "I do not know" will figure largely in his replies. He will not say there is any "marriage or giving in marriage." If a child dies, they often say, "So-and-so (some deceased person) wants a water-carrier." Indeed they often use a phrase under the circumstances identical with an English expression, "They are calling away the children."

Natives attribute to the spirits of the dead the power to partake of anything on this earth, such as food. They have no exact ideas with regard to animals and what happens to them when they die. They will not tell you that an animal has an entrance but at the same time, a goat is often killed at a funeral, with the remark, "The goat will follow the dead man." The goat's meat will be eaten by those assisting at the funeral; hence there is the suggestion of the idea that animals' spirits do go to the spirit-world.

In referring to the spirit-world, the native generally uses the word ba-malenga, and here we have the second element in their religious beliefs, namely a supreme being; ba-malenga means at the place of or with malenga, the supreme being. Malenga, however, takes a very secondary place to the ancestors. He is referred to only in a general way. In answer to such questions as why has a woman an albino child born to her, she will say "Malenga made it so"; in fact in reply to many questions to which the native has no answer, he will use practically our English phrase, "Oh, God knows!" and with about as much meaning.

To Malenga is ascribed the sending of the rain, but apparently he has no part in giving good crops or causing a plentiful harvest, neither has he any direct interest in man's affairs,

824 778 be supposed to live in such trees. They are convenient natural objects for them to occupy, in fact practically the only ones to be found in villages. Trees may secondarily, therefore, be looked upon as in some degree sacred. About such trees strings or pieces of calico may be placed as an offering to the spirits of the departed. But the Yao do not erect little huts in their vicinity, hung about with strips of calico as is the custom among the Anyanja.

775 Macdonald[1] mentions the spirits in connection with Soche and other hills round Blantyre and supposes them to be the spirits of the places themselves. This I think is unlikely; they would probably turn out to be spirits bearing the names of long departed Anyanja chiefs whom the immigrant Amangoche Yao venerated just "to be on the safe side," since they had come and taken the country which long ago belonged to the former tribe. When approaching or passing any spot held to be the dwelling place of spirits, salutation is made by clapping the hands.

Spirits of the departed may enter into animals or may take the form of animals, [825] commonly lions and sometimes large snakes (python), but this belief is not so general among the Yao as among other tribes, in my opinion. An animal which is so possessed is called lisyuka, from ku-syuka, "to be transformed."

[774] Apart from this habitation of inanimate objects above mentioned by maimu, there is nothing that points to a belief in Animism among the Yao, so far as I know. Neither hills, rocks, streams, lakes, nor trees have their own spirits, nor are they endowed by the native mind with life.

Deceased persons appear to the living in dreams, the native apparently believing that the deceased appears in his material body.

775 787 791 They believe also in revelation of wishes of the deceased through the medium of the living. The spirit of the deceased is supposed to enter into the medium. The medium, I am informed, is always a woman, never a man. From the descriptions of some of these revelation séances, there can be no doubt that they are manifestations of la grande hystérie. The medium works herself up into a frenzy of excitement and in her delirium gives out the name of the deceased, the voice which speaks being that of the spirit within her. She rolls on the ground and foams at the mouth, uttering the word of revelation which is generally to the effect that some deceased chief's spirit is feeling aggrieved at the neglect of his tomb; the voice may go on to say that certain practices are forbidden, or demand that certain rites be observed by the people. The spirits which possess her are generally spoken of as masoka, a word which, though sometimes used as equivalent to maimu, usually seems to [158] have rather a sinister significance. Insane persons are called masoka and are thought to be possessed by a spirit, and vapor baths with exorcism may be practiced for their cure. In the case of the death of anyone who is possessed, in answer to my interrogation, I have [761] been told that both the spirit which has entered into the man and his own maimu leave his body.

[1] Op. cit., vol. I, p. 70.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

539

40. Gomera kwala ntuhuta!
Lying on the rock, heat!

This is a slang expression which in full would read, "It is nice and warm lying on a rock in the sun, but it is not so comfortable as being in bed in company with your wife; you can go on waiting but you won't get anything." This might even be said to a dog, watching as a dog will, every morsel of food lifted to its master's mouth.

41. Kulupikila mesi ya mbiru!
To have hopes of water for maggots!

It is a custom before lying down to sleep on the floor mat, to take it up and pour boiling water on the earth floor to kill any blood-sucking maggots (Congo floor-maggot, Auchmerompia). If you see a pot cooking on the fire, you naturally think there is food being prepared but you may be disappointed; it may only be the pot for heating the water to kill the maggots. The saying is thus used to a man who has made an assignation and is disappointed but goes on waiting. [513] [751]

42. Kulumu upru!
To bite cockroach-like!

The cockroach is described by natives as going up to what it will eat, remaining quiet for some moments, and then suddenly taking a bite. This is said of a man who comes up to you smiling and then hits you a hard blow. [825]

Among the Yao as among other tribes that I have previously mentioned,[1] signs of salutation to a superior are made by clapping the hands or patting the breast or buttock with one hand, at the same time crouching down. A woman will go off the path and kneel, looking away from a superior passing along the roadway. 576

A person going by the door of a hut where others are sitting, will say "Kumlango kuno! At the door here." Passing behind anyone, he will say "Ku-ayu^ma! At the back!" Meeting anyone on a path, a man will simply say, "Icho, here," adding perhaps, "Ku-chela! all is well!" A chief or headman on returning to his village after a journey, is greeted by the women with trilling of the tongue (Ku-lulula). [201]

Man and wife do not greet each other in the morning. The wife rises first and draws water and places it in the hut for the husband's use but nothing may be said.

When a visitor is entertained and a chicken cooked for a repast, the "pope's nose" is always for the visitor. The right hand only is used in dipping into the common pot. A man of small importance, though replete, will go on making pretence of eating at a common meal by taking very small amounts so that his superior shall finish first, and rise and go away before him.

I may here add the words used by the Yao for the sounds made by various animals; they are interesting to compare with those of other languages: 192

[1] 'Notes on some tribes of British Central Africa,' op. cit., p. 261-262.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

no one will touch. With the exception of carrion birds such as the crow and the hawk, most birds are considered fit to eat. The hornbill is not eaten, as it is supposed to carry part of a corpse on its nose.[1] Fowls form a regular article of diet, but some taboos in this connection are mentioned elsewhere.

Eggs are eaten only by children and old people; that is, by those outside the child propagating age. Milk is never consumed in any form. They say, "What a disgusting habit, to suck the juice of an animal while it is still alive!"

Pregnant women will not eat certain things lest the child be born with some deformity, such as the snout of a pig, or the white stripes of a zebra.

Art and decoration. Sculpture can hardly be said to be an art known to the Yao. The only piece of stone work I have ever seen was a granite boulder, on the surface of which cup-holes had been made for the game of Bao (Pl. IV, fig. 4).

Of late years, individuals here and there have begun carving wooden figures of men and animals. The Yao, of course, make no idols. It is uncertain exactly how long it is since any of these people started producing wooden figures. I should think that this art has sprung up within the past twelve or thirteen years, that is to say, since there has been a market for them among European residents. In the first place only natives and some of the common animals, the eland and leopard, were represented; since then, many animals and Europeans have been copied. The native is extraordinarily clever in reproducing characteristic features in dress, etc., so that a Portuguese is easily distinguished from an Englishman. The little models in ivory of animals and native household objects, made by the Swahili people on Lake Nyasa, have never been copied by the Yao. Neither do they make clay images of men and cattle as do the Zulu-descended Angoni and cattle-keeping Wankonde. No native would allow any wooden figure to remain in his house for fear of ill luck; the women especially would look askance at them, fearing some misfortune in their next pregnancy. Little wooden figures of birds, however, are sometimes seen affixed to the point of the hut roof.

The making of carved figures, then, is of recent introduction, or rather is a recent event in the evolution of the Yao, as they were not taught but self-inspired in the work.

The ability to make representations of objects by drawing appears in the same way to originate spontaneously here and there as a sport. Natives with a talent for drawing are found among all the tribes, and among the Yao, it is said, there have always been some who have been able to draw. Naturally enough, their reproductions are made on the walls of their houses, and their subjects are generally animals of the forest, sometimes men and houses, or some other object of particular interest[2] (Pl. VIII, fig. 1). I also give sketches of some other drawings I have noted (Pl. XVIII); the line figure of a man at Makanjila's

[1] Vide supra, p. 327.

[2] Cf. A. Werner, 'A Native Painting from Nyassland,' (Jour. Afric. Soc., London 1908, vol. 8, no. 30, p. 180-182).

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

778
825
532

[361]

1-3, GROW FRAGMENTS; 4, UPPERMOST PORTS; 5, DIRECTIVE PLAN OF UPPERMOST; 5-6, STYLIZED FIGURES

[End Plate 10]

[Explanation of plates, cat. 116, p. 265]

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

H. S. STANNUS—WAYAO PLATE XI

778
532
825

[End Plate 1L]

[For Plate Explanation, see cat. 116, p. 265]

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

778
825
532

WAYAO FIGURES

[End Plate 12]
[For explanation, see cat. 116, p. 265]

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

778
825
532

[End Plate 13]

[For explanation, see cat. 116, p. 265]

832 Mpasi is a love potion. Men are often anxious that women should ask them for love (ku-pala). A man seeing a woman whom he fancies, takes up some of the dust where she has trodden and mixing this with medicine puts it in his hair. If he meet her again, though he takes no notice of her, she will come to him.

789 When crops are harvested, a layer of the cereal is laid at the bottom of the corn-store,
241 and uwbe, which consists of medicines contained in the skull of or made from the body of a still-born infant, is then put in and the store filled. In this way, he who has only a small
● [826] garden may be sure that his grain will last a long time. Similar medicine is put in gardens with the first rains to insure heavy crops. A man on the approach of the planting season should never give away seed to anyone until his own seed is put in or it may bring bad luck to his crop. This is evidently a superstition arising from the fact that if he gives seed away, he may not have enough left to raise a crop sufficient to support his family. Some people are considered "lucky at planting pumpkins, other people when they plant, reap only watery pumpkins." A man, therefore, will often ask one of the lucky people to plant his pumpkins for him. My hospital boy always got the cook to plant his pumpkins.

789 A man wishing to become a person of importance, with a village of his own, takes a
824 medicine made from a certain tree and then builds his hut in a new place, hoping people will flock to him. The tree is known as chukambili. Another medicine, taken in the belief that people will flock to a man in consequence, is made from the bush called utola. Cf. litule planted at the threshold to attract visitors.

789 Conjuring. There are other performances akin to magic in the eyes of the natives,
791 which I have never had the opportunity of witnessing but which would appear to be of the nature of juggling or possibly hypnotism; some resemble the tricks of jugglers; others are more like some of the performances in India. I naturally supposed that they had been learned from men at the coast (Zanzibar), but I am assured that they belong to the Yao themselves.

Kambenje, a Yao of Chiradzulu, well-known at dances and Unyago, after some preliminary dancing, stands still and is covered by a cloth; when the cloth is again removed, he is discovered with a number of squealing puppies held in his loin cloth, which he then hands round. He begins to dance again and the persons to whom the puppies have been given watch him and then find they are holding excrement, not puppies. Or mud-fish are handed round and the people find they are holding women's diapers.

Another trick often performed by Kambenje was the burial of a man in the ground, covered up completely with earth; at the sounding of the drums the buried man comes running in from the back of the watching crowd.

Kasonga, a Yao of Malemya's, priest, and medicine man, after an Unyago ceremony used to put on his red blanket and walk over the hot embers of an enormous fire in the village open space. He admitted that he smeared himself with medicine and an eyewitness told me that when he put his feet on the hot logs, it caused a sizzling sound.

771 784 6. It is believed that signs of guilt are visible in the eye of a murderer; medicine is procured in the hope of getting rid of these signs.

7. The possession of the hair of another person is supposed to give the possessor power over that person, hence a medicine man, when the patient he has been treating is cured, shaves the patient and keeps the hair until payment is made.

[826] 8. A native with light greenish-grey eyes is not to be trusted. He is said to have eyes like a cat and is called majerijeri; these eyes are rare among natives.

9. It is unlucky for a child to get into a basket; he may be burned.

10. Should a woman turn the porridge pot upside down, every one who has eaten will become constipated. For the same reason, a woman, after turning out the porridge from the pot, just touches the top of the mass of porridge with the bottom of the pot.

11. A woman will never leave the pounding stick in the grain-mortar. Should she do so, the heavens would fall.

12. When a zebra is killed, a knot is tied in its tail so that eating of the meat shall not cause indigestion.

13. It is unlucky to sit upon a headrest, the mawilo. The person would surely be bitten by a snake.

[843] 14. If a man commits murder, and his wife is pregnant at the time, she must sleep on the spear used.

15. Children are told that they must not eat at night; that if they are hungry, they must lie quiet and try to go to sleep again. If they don't obey and sit up eating porridge, a long hairy arm will come through the fastened door and beg for some, the voice of the unseen saying:

[539]

> "Nyao chimkuti'choni nuaya ni mjasa!"
> "Give me that which you put to your nose to smell and throw away," the repeated movements of the hand to the mouth (nose) and back to the pot being supposed to make the "bogey" think that they are not really eating but merely smelling and throwing away the food.

16. A male should not scrape the porridge off the porridge stick; this is only allowed to the woman. Should a man do so, it is supposed that when he goes hunting, he will hit anything he shoots at, only in the tail.

17. There is a saying that the men and boys may eat little pieces of porridge which fall out of the pot, while cooking, on to the supporting stones and it will give them power to escape unhurt from battle. The fragments are called ngulupuko, (from ku-lupuka "to escape").

18. Children are instructed to take their food sitting down instead of being in a hurry and standing to take it. They are told that if they do not obey, their porridge will not go into their stomachs but into their legs and swell out their knee-joints.

 771 784 826 539

48. A child, when one of its milk teeth drops out, stands some five yards away facing the door of the hut and throws the tooth over the roof of the hut, saying:

"Al kitumpulu lino lyanu alyo, mbani lyangu lyambone 'lya!"
"Oh! crow tooth your there is, give me my of good one!"

Religion. The matter of the religious beliefs professed by natives of East Central Africa is one beset with many difficulties to the student of today. It has been the subject of many essays by workers in the missionary field, but the wide contact of the natives of Nyasaland with missionary effort during the past thirty years has done much to confuse the problem, and one feels that many missionaries in their writings rather color the picture with their own feelings. 771

I think probably the Yao with whom I am now concerned have a truer conception of their own beliefs than many of the subject tribes among whom mission teaching has more easily taken root. The religious beliefs of a people are to a large extent the reflection of the circumstances under which that people lives. The outstanding event to all natives is death. At death, something is lost to the body, without which life is impossible. This is the maimu which may be translated "soul" or "spirit." The maimu is said to leave the body of the dying man when he becomes moribund or unconscious. It appears that this same maimu may leave the body during unconscious states unassociated with death, as when a man faints, in epilepsy, and during sleep. 771 761 774

Apart from this evidence of the dissociation of the maimu from the living body, the Yao believe that a man's shadow is an objective manifestation of the soul and they will say "the shadow is the maimu." Fear is experienced if a man jumps on the shadow of his fellow. Light is also thrown on the constitution of the maimu by the belief in a certain evil-spirit which dwells in deep pools. It is called chimala-mezi, which means "one who may finish (drink up) all the water." The superstition regarding this evil spirit is that it can suck the blood from your shadow as you stand at the edge of the pool, till you become so weak that you fall in and are drowned. 774 774 776

After leaving the body at death, the maimu goes to take up its place in the spirit-world, occupying a position corresponding to that held by the man during his life. With a truly materialistic conception, the soul is supposed to have all the attributes of the dead man, to be wealthy in proportion as the man was so on earth, and its relative position will be identical with that which he held among the living. The tribal chief becomes a paramount chief in the spirit world, the lesser chief holds sway in his lesser capacity, etc. We shall see that in intercession, when the tribe is threatened with calamities, it is the late paramount chief who is appealed to for help, and when one feudal chief is at war with another, the chief's dead predecessor will be called upon for aid. When a village is moved, it is from the spirit of the dead headman of the village that success in the enterprise is sought. Similarly, in family trouble, some dead ancestor is entreated to set things right, while a native 775

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

(fig. 14), and an antelope from Mpona's in Zomba district (fig. 11), also two birds at Pikani's which I should think represent a fowl and a crow (figs. 12, 13). It is interesting to compare these attempts which show a natural feeling for shape, with others, the work of an Angoni youth in touch with a European mission station, who depicts the missionary, his donkey, his dog, and a chair but with little or no sense of form. Note the dots above the animals' backs which represent their feet seen from the other side (Pl. XVIII, figs. 15–18). 532

The models of animals and other objects made in relief on the ground at Lupanda, and of animals in grass and bamboo at Chiputu, are referred to under Initiation Ceremonies.

Decoration is limited to the making of patterns of geometric design on many household articles. The graving of pots is mentioned under Pottery: gourd vessels sometimes have lines and triangles cut on the surface; ivory knife handles may have concentric circles graven on them, the same being true of ivory nose-rings and necklaces. Spear handles and walking sticks, snuff-boxes, pipes, the head-rest and the necks of musical instruments too, are commonly engraved with designs. The wooden rim of the situngwi basket is always so treated. A series of these designs from baskets is reproduced (Pl. XVII). Occasionally geometric patterns are painted on the walls of huts. The best example I have seen is shown in the photograph which represents a Mohammedan mosque in South Nyasa district. This, I think, gives the key to the origin of these geometric patterns, namely, Swahili influence among the Yao (Pl. IV, fig. 1). 531

Personal ornamentation. The skin color admired most among the Yao is a rich brown and is likened to the color of the milliped, lijongolo. A very black skin is not liked and a man is said to be "as black as a crow." Very light colored skins are equally distasteful to some and considered to resemble the color of a roasted crab. The hair should be jet black. Young men anoint their heads with a decoction of namalenga pods in boiling oil to make the hair black and lustrous. When the hair is turning white, a substance made of the charred roots of a plant called chisinje is put on to make it black. 832 826 302

Natives recognise that some among them have red hairs on their heads or in their beards, and such a man is called matuana, matuana being the name of a caterpillar which lives on the situana tree and is covered with long red hairs. 832 826

The old men used to wear wigs, chisindi, made of knotted string blackened and oiled to look like hair; the women wore one called chikuna. These were used to disguise greyness or baldness.

The women sometimes let the hair grow long and then thread beads on wisps of it. This fashion is called chitunga. The large red bead, chitalaka, is now used for the purpose. This fashion was adopted by the old women and those in charge of the Chiputu ceremony. Strings of beads threaded on the hair falling down round the head are called lilombola or malombola (plur.). Women sometimes thread beads on the crest of hair called nchacha. Ordinarily the hair is periodically shaved or sometimes cut with a knife, but the process is painful and therefore unpopular.

4: Stahnus D-5 (ca. 1909)1910 FT7 Yao FT7
Maravi FR4

M 832 this is then added to a brew of new beer and given to her husband to drink. He will then think of and love only herself. This is said to have caused the death of some husbands.

Mpasi: medicine made and drunk by a woman to make her beloved by a certain man.

M 837 844 [847] At confinement a woman has to answer whether she has ever committed adultery; if she denies an adultery she may die, if she owns up and gives the name of the man this can be remedied. Adultery on the part of the father or mother is said to be a cause of abortion.

M 837 A man going away from his village for several months and leaving his wife behind and wishing her to remain faithful puts a knife into its sheath and hangs it in the hut, telling his brother. It is then believed that should anyone commit adultery with his wife separation after the coitus is impossible till some third party comes and pulls the knife from its sheath, and in doing so becomes a witness of the adultery.

M 833 M [262] [825] [522] Eating of eggs is believed to cause impotence in children or adults. Much fat eaten is said to have the same effect. It is believed that if a hare run up against the leg of a man while going through the forest he will become impotent. It is for this reason that dung of the hare is put at the door of a man to make fun of him as impotent. This is a trick played by Adzukulu.

M Y 837 263 759 If a woman who has committed adultery puts salt into the food while cooking, of which her husband will partake, will thereby cause his death. At the present time among the Yao-Mañanja community a woman always calls one of the children to do it—this speaks for itself. A woman, after connection with her husband, putting salt in food, may cause illness among any children partaking of the food.

M 837 If a man accuse his wife of adultery and she denies it, he will procure medicine and place it under her pillow, then in the middle of the night she will wake her husband and tell him the name of her lover.

M 787 777 Mpingu = ill omen. A journey would always be stopped if on setting out one of the party die; or should they meet an ant-eater or black snake. It used to be considered a sign of bad luck if one of them knocked the toes against a stone; now if blood flows from the big toe they say it presages good luck.

Y 832 ● 826 The Yao at the age of sixteen years climbs the mtumbu tree, and finding a fruit which is soft makes a hole in the middle and inserts the penis. After this procedure the penis is said to enlarge as the fruit grows; when the size desired is reached the fruit is cut down.

M 827 The native says that every one has a small animal inside the ear, the sounds it makes causes the man to hear. If the animal escapes the man becomes deaf. The animal is said to be ½-inch long, and wax is said to be its excrement.

M 484 777 Where a man rests on a journey he often puts a stone in the fork of the nearest tree; on many journeys there are regular halting places, often at cross roads, and here every passer-by adds a stone for luck, making quite big heaps.

4: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1909) 1910 FT7 Yao FT7
Marovi FR4

The prepuce in the case of men is sometimes the seat of a small circular hole originally copied from the coast Swahili whose tribal mark it was, and who did it to prevent enlargement of the scrotum.[1] A small perforation of the lobule is commonly seen among the Chipeta-Angoni. These perforations are now, however, seen indiscriminately among various tribes in the country. The former I have seen in a Nyasa—it is also general among the troupes of professional dancing-boys, who wear a cord or a small stick through the ear, usually the right ear. The stick I have seen among Asenga, Nyasa, Machinga, and Achewa. No definite earrings are worn. The habit of wearing three or four discs in the margin of the ear is only seen among coast women (Zanzibar) who have come to live in the country (Fig. 5).

M 304 [177] [171] Y [304]

FIG. 4.

FIG. 5.

Dental mutilation was, and is to some extent, still of tribal significance, though mostly performed for appearance (Fig. 4). Actual extraction is but very seldom seen now.

A prominent breast is admired among the natives, and to secure this a cord is tied round the chest by girls, at the upper margin of the gland, with the idea of making it project. I am inclined to think it has the opposite effect. No attempts are made to elongate the breasts, they become very pendulous without any artificial aid. [824]

Amputation of fingers and ears, castration, etc., have in the past only been practised as punishment. M [681]

Young girls by constant pulling on the labia minora and enclosed clitoris try to cause elongation, as such is said to be admired. [832]

Elsewhere I have referred to the penis of natives, which I consider to be characteristic in its hardness. This is said to be caused by the "young man" purposely injuring the organ by beating it so that it never returns to normal softness when not erected. M [856]

Cicatrization.—Cicatrization is practised by both sexes of all the tribes. In former times the designs had a certain significance, such as to indicate the tribe, to signify that the wearer had been initiated, to commemorate certain events, and so

[1] This is interesting, inasmuch as the ears are pierced in England, commonly with the belief that it prevents bad eyesight.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

As an example of another kind of intermediary may be mentioned a woman called Bimbi Chikasowa, who, though an Anyanja, was well known among the Yao of Zomba. She was consulted on many occasions about the future, about rain, or the prevention of disease. She was a woman of quiet ways and greatly respected; she had no fixed abode but was received everywhere and given food and shelter. She would sometimes disappear from the district and travel to far distant places. A son, born to her when a young woman, was lately a patient under my care, a man of about forty-eight. On one occasion she was consulted about an epidemic of ulcers among the people near Zomba. She asked all the people from the villages to go down to Lake Shirwa and to take a white fowl with them. When they had all collected, she appeared, carrying in each hand a little gourd containing mbepesi flour, and a small open basket on her head. She took the fowl in one hand and then proceeded to walk into the water, saying she would have to go to a little hill on an island in the lake called Chidia Mpiri and that she would come back in three days. She then walked on into the water and disappeared below its surface. In three days time, she returned to the village and said that the women must give up dancing the chiponda dance for twelve months and all would be well. 791 789 755

On other occasions she usually worked along similar lines. Consulted as to whether or not some sick person would recover, she always answered with the same formula, if she thought he would die, "The house is prepared for him and medicine would avail nothing!"

There are certain other supernatural persons or spirits to which reference must be made. Chimala-mesi has been mentioned above. Manunu, a word which Hetherwick translates as "madness, idiocy,"[1] really refers to the delusions and hallucinations which form part of the perceptions of the insane. The word also has the meaning of obsession, phobia, and intuition; thus the natives say of an ox about to be slaughtered that shows signs of realizing the approaching evil, "it has manunu." On the other hand, they say the hartebeest is a foolish animal that does not know what to do when hunted: "it has manunu, it is a deluded animal." Again, the baboon and the crow "have manunu"; they are possessed of senses or faculties which warn them of the approach of any enemies before they can be seen or heard; they cannot be stalked. In all these cases, the crowd of hallucinatory men pursuing some melancholic, the rats of the delirium tremens patient, and that which appears to warn the crow or the baboon, are all manunu and are, I think, supposed by the natives to have some kind of materialistic form. 791 828

Ndodoche: when the wasawi[2] do not wish immediately to devour the body of a deceased person which they have raised from the grave, they cut off the arms and legs at the elbows and knees and insert medicine into the stumps; these living-dead are then compelled by the wasawi to live in caves and hollow ant hills during the day and to follow them at night in their travels, "like a herd of goats," to be eaten as required. The ndondoche may be heard as they wander along in the night, making sounds like a cat's mew. A woman will 791 789

[1] Yao language, op. cit., p. 220. [2] Vide supra, p. 292.

7: Hetherwick M-5 (ca. 1900) 1902 FT7 Yao FT7

774 they said, "was about to take away their shadows and they would die." In their 123 mind the liseku was allied to the chiwilili or picture, and the removal of it to the photographic plate would mean the disease or death of the shadeless body.

As an instance of their faith in the close relationship of the liseku and the 123 picture or shadow, I may relate the following incident. An influential Yao chief 753 on Mount Zomba with whom I was on terms of intimate friendship for years, refused to allow himself to be photographed, fearing the consequences on his life.
774 At last I was able to persuade him to give me a sitting, but on the sole condition that the picture was to be shown to none of his subjects but to be sent out of the country as soon as possible. He feared lest some ill-wisher might use it as a means towards his bewitchment. Some months afterwards the chief became seriously ill, and in the minds of his attendants his illness was attributed to some accident having befallen the photographic plate on which they believed the picture of their chief to be imprinted. If that negative had been broken in England, whither it had been sent, their chief's illness would be accounted for. Accordingly they appealed to the divining oracle, who, however, after consulting the "lots," assured them that the picture was intact, and that in consequence the disease must be ascribed to some other cause.

774 The liseku or soul is recognized as the chief agency in dreams. To dream is, in the Yao tongue, kwangamila maseku, where maseku is the plural form of liseku.
787 The liseku is supposed to go out and visit the scenes and persons it dreams about, and in turn is visited by the maseku of others, dead or living. Pains in the body on rising from sleep in the morning are usually attributed to such nocturnal visits,
[753] while disease or pains of a severe type are ascribed to castigations by the whips of the maseku or more frequently of the witches who prowl around during the night watches.

794 Madness, idiocy and the ravings of delirium or disease are accounted for by a similar agency. The sufferers are wa maseku, they of the spirits, and a sudden fit 838 of epilepsy or insanity is described as gakamwile maseku, the spirits have seized him. Such persons are usually regarded with awe, as living in close contact with the unseen, but no incantations or enchantments are ever used to expel the spirit in possession. Some native doctors are credited with a knowledge of certain [755] medicines which they say are effectual in such cases, but their application in no way differs from those employed in treating ordinary types of disease. Idiots and the insane are allowed to wander at will about the village, and only when violent symptoms show themselves as a danger to the community is any physical restraint put upon them.

754 The maseku are also recognized as the inspiring agencies in the ravings of the witch detective. This person, usually a woman, is called in to discover who is the guilty agent in cases of mysterious deaths or outbreak of an epidemic at a village. She arrives on the scene and takes up her abode for a few days previous to her actual demonstration. She mixes with the people, learns all the scandal and gossip of the community, and at night prowls about the houses searching for evidence. On the appointed day she dances, kwpina masalu, to dance the spirits, or kwawesa, to rave or prophecy, and in the ravings of the dance she calls out the name of some party who is afterwards accused of being the mawi or witch. Followed by a crowd of excited spectators she dances through the village spear in hand, stopping here and there to dig up charms or medicines which the supposed witch has buried in the ground as the instruments of his occult practices. It is only in cases of supposed special difficulty, or when the magnitude of the supposed crimes demands that special measures be adopted for their detection, that the services of such a witch detective are called in. In ordinary cases these appeals are made to the divining oracle who consults his "lota" as a means of discovering crimes of this nature.

7: Hetherwick M-5 (ca. 1900) 1902 FT7 Yao FT7

Among the Yaos the human being is believed to be the sole possessor of a liaolu. I have been unable to discover any trace of a theory that the liaolu may pass into any animal or inanimate object and thus confer upon it the nature or power of a fetish. Such belief is cherished among the Angoni and Achewa tribes to the westward by Nyasa and the upper Shire River, and the intelligent Yao is aware of this, but he states that among his people no such belief exists. Even charms which have the effect of healing or warding off disease, or of protecting the wearer from war or wild beasts or other danger by land or water, are supposed to possess this power without any idea of their being possessed by a liaolu or other spirit influence. The nearest approach to such a theory is in the case of certain powerful "doctors" who have obtained special medicine by means of which, at death, they can transform themselves into lions, leopards, crocodiles, etc. Lepers also are sometimes supposed to become hippopotami. But both of these cases must be regarded rather as transmutations of body than transmigrations of soul.

It will be thus seen that the nature of the human liaolu is closely allied to that of the masalu, which are the inspiring agents in madness and in the ecstasy of prophecy or incantation. What the origin of these inspiring masalu is, or to whom they belonged when in bodily life, the Yao holds no theory. He is content to accept them as they are, masalu ipoyo, "Just masalu and nothing more," as he says.

It is, however, when we follow the disembodied liaolu after death and consider its position and power in the other world that we find ourselves in a region of higher spiritual activities.

In dreams or in fainting fits the liaolu leaves the body but only to return to it with the awakening consciousness. At death, however, it leaves its earthly abode never to return. It is now spoken of as having gone to mulungu or milungu. This word, which lies at the basis of all Yao theories of the place of the soul after death, will be dealt with later on as regards its derivation and connections in the Bantu family of languages. In its actual use it bears two significations.

I. The word mulungu is in the first instance applied to the human soul or liaolu after death when it is considered as an inhabitant of the spirit world. Even in life a man, when he meets with any piece of good luck, will be heard to say, "It's my mulungu," as if his soul had an influence in determining the character of his

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

came to the village and in accommodating strangers while he was away. He told them that disputes were to be referred to the headman immediately. Turning to the new headman he said he had to report anything unusual that occurred in the village, and that he was authorized to arbitrate in small cases in his and surrounding villages. 622 537

Kawinga then left the centre of the crowd and went back to where he had been sitting. Then an officiating headman, addressing particularly the women, said, 'Only a few months ago there was a quarrel between the present chief and his elder sisters. These women ran away to Malemia's area in Zomba district without reporting the matter to anyone. This must stop. With effect from to-day any troubles must be brought to the headman without delay: he will settle them. A tree cannot grow without branches and a headman or a chief cannot be known without his people's respect. Do not behave as children. This man cannot do things alone: he must have your help. We leave him in your hands and we do not want to hear about any more trouble. Follow all the instructions the chief has given you.' He took his leave and Nyenje was taken back inside the hut. The people now dispersed to where there was beer and dancing.

The Structural Reincarnation of Village Headmen and Perpetual Relationships

There appear to be a number of significant aspects of the installation ceremonies. First, there is the ritual death and rebirth of the village headman. The heir is 'killed' by a blow with the fist on the forehead, but is reborn the headman. The Yao do not believe that the spirit of the headman is inherited by the heir;[1] he has only eaten the name.[2] But socially he is born again and, logically consistent with this idea, he takes the wives of his predecessor without further marriage negotiation. He also takes over the property of the dead man, his clothes and his huts. 622 829 [587 428]

But this structural reincarnation of the headman has the important implication that the headman is immortal. He shares this characteristic with the group of which he is the leader. When 622 829 601

[1] As the Bemba do. A. I. Richards, 'Mother-right among the Central Bantu' in E. E. Evans-Pritchard and others, Essays Presented to C. G. Seligman, Kegan Paul (London, 1933).

[2] Kulya lina is a synonym for succeeding to headmanship.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

622
●829
601

a village dies, so then does the headman die.[1] In his rebirth, he occupies the status that his predecessor held before he died, in both the kinship system and the political structure.[2] His mother's brother's children whom he formerly called 'cross-cousin' he now calls 'my children'. His mother's younger brothers whom he previously called akwelume (mother's brothers), he now calls 'my younger brothers' (apwanga), and so on. By the extension of this principle, an heir succeeds not only to the status of his mother's brother but also to that of the first of his name. Cigwaja VI, for example, calls the descendants of his mother's mother's mother's brother (Cigwaja IV) 'children'. In fact, he calls the children of any Cigwaja 'my children'.

Within the political field the same principle is used in establishing what we may call 'perpetual relationships'.[3] There are some village headmen who express their relationships to each other or to the chief by a kinship term. The headman Majaja, for example, is the 'son' of Nyambi. In fact, the first Majaja to establish a village was the son of the second Nyambi. The present Majaja is the third incumbent and three Nyambis have died since Nyambi II. Nevertheless, by positional succession both of the present incumbents are translated to the formative phase in their relationships, which is thus perpetuated to-day, and will be, in their view, for ever. The present Liwonde calls Kawinga 'elder brother'. Kawinga is in fact his mother's mother's mother's sister's son. The first Liwonde was the first Kawinga's younger brother. They invaded Nyasaland together. At this significant point in their history their relationship became fixed and then perpetuated in the political structure. This relationship, though phrased in a kinship term and moulded to some extent by the norms of kinship behaviour appropriate to the term used, is in reality political, for it fixes the relative positions of two villages through their headmen.

[1] Sometimes after a village has broken up and the name has not been heard of for some years, some survivor revives it and resuscitates the village.

[2] Dr. Richards calls this 'positional succession'. See 'Some Types of Family Structure amongst the Central Bantu' in A. R. Radcliffe-Brown and Daryll Forde (eds.), African Systems of Kinship and Marriage, Oxford University Press for the International African Institute (London, 1950), 224.

[3] This term was suggested by Dr. I. Cunnison's use of it for a similar practice among the peoples of the Luapula Valley. See his Local Organization on the Luapula Valley.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

code of morals is imparted which is far reaching for the social welfare. Macdonald makes the statement that "when a girl is initiated, she must find some man to be with her on her return; otherwise she will die."[1] Speaking with reserve as to what happened among the Amangoche around Blantyre Mission thirty years ago, I believe that no such practice is or was part of the Machinga Yao ceremonies. I have heard similar stories from other Europeans but I am inclined to discredit the whole idea as a practice among any section of Yao. Of the Anyanja, I cannot speak with the same conviction. Similarly I believe that the practice of artificial dilatation of the vagina is foreign to the Yao though possibly introduced in some places from the Swahili. 881 177 832

At Lupanda and Chiputu, the youth have to undergo a good deal of hardship which is all for their benefit, but year by year, as civilization progresses, greater numbers forego these ceremonies. Their manners and morals suffer in consequence, and one is forced to acknowledge with the "old people" that the younger generation, decked in European clothes, with an air of smug self-conceit, no longer shows that decorum and self-respect which characterise the older, unsophisticated natives. My experience with regard to the attitude of natives to their initiation ceremonies differs from those related in Africana and I am afraid that Macdonald's native friends[2] were laughing at the inquisitiveness of the white man and not at their own experience. 881 177

In the Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute for 1913,[3] Dr. Davey and I gave a short account of part of the ceremony at Lupanda. Since then, through the friendliness of some of the chiefs in Zomba district, I have been present at several more ceremonies. I have collected a number of fresh observations and made a complete set of sketches of the isyaqo or images in relief made on the ground at one of these ceremonies. I have also a complete account of the boys' ceremonies from a celebrated master of ceremonies or m'wichila as he is called, named Mlemala (Kumpika) of Che-chamba, in his own words, with his own songs. In writing down the songs, I have simply recorded the words, without giving the many full and partial repeats, and I have never attempted to score down the airs to which they are sung. 881 124

In the account given below I shall follow Mlemala's practice, giving such variations as I myself have observed. It will be understood that each m'wichila has his own way of doing things so that there may be many variations in detail.

Lupanda: Every year, a certain number of boys in a group of villages reach the age at which the ceremony is commonly performed. In response to requests made by the village headmen, the chief appoints a date on which the usyaqo shall be held; this is usually towards the end of the dry season (September) but before the long grass of the bush has been burnt, as this affords the necessary privacy to those taking part. 881

[1] Op. cit., vol. 2, p. 136. [2] Ibid., p. 130.

[3] H. S. Stannus and J. B. Davey, 'The initiation ceremony for boys among the Yao of Nyasaland', (Jour. Anth. Inst., London, 1913, vol. 43, p. 119-122).

3:Stanaus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

832 Mpasi is a love potion. Men are often anxious that women should ask them for love (ku-pala). A man seeing a woman whom he fancies, takes up some of the dust where she has trodden and mixing this with medicine puts it in his hair. If he meet her again, though he takes no notice of her, she will come to him.

789 When crops are harvested, a layer of the cereal is laid at the bottom of the corn-store, 241 and umbe, which consists of medicines contained in the skull of or made from the body of [826] a still-born infant, is then put in and the store filled. In this way, he who has only a small garden may be sure that his grain will last a long time. Similar medicine is put in gardens with the first rains to insure heavy crops. A man on the approach of the planting season should never give away seed to anyone until his own seed is put in or it may bring bad luck to his crop. This is evidently a superstition arising from the fact that if he gives seed away, he may not have enough left to raise a crop sufficient to support his family. Some people are considered "lucky at planting pumpkins, other people when they plant, reap only watery pumpkins." A man, therefore, will often ask one of the lucky people to plant his pumpkins for him. My hospital boy always got the cook to plant his pumpkins.

789 A man wishing to become a person of importance, with a village of his own, takes a
824 medicine made from a certain tree and then builds his hut in a new place, hoping people will flock to him. The tree is known as chulumbili. Another medicine, taken in the belief that people will flock to a man in consequence, is made from the bush called mtola. Cf. litula planted at the threshold to attract visitors.

789 Conjuring. There are other performances akin to magic in the eyes of the natives,
791 which I have never had the opportunity of witnessing but which would appear to be of the nature of juggling or possibly hypnotism; some resemble the tricks of jugglers; others are more like some of the performances in India. I naturally supposed that they had been learned from men at the coast (Zanzibar), but I am assured that they belong to the Yao themselves.

Kambenje, a Yao of Chiradzulu, well-known at dances and Unyago, after some preliminary dancing, stands still and is covered by a cloth; when the cloth is again removed, he is discovered with a number of squealing puppies held in his loin cloth, which he then hands round. He begins to dance again and the persons to whom the puppies have been given watch him and then find they are holding excrement, not puppies. Or mud-fish are handed round and the people find they are holding women's diapers.

Another trick often performed by Kambenje was the burial of a man in the ground, covered up completely with earth; at the sounding of the drums the buried man comes running in from the back of the watching crowd.

Kasonga, a Yao of Malemya's, priest, and medicine man, after an Unyago ceremony used to put on his red blanket and walk over the hot embers of an enormous fire in the village open space. He admitted that he smeared himself with medicine and an eyewitness told me that when he put his feet on the hot logs, it caused a sizzling sound.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

(fig. 14), and an antelope from Mposa's in Zomba district (fig. 11), also two birds at Pikani's which I should think represent a fowl and a crow (figs. 12, 13). It is interesting to compare these attempts which show a natural feeling for shape, with others, the work of an Angoni youth in touch with a European mission station, who depicts the missionary, his donkey, his dog, and a chair but with little or no sense of form. Note the dots above the animals' backs which represent their feet seen from the other side (Pl. XVIII, figs. 15–18). 532

The models of animals and other objects made in relief on the ground at Lupanda, and of animals in grass and bamboo at Chiputu, are referred to under Initiation Ceremonies.

Decoration is limited to the making of patterns of geometric design on many household articles. The graving of pots is mentioned under Pottery: gourd vessels sometimes have lines and triangles cut on the surface; ivory knife handles may have concentric circles graven on them, the same being true of ivory nose-rings and necklaces. Spear handles and walking sticks, snuff-boxes, pipes, the head-rest and the necks of musical instruments too, are commonly engraved with designs. The wooden rim of the mtungwi basket is always so treated. A series of these designs from baskets is reproduced (Pl. XVII). Occasionally geometric patterns are painted on the walls of huts. The best example I have seen is shown in the photograph which represents a Mohammedan mosque in South Nyasa district. This, I think, gives the key to the origin of these geometric patterns, namely, Swahili influence among the Yao (Pl. IV, fig. 1). 531

Personal ornamentation. The skin color admired most among the Yao is a rich brown and is likened to the color of the milliped, lijongolo. A very black skin is not liked and a man is said to be "as black as a crow." Very light colored skins are equally distasteful to some and considered to resemble the color of a roasted crab. The hair should be jet black. Young men anoint their heads with a decoction of namalenga pods in boiling oil to make the hair black and lustrous. When the hair is turning white, a substance made of the charred roots of a plant called chisinje is put on to make it black. 832 826 302

Natives recognise that some among them have red hairs on their heads or in their beards, and such a man is called matwana, matwana being the name of a caterpillar which lives on the mtwana tree and is covered with long red hairs. 832 826

The old men used to wear wigs, chisindi, made of knotted string blackened and oiled to look like hair; the women wore one called chikwao. These were used to disguise greyness or baldness.

The women sometimes let the hair grow long and then thread beads on wisps of it. This fashion is called chitunga. The large red bead, chitalaka, is now used for the purpose. This fashion was adopted by the old women and those in charge of the Chiputu ceremony. Strings of beads threaded on the hair falling down round the head are called lilombola or malombola (plur.). Women sometimes thread beads on the crest of hair called nchacha. Ordinarily the hair is periodically shaved or sometimes cut with a knife, but the process is painful and therefore unpopular.

302 Shaving is a rite practised in mourning.[1] Some old men and women, especially medicine men, make a practice of never cutting the hair and never washing it (Pl. VII, fig. 3). One [158] occasionally sees lunatics with very long hair in the villages.

The Yao do not follow the Angoni practice of tying up into tags the hair which has been allowed to grow long with palm leaf string, but they sometimes tie up a single wisp and make it up with medicine; this is called kuhcoshi or njoshi (plur.).

The scalp may be shaved in various fashions. Among men, it is quite common to trim the hair on the forehead, ku-ejihile; they must not, however, trim the hair behind (Pl. XVIII, fig. 2). Women, on the contrary, trim both in front and back; a man doing so would be laughed at. A woman for the ceremony of Litiwe shaves the front hair a little higher still, but she must be careful not to do so at other times, otherwise she would make herself a laughing stock (Pl. XVIII, fig. 10). The hair is sometimes shaved on either side of the midline in front, in imitation of temporal baldness; both baldness and this method of shaving are called mawewe (Pl. XVIII, fig. 4). Or again, among old Yao men the crown is shaved; this and natural baldness are called hulasi (Pl. XVIII, fig. 5). It is a fashion much affected by old men and great annoyance is caused them by any young upstart who does the same. Other methods include for men mpita, "a rat's path," an antero-posterior median line shaved (Pl. XVIII, fig. 9); ingolongondinje, two shaved lines made from back to front on either side of the head (Pl. XVIII, fig. 3); for men and women, ligundaliwile, "the garden is (dead) overgrown", one lateral half of the head shaved (Pl. XVIII, fig. 7); for men, nchacha a crest of hair left along the mid-line, both sides of the head being shaved (Pl. XVIII, fig. 8); mwesi (chilemba cha mwesi), "the moon," a crescent shaped area shaved on one or both sides of the head (Pl. XVIII, fig. 6).

The eyebrows and eyelashes are always left to grow normally among the Yao.

The Yao man used to take great pride in his beard; it was the object of a good deal of washing and combing. It grew to considerable length and was not cut or trimmed, but the hair growing down low over the throat was shaved, as was also the hair immediately below the mouth on the under lip and the moustache, as it was thought to get in the way when drinking. The whiskers were allowed to grow like the beard.

[832] Hair on the chin or upper lip of a woman is rarely seen and on account of its rarity is [435] much prized. Such hairs have a monetary value for making medicines, a single hair being sold for eight yards of calico or two shillings. Body hair is considered to be a sign of strength; on the chest, it is known as changalama (ku-changalama, to be strong). Body hair including hair on the back is by no means as rare as has been supposed. Sir H. H. Johnston [114] says that he has never seen it,[2] a statement which shows lack of observation. The hair on the forearms and thighs is called cheuje or chembembe; Hetherwick translates this word,[3] I think wrongly, as hair on the body. Body hair is never removed in any way. A man named Katumbisi ("the little vulture") of Ulumba had a very large amount of body hair; he was likened to a baboon and was a source of much interest to the children who saw him.

[1] Vide supra, p. 264. [2] British Central Africa, op. cit., p. 398. [3] Op. cit., p. 111.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

The hair of the axilla is always removed in men and women, usually by shaving but sometimes in the case of women it is dealt with as in the case of the pubic hair. A man with unshaven axillae would be laughed at and referred to as "a man carrying a fowl in his armpit." The axillary hairs are called mandenga ga mungwapa (ngwapa, the armpit). 302

The pubic hair, mandenga, is removed by both men and women; in men by shaving, in women sometimes by shaving, but preferably by plucking out after the application of a medicine called mesamandenga (ku-mesa, to pluck a fowl), which renders the operation easy. It is prepared from the juice which exudes from the bruised bark of the mesa-mandenga tree. There is a woman at Malemya's who has never grown any axillary or pubic hair; she is called "the rogue elephant"; a rogue elephant has no tusks. It may be noted in passing that the woman has borne children. [824]

A few men have the hair round the anus shaved. Such a service can only be asked of a man's closest intimate, such as a brother-in-law. [607]

I have dealt with tattooing among the Yao in an article, as yet unpublished, on tattooing among the natives of Nyasaland.

The teeth among the Yao proper are never mutilated in any way, though the Amangoche go in for small file marks at the cutting edges of the incisors. 304

The old Yao women, of whom some may still be seen, used to pierce the upper lip and wear a circular disc of wood often two inches in diameter in the hole; this is called lupelele (Pl. VII, fig. 4). The disc was often made of lead and sometimes of ivory. The lead might be hollowed out on the upper surface; it was then called lupelele lua utuli. The disc caused a considerable projection of the upper lip which was much admired. A man, on the other hand, with protruding lips would be nicknamed "the warthog," namanyindu, and considered ill favored. 304 301 [832]

This lupelele fashion has gone out and of later years the chipini or disc worn in the left ala of the nose has become more and more fashionable (Pl. II, fig. 2). Originally the chipini consisted of a small disc of lead not larger than a three-penny piece, which lay on the outer surface of the ala, held in place by a stem, luchinji, which pierced the ala and passed into the nostril. Now the fashion is to wear a very large disc, often an inch in diameter, which itself occupies a hole in the substance of the ala of the nose; it may be flat-topped and called chipini cha utenga ("mushroom"), or the upper surface may often be concave, in which case it is called chipini cha utuli (lituli, a grain mortar). These disks are made of lead and are sometimes called lidini, a recent word and doubtless a corruption of "lead." Others are made of ivory, which may bear some geometric pattern on the exposed surface. A chipini used to cost a fowl.

Among Yao men and women, the lobule of the ear is often pierced but nothing is worn in the hole except possibly a stalk of grass.

Combs for use and for ornament are worn in the hair by both men and women. The ordinary comb without decoration is called likwembeya; it is made of a number of pieces 301

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

Chipiliga: (ku-piliga, to roll round), a bracelet made of beads wound on a bark-cloth core. 301

Chipa: the same, but the beads cover a double core so that the bracelet is wider.

Masku: a circular hollow cylinder of beadwork which lies flat as a bracelet.

Necklaces are much prised by the women. All the children, too, if possible, are provided with some kind or another, even though it be only a piece of string. They are generally made of beads; charms and their ornamental imitations are also worn as necklaces. Some names refer to the pattern of the beadwork, others refer to the length or fashion of the necklace.

Chikupa is a necklace which hangs down in front to the level of the breasts; it does not go under the arms, as Hetherwick states.[1] It consists of three, four, or five strings of beads in rows, arranged in a pattern.

Anguyeje: hangs down as far as the ankles. The word Anguyeje means "chase me!"

Chinganga is made of a single string of beads, but hangs as low as chikupa. Chikupa is of more than one string and various colored beads enter into its composition, often in litawala pattern.

Chipote: consists of a single string of beads of one color tied tightly round the neck without tassel or bunch.

Chikanasuka is worn like chinganga, but beads of more than one color are used.

Chitemangu resembles chikupa, only more strings of beads are used.

Mapunda: a solid cord of bark cloth covered with beads of one color, either dark blue or white, worn round the neck crossing on the chest and under the armpits; the cords are as thick as the finger. These are worn especially by girls after Chiputu.

Chimwembe: a cord of beads as in mapunda, but worn round the neck only. The necklace consists of perhaps six strings of beads, the first of which is worn close to the neck, while each succeeding string hangs lower and more loosely.

Chigoti or chikolija: made of three plaited strands of beads, generally white.

Nkokoliko: a necklace with a tassel, usually consisting of two large red beads.

Mlalu ("a striped snake"): made of four strings of beads, each row being of one color.

Mchila wekowa ("the rat's tail"): like mlalu consisting of two, three or four strings of beads.

Chuma cha masku (masku, "bag"): a hollow cylinder of bead work usually of blue and white, worn as a necklace. Chuma is the Chiyao word for beads; in Chinyanja, it means wealth.

Litawala is a word referring to the pattern of the beadwork, so called from the resemblance to the eyes of the cane-rat; in litawala, white beads are arranged in rosettes round a series of larger black beads in a band.

Most women and many children wear beads round the waist. They are supposed to be very attractive to men. The prostitute wears more than anyone else, for the same reason [832] [648]

[1] Op. cit., p. 117.

4: Stahnus D-5 (ca. 1909)1910 FT7 Yao FT7
Maravi FR4

M 832 this is then added to a brew of new beer and given to her husband to drink. He will then think of and love only herself. This is said to have caused the death of some husbands.

Mpasi: medicine made and drunk by a woman to make her beloved by a certain man.

M 837 844 [847] At confinement a woman has to answer whether she has ever committed adultery; if she denies an adultery she may die, if she owns up and gives the name of the man this can be remedied. Adultery on the part of the father or mother is said to be a cause of abortion.

M 837 A man going away from his village for several months and leaving his wife behind and wishing her to remain faithful puts a knife into its sheath and hangs it in the hut, telling his brother. It is then believed that should anyone commit adultery with his wife separation after the coitus is impossible till some third party comes and pulls the knife from its sheath, and in doing so becomes a witness of the adultery.

M 833 [M 262] [825] [522] Eating of eggs is believed to cause impotence in children or adults. Much fat eaten is said to have the same effect. It is believed that if a hare run up against the leg of a man while going through the forest he will become impotent. It is for this reason that dung of the hare is put at the door of a man to make fun of him as impotent. This is a trick played by Adzukulu.

M Y 837 263 753 If a woman who has committed adultery puts salt into the food while cooking, of which her husband will partake, will thereby cause his death. At the present time among the Yao-Mañanja community a woman always calls one of the children to do it—this speaks for itself. A woman, after connection with her husband, putting salt in food, may cause illness among any children partaking of the food.

M 837 If a man accuse his wife of adultery and she denies it, he will procure medicine and place it under her pillow, then in the middle of the night she will wake her husband and tell him the name of her lover.

M 787 777 Mpingu = ill omen. A journey would always be stopped if on setting out one of the party die; or should they meet an ant-eater or black snake. It used to be considered a sign of bad luck if one of them knocked the toes against a stone; now if blood flows from the big toe they say it presages good luck.

Y 832 826 The Yao at the age of sixteen years climbs the mtumba tree, and finding a fruit which is soft makes a hole in the middle and inserts the penis. After this procedure the penis is said to enlarge as the fruit grows; when the size desired is reached the fruit is cut down.

M 827 The native says that every one has a small animal inside the ear, the sounds it makes causes the man to hear. If the animal escapes the man becomes deaf. The animal is said to be ½-inch long, and wax is said to be its excrement.

M 484 777 Where a man rests on a journey he often puts a stone in the fork of the nearest tree; on many journeys there are regular halting places, often at cross roads, and here every passer-by adds a stone for luck, making quite big heaps.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

who are sexually inactive from contracting ndaka.[1] At the same time the headman gives each household a piece of the fire which has been newly kindled in the traditional way by rubbing two sticks together.

The mystical danger inherent in the act of setting up a new village is well brought out in the propitiatory prayer and the abstinence from sexual intercourse. Once again it is the village headman who must make the offering to his ancestors; and it is the village headman who has intercourse with his wife so that the effluvium from his sexual activity may permeate the medicine in the hut and so protect the villagers from ndaka. Lastly, it is very important that the whole village cooks and is warmed by one fire. 'We are of one fire' expresses the common origin of two villages; though in fact every time a new village is founded a new fire should be kindled. To bring fire from the village of origin is to bring sorcery, since the Yao believe that sorcery can operate between persons closely linked by kinship only. To have one's own fire is to be autonomous from other groups.

The Burdens and Rewards of Headmanship

MacDonald had the perspicuity to see not only that the village headman was the representative of a corporate group and that he represented this group to outsiders, but also that he represented external authority to his villagers. The village headman who in his person stood for the unity of the group, performed certain ritual acts which emphasized this, such as praying to the village ancestors. In spite of the decline of the ritual his position is still regarded as exceptional. Much, however, depends on the rank of the village headman. There may not be much difference in ritual observances and mystical dangers between a headman who has in his charge a meagre three or four huts, and a commoner. In the larger and more important

[1] This is one of the most important mystical concepts of the Yao. I have described this condition and its implications more fully in Marriage among the Machinga Yao of Southern Nyasaland (R.-L.I. Paper), forthcoming. Briefly it is a disease characterized by œdema which affects those who are sexually inactive when they are suddenly brought into contact with a person, or an object which he has touched, after having intercourse. The people most affected are the young and the old, i.e. those who cannot have sexual intercourse. Those who are capable of intercourse are expected to have ritual intercourse with a stranger, and so fortify themselves against this dread disease.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

604 578 Mwanace. He was the junior marriage surety to the marriage and it was his duty to go to the man's marriage surety, report the matter and arrange to take some action to get the man well again. Mwanace, however, refused to take any action. Instead he tauntingly said, 'Take the matter to Ali Kasunka, it is his village.' The woman did so, and Ali Kasunka asked immediately whether she had not taken the matter to Mwanace. She replied that she had and repeated Mwanace's words. Ali Kasunka took the matter up with Mwanace who now objected to being ordered about. Ali Kasunka, however, impressed on Mwanace that the village was his (Ali Kasunka's) and the authority rested with him. He then went to the man's home to tell them of Wayison's illness. The man's representative came and he and Ali Kasunka consulted a diviner. They found that the man was ill from ndaka, which he had contracted in his home village. They found medicine and treated him and he recovered.

604 578 833 787 684 Things came to a head in 1947. Mwanace's younger sister Nyangu II (C11) was married to a soldier who was away. One morning she came to her mother's elder sister, Mbalasyao (C1),[1] and told her that she had found semen on her pudenda and could not recall having had intercourse with anyone. Mbalasyao told Ali Kasunka about this. It was clearly a matter for divination and Ali Kasunka called Mwanace and told him that they ought to consult a diviner. But Mwanace's attitude, even in such a crisis as this, was hostile. He refused and said it was not his work to do this sort of thing. Ali Kasunka therefore went to a diviner with his sister Mbalasyao. The diviner said the semen was Mwanace's. He said that he had entered her hut magically and had sexual intercourse with her without her knowing it.[2] When Ali Kasunka got back to the village he called Mwanace and asked him what tricks he was playing in the village. Mwanace said that he had done nothing—it was not his village. Ali Kasunka then vaguely hinted at his crime. Mwanace pressed for more details and Ali Kasunka accused him outright of sleeping with his sister. He had hardly uttered the accusation before Mwanace had drawn a knife and attacked him. Mwanace was screaming something to the effect that Ali Kasunka had come to him with lies about having seen a diviner. Ali Kasunka beat off the attack and reiterated the accusation. Mwanace now turned his rage upon the woman and tried to catch her. Two of the men in the village then caught Mwanace and subdued

[1] Her mother, Amaliama, was dead.

[2] This is called cigonecesya. It combines the use of magic with sister-incest. [835] To the Yao mind there could be no clearer proof of sorcery. I have already mentioned the importance of sister-incest in relationship to the beliefs surrounding the sorority-group. See p. 146.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

him. The woman in the meantime had run to Chiwalo's hut half a mile away. Here she complained to the chief that Mwanace wanted to kill her. Chiwalo refused to listen to her complaint and sent for Ali Kasunka. When he had come and explained the sequence of events, he continued saying that he would like to take the case to court. Chiwalo, who was Ali Kasunka's wife's father's sister's son (hence a classificatory younger brother) and whose henchman Ali Kasunka was, refused to arbitrate in the case but referred it to Kawinga. On the day of the case the woman's husband came back from the Army. The case was tried and eventually the court assessors awarded a damages claim of £3 to be paid by Mwanace to his sister. The husband, at the same time, said that he could not remain married to her because whenever he saw her he would think that she had slept with her brother and in court he gave Ali Kasunka a marriage termination payment. The tension between Ali Kasunka and his 'sister's son' did not end there however. When they got back to the village Ali Kasunka remonstrated with Mwanace saying, 'Are you not ashamed to have married your sister?' Mwanace said that he could not stand that sort of thing and went back to live uxorilocally.

A crucial point in this case history is that the women did not like Mwanace. Almost certainly there would have been a split in the village had the women had more confidence in Mwanace. The tension between Ali Kasunka and Mwanace, although the conflict is inter-generational, started, as it consistently does, from the relationships of a man to the women of his matrilineage. Without the support of the women, younger brothers or sister's sons are impotent against the power of their senior relatives. It is only when they can induce the women to follow them and to leave their rivals that they can found a new village and thereby begin to earn prestige. Therefore, although the men are the active agents in bringing about a physical act of fission, they are in fact only making manifest a situation which is latent within the lineage.

The position of the senior male matrilineal relative is of fundamental importance in questions involving segmentation. His position is seen most clearly in the dominant matrilineage, in which the name of the village is inherited. The Yao practise 'positional succession'. A man not only succeeds to his mother's brother's name but also to the position of the mother's brother in the social structure as a whole.[1] It follows that when the

[1] See Chap. V, p. 121.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

584 betrothed. In this latter case, the child lives with one of his wives and is brought up in his house.

881 When this girl first menstruates, she tells the man's wife who in turn informs her husband. He then goes out into the bush with his axe, while the wife reports to the young girl's mother and to the man's female relatives. The girl is put to rest on a mat in the hut, the women remaining with her after shutting and fastening the door. The man, meantime, cuts a strip of bark, hammers it out into a piece of cloth, and puts the cloth, wound round and round the stem of the tree from which he has taken it, on the roof of the hut where the girl lies. The first passer-by who notices this sign, spreads the news; then all the women in the village assemble and trill with their tongues to show their joy, while the women in the house sing.

Until the girl's menstrual period is over, the old women relatives sleep each night in her hut, and instruct her in the taboos relating to menstruation. The front door is kept closed, and exit for purposes of nature is made only through the back door. When the girl is up again, the fire in the hut is extinguished, the bark-cloth which she has worn and her sleeping mat are rolled up and put away in the veranda-room, and the girl, having procured clay, replasters the floor of the entire hut. A woman then brings fresh fire from another hut.

841 At subsequent menstrual periods, there is no ceremony. The girl, as is the custom of all women at such times, must sleep on a mat apart from her husband. Sexual intercourse is strictly forbidden under penalty of dire sickness. For the same reason, no menstruating woman may put salt in the food, etc. Until the girl's first menstrual period is over, the man to whom she is betrothed stays in the hut of another wife. Later, he may cohabit with the girl.

881 If the girl has not been to her initiation ceremony, Chiputu,[1] on returning to her husband's hut after this ceremony, the first coitus takes place in the veranda. It must be in-833 complete, so that ejaculation takes place after withdrawal and the semen falls upon her cloth. This should be taken by the girl to some of the old women in the village who report on the proceedings. Should withdrawal not have taken place, the man is considered bad and the girl, unless doctored, may sicken. Later, ordinary cohabitation is allowed. This species of ceremonial coitus is called Kusas mauta or in Chinyanja, Ku-tapa mafuta, "to roll away the oil," referring to the oil with which the girl was anointed at Chiputu. A girl who has no betrothed, on returning from Chiputu to her grandmother is given medicine similarly to prevent her sickening.

584 Betrothal and marriage in adult life. Apart from child betrothal, when a man seeking a wife, sees a girl he fancies, he talks the matter over with his brother, uncle, or some friend, who then goes and makes overtures to the girl's uncle or brother, her guardian or nposue[2] as he is called. The nposue corresponds very closely to our idea of a god-parent; he may be called the sponsor. The word "surety" is used by Macdonald.[3]

[1] Vide infra, p. 209. [2] Nposue is a word adopted from the Chia, Nhosue.
[3] Macdonald, op. cit., vol. 1, p. 118.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

pregnant, the meeting of the sponsors will have to be postponed until after the ceremony connected with her first quickening with child, Litiwo.[1] This ceremony must be performed whether the girl is regularly married or not. One party cannot ask the other for permission that both ceremonies take place at the same time. The answer would be given, "You are asking me to kill two beasts with one bullet." In rare cases, the chief may sanction the marriage and Litiwo ceremonies taking place at about the same time, i.e. the marriage is arranged before the child is born. 584 843

Widowhood. A widow is considered unclean for a period after the death of her husband. She wears a band of palm-leaf or string around her forehead. When the period is passed and some man wishes to marry her, arrangement is made with some other man to cohabit with her for payment; she is then said to be clean and can go to her prospective husband. This ceremony is called kutema ngonji, "to cut the strings," or in Chinyanja, ku-dula nilasa, "to cut the palm"; unless it is performed, the new husband will sicken. The man introduced for the purpose is called by the Yao, lituna, the "hyaena," "he who comes by night." 589 587 [833]

Divorce. From time to time, married people disagree and one deserts the other. If the woman leaves the man, he has a claim against her and the man to whom she goes for all the clothes he has supplied her with during their married life. The husband usually sides with the wife's relatives and arranges that they look after the children; he does not claim them. When the husband and wife mutually wish to separate, they both meet with their sponsors and everything is duly arranged. The husband will give his wife an arrow, saying, "Mpamba (the arrow)," meaning, "If I come back, may it kill me." The place of the arrow may be taken by a bullet or any other object, even a piece of grass. The man will add, "Swaka, swaka, no likowe! (rattling, rattling, it is a rat!)," inferring that if his wife hears something rattling in the house, it is a rat, not himself trying to come back. There is no definite payment of compensation. If the woman marries again, she presents the "arrow" to her second husband as a sign that she has been freed from her first marriage; without this token, no man would marry her. 586

Actual adultery was in the old days very rare owing to the strict enforcement of rules, and the case of a woman demanding divorce on account of the adultery of her husband formed a cause célèbre. The case heard by the chief would last for days and hundreds of people would come to listen. Neighboring Anyanja pleaders would be invited to speak and great excitement prevailed, as these latter would be accompanied by their villagers, who, to the accompaniment of continuous drumming, would sing, "Mbawala anakadwa m'nkonde,[2] (The bush-buck has run his head into the net)," while they ran about running their heads into their game-nets. 684 586

Other causes of separation are neglect of duty, sterility of the wife, and habitual death of the children born. 586

[1] Vide infra, p. 274. [2] Chin.

3:Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

or a girl who has just returned from Chiputa must not touch the child, as it is said, "Her body is hot and would give fever to the child." To guard against such a happening, some "clean" woman, after handing some beads to the mother, will ask to be allowed to take the infant. This indicates that should it sicken, the beads will pay the medicine-woman who comes to cure it. The mother and baby are simply washed in water and are not treated with medicine, unless meconium has been voided before the child was delivered.[1] If the infant dies before it is presented to the outside world, it is disposed of in the same way as a stillborn child, i.e. buried in the ash-heap. About the tenth day, the baby is adorned with a girdle of beads and two little pieces of stick obtained from a medicine-woman to make the infant grow fat. 846 [845 766] [856]

The length of time during which the father and mother refrain from cohabitation after the birth of a baby varies greatly according to circumstance. Four months is probably a minimum, while two years, during which the woman suckles the child, is the common interval. After the first coitus, the man and woman wash themselves and the baby is bathed in the same water to prevent any ill coming to it. 833

Suckling often continues much longer than two years. If the mother dies, the child may be suckled by the grandmother, an aunt, or some other woman, but the breasts must first be treated with medicine or the child would die 853

A child born breech first is called salungo, a word which is also used to denote a variety of domestic fowl which always has the appearance of having its feathers ruffled. A child who dies before the father and mother have resumed sexual relations is buried in a graveyard apart from that of adults. The grave, dug with sticks, not hoes, is very shallow, and when it is filled in, a heap of stones is made above it. Only women attend the burial. A deep grave would cause the mother to go on losing children at an early age. The body of such a child is called lituwu, "hyaena." 845 766

A woman dying undelivered is placed in the grave in the usual way and then, before filling in the earth, one of the grave-diggers descends into the pit, cuts through the enveloping shroud, and incises the abdomen. One end of a long bamboo stick or reed is inserted in the incision and the other end is brought out to the surface of the grave. If this were not done, "many would die in childbirth." 844 766

Twins are not killed by the Yao but are well treated and always cared for equally. They are given similar clothing and food.[2] There is a story that the mother of Nkwamba, 845

[1] Chinyanja, vide infra, p. 288.

[2] C. A. Werner, 'Among the Congo Cannibals, by John H. Weeks, London, 1913, a review,' (Man, vol. 14, no. 15, 1914, p. 15).

I take this opportunity of referring to Miss Werner's review in which, speaking of twins, she says, "They are always among the Anyanja given the names Mapali and Nyama." Mapali in Chinyanja refers to a kind of musical instrument and the Chiyao meaning is "cocoanut palm." Nyama is a Chiyao word which certainly means "the back." It is sometimes used of the second born twin but does not occur in Chinyanja. I have never heard of twins either among the Wayao or the Anyanja spoken of by these names. A mother carries the first born on the right arm and the second born on the left, but, so far as I know, she does not give a duplicate grasping nor make a habit of eating equally with both hands. [114]

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

then listens to an account of the circumstances attending the illness and death. The point 768
at issue is whether there is any evidence pointing to death from unnatural causes which 622
requires consulting a diviner. The chief practically always agrees with the relatives, and it is said that he will never press them to go to the wachisango unnecessarily. The case may end with this conference, or here may begin the long series of events described under usuwi.[1]

During the month subsequent to the funeral, certain taboos have to be observed. The 765 widow may not bathe, and with the exception of the ausilo, all who attended must refrain 768 from sexual intercourse. At the expiration of this period, beer is brewed in the village, and all the friends and relatives are again summoned. This beer-drinking is called "the beer of rottenness," or "the beer of resignation." In addition to the beer, food is provided, and everyone helps himself without ceremony. Chindimba is sung and danced and at the present day, bands of trained dancers attend, including ching'wenyeng' wenye.[2] A pot of beer is sunk into the ground, marking the site of the dead man's house. The night of malapala[3] [833] sees husbands and wives reunited, and the widow may go through ceremonial intercourse with a man appointed for the purpose called litunu or mbilo. Sometimes the widow refuses litunu, and is given medicine instead to cleanse her; her body is then no longer "hot" and likely to bring disease to those about her. A widow does not marry again for two or three 587 years. A young man who loses his wife has no longer any standing in her village after 768
malapala. He is usually given a present, with the suggestion that he go elsewhere. After the death of an infant, the mother is considered unclean. She sleeps on a mat apart from her husband till after the ceremony of shaving, and then undergoes a ceremonial coitus with her husband — in which case he is called litunu — after which, ordinary cohabitation is resumed. If she has been a widow, or if the child was born "with disease," another man acts as litunu.

The morning following malapala, all the fires in the village are extinguished. A fresh 769 blaze is then kindled with the fire-drill, lumangu, either in the chief's house or in some spot [372]
nearby, and from there, fire is carried to all the houses. The ashes of the old fires, the stones supporting the cooking pots, and the porridge sticks are taken to the cross-roads, and there destroyed. Everyone then shaves all his own hair, head, axillae, and pubis. [302]
The custom of the second shaving by the ausilo, described in Africana,[4] is, I think, an adaptation from the Anyanja. A year later, beer is again brewed, and all the relatives summoned to the village to partake of it. There is dancing, but no ceremony.

The Yao bury their dead in regular graveyards in wooded country, the thicker the 764 forest the better, often two or three miles away from a group of villages. Different villages bury their dead in different parts of the burial ground; relatives are usually buried near one another. Graves are never revisited, and no one would enter a graveyard except at the 769 time of a funeral, and then only after obtaining permission from the chief. Such spots are

[1] Vide infra, p. 296.
[2] Vide infra, p. 370 and Pl. I.
[3] Beer-drinking.
[4] Vide infra, p. 296.
[5] Macdonald, op. cit., p. 111.

1: Tew E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

cipate yearly in the great initiation festival for boys and girls. Consequently as they repeat each year the lessons of their own initiation, the ceremonies are the main vehicle of Yao culture.[1]

There are also two Moslem ceremonies:

(1) Jandu, the boys' Moslem baptism, which takes about seven days, and is usually worked in with hpanda:

(2) Nsondo, the girls' Moslem baptism, which is the same as jandu, but usually quite separate from cipatu. It is important that the wife of a Moslem should have her nsondo so that she knows how to prepare the food properly at Ramadan.

Menstrual and Other Taboos

Menstruation is held to be dangerous. A special mat is used by the woman during this time, and is rolled up and kept during the rest of the cycle. The hut is completely replastered after menstruation. Intercourse during menses leads to disease of the man. Sexual contact is dangerous to persons at certain other periods: during initiation ceremonies, during mourning, and for babies who have not been through the protective rite. The danger is thought to lie in ndaka, a dread disease characterized by swelling. This may be transmitted by salt in the food. Deaths are often attributed to 'salt'. Much of the significance of the mourning is that medicines are prepared which protect the mourners against the dangers attendant on sexual activity.

Burial Rites

News of a death must be sent to the chief by a messenger carrying a single fowl. The chief gives a present of calico for wrapping the body, and a goat for the burial men. These are called ausilo, neighbours unrelated to the dead, who volunteer for certain duties. They prepare the body for burial and carry it in procession to the graveyard outside the village. No uninitiated person is allowed to see the funeral. All who attend the burial are prohibited from sexual intercourse for one month. After this time the prohibition is lifted by a ceremony of beer drinking and feasting, and on the following day all fires in the village are extinguished, and then relit, and the mourners are shaved. A year later beer is brewed for a final ceremony.

For a period after her husband's death a widow is unclean, and has to be purified by ritual intercourse with a man who is paid. The widow is not allowed to remarry for two or three years. A widower leaves his wife's village, after receiving a parting gift. The widows of ordinary persons are not inherited. If a man has himself a 'name' (rank and social position), he has an heir, who inherits also the wives of his predecessor. But if the heir (the maternal nephew) has married a cross-cousin (mother's brother's daughter) he would not consider the wife's mother as his inherited wife.

Before the burial the dead man's hut used to be destroyed, together with his possessions. Immediately afterwards a consultation is held as to whether retaliatory action against sorcerers is called for. The ausilo's duties include not only the conducting of the burial, but also the subsequent inquiry and the conduct of the second ceremony, the beer drinking, at which they shave the mourners. A man who has

[1] Main sources for girls' initiation: Heckel, 1933, p. 19; Stannus, 1, 1910, pp. 184–7; 4, 1922, pp. 269–74; Stannus and Dovey, 1913; Duff, 1903, pp. 312–15; Abdullah, 1919, pp. 16–17; Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, pp. 125–30; Werner, 1906, pp. 126–7; Johnston, 1897, p. 410.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

Further enquiries may reveal that this is only a section of a larger village, possibly a hundred or more yards away. 622

The boundaries of a village may not always be clear. Clusters of huts which are part of one village may be physically nearer another, but in the minds of the Yao, who see not only the huts but also the social relationships of the people occupying them, there is no confusion at all. As a general rule the villages are fairly compact and clearly demarcated from others, and even strangers have no difficulty in recognizing the autonomy of the group which is expressed in many different ways. MacDonald recorded that formerly a headman performed a certain amount of ritual which symbolized the unity of the village.[1] Much of this has fallen away, but the unity remains. 621

The ritual surrounding the foundation of a new village bears testimony to its persisting political significance. In this ritual the unity of the group, against other similar groups, including the village from which it has sprung, is expressed. On first arrival at a new village site the men build grass sheds, beginning with that of the headman. That night the headman pours a cone of sacred flour at the root of a tree on the site, and asks the spirits of his ancestors whether the site is propitious. Early next morning he examines the cone to see the answer. If a side of the cone has collapsed it does not augur well and another site is selected. If the cone is still whole it is taken that the spirits acquiesce, and permanent huts can be started. The headman then goes into the bush to find medicines[2] which he mixes with groundbeans. That night, with the medicated groundbeans in the hut, the headman has intercourse with his wife. In the morning those who are not sexually active come to the headman's grass shed to drink some water in which the medicine has been steeped and eat some of the medicated beans with a little porridge, which the headman's wife has prepared from the sacred flour. This medicine is called 'the medicine to strengthen the village' (mtera wakulimbika musi). Until then all members of the village should have been continent but after this sexual relationships may be resumed. The object of the medicine is to prevent those 622 621 787 622 621 751 834 372

[1] See pp. 31-2.

[2] Nkuungwa and nkuta, two plants commonly used for protection against ndoka. See Ln., p. 112. [834]

622 who are sexually inactive from contracting ndaka.[1] At the same 621 time the headman gives each household a piece of the fire which 751 has been newly kindled in the traditional way by rubbing two sticks together.

● 834 The mystical danger inherent in the act of setting up a new 372 village is well brought out in the propitiatory prayer and the abstinence from sexual intercourse. Once again it is the village headman who must make the offering to his ancestors; and it is [833] the village headman who has intercourse with his wife so that the effluvium from his sexual activity may permeate the medicine in the hut and so protect the villagers from ndaka. Lastly, it is very important that the whole village cooks and is warmed by one fire. 'We are of one fire' expresses the common origin of two villages; though in fact every time a new village is founded a new fire should be kindled. To bring fire from the village of origin is to bring sorcery, since the Yao believe that sorcery can operate between persons closely linked by kinship only. To have one's own fire is to be autonomous from other groups.

The Burdens and Rewards of Headmanship

622 MacDonald had the perspicuity to see not only that the village
554 headman was the representative of a corporate group and that he represented this group to outsiders, but also that he represented external authority to his villagers. The village
[769] headman who in his person stood for the unity of the group, performed certain ritual acts which emphasized this, such as praying to the village ancestors. In spite of the decline of the ritual his position is still regarded as exceptional. Much, however, depends on the rank of the village headman. There may not be much difference in ritual observances and mystical dangers between a headman who has in his charge a meagre three or four huts, and a commoner. In the larger and more important

[753] [1] This is one of the most important mystical concepts of the Yao. I have described this condition and its implications more fully in Marriage among the Machinga Yao of Southern Nyasaland (R.-L.I. Paper), forthcoming. Briefly it is a disease characterized by œdema which affects those who are sexually inactive when they are suddenly brought into contact with a person, or an object which he has touched, after having intercourse. The people most affected are the [833] young and the old, i.e. those who cannot have sexual intercourse. Those who are capable of intercourse are expected to have ritual intercourse with a stranger, and so fortify themselves against this dread disease.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

disease ndoka.[1] This disease, as we have seen, affects the sexually inactive when they are brought into contact with those who are sexually active. But the disease will only affect the members of the matrilineage of the errant person. For example, suppose a labour migrant is coming home from Southern Rhodesia and has, among other things, a few pounds of salt in his baggage for a gift to his relatives. Suppose also that while he is returning he has promiscuous intercourse. The salt becomes charged with sexual heat and if he gives it to any of his matrilineal relatives to cook with, they will contract this disease. He must therefore give the salt to members of another matrilineage, even if they live in the same village. 613 753

It is when the unity of the matrilineage is threatened, by either death or division, that its mystical value appears most clearly. When a member of the matrilineage dies the whole matrilineage is thrown into mourning and remains continent for three days. On the fourth day they perform a ritual purification and some members resume sexual relations, but the closest matrilineal relatives, such as the mother and uterine siblings, remain continent for the remainder of the mourning period, which is about 36 days. 613 765 834

It is tension within the lineage which is most closely attended by dire results. The most important reflex of this tension is accusations of sorcery. Good relationships among members of a matrilineage are adjured, mainly because friction opens the way to sorcerers. The Yao believe that sorcerers kill their matrilineal relatives so that they may share the flesh with other sorcerers. The sorcerer is fundamentally a wicked person and may kill any relative but is more likely to kill those whom he hates. Hence it is most important that relationships are kept amicable within a matrilineage for fear that sorcery ensues. 613 626 754

An interesting variation of the dangers of sorcery is the belief that sorcerers take the opportunity of squabbles within a matrilineage to kill one of the members. The rationale behind this is that the diviner's instruments are unable to detect the origin of the sorcery beyond the immediate cause. A diviner will indicate that the cause of death of, say, a child is sorcery, but that the witch is obscured behind the quarrelling words of some relative. Consequently, danger to a matrilineage ensues when one of its 613 754 578 626

[1] See Chap. V, p. 112.

The m'mikili then gets off on the left side, his assistant on the right and they stand in the shallow depressions. The m'mikili starts asking riddles; he says, "Ndewi (riddle)!" and is answered by his assistant "Jiicha (let it come)!" Here is one: 881 533 539

"Kangwe, hapila pansi!"
"The little mouse it has defecated, it has gone into the ground!"
Answer: "Mikiqui (roots)!"

He then goes round the crowd for the answer—if they cannot guess, they say, "Ali nagwe," "it is yourself (to answer)." There are hundreds of such riddles.

The m'mikili points to the tusks depicted in the chinyago and tells the people, "Long ago this used to be an elephant; look at the tusks." The hump at its back he tells them is the same as ching'wadang'wada which they will find farther along.

They pass next to mbunda, the zebra; a pair, male and female, is always figured.

"Ajiji ngati mbunda ja mbuja Achilamala! Yoonpe pakata!"
"This one is it not the zebra of Mister Mlemala! everything (is) beautiful!"

Sometimes a story is told to show that the zebra used to go to the sea to drink but seeing the whale, he ran away and came to the country of the python.

Then to nete, the python; he sings:

"Anaonto hunjinji! pawa, ejo! Yoonpe pakata!"
"You python come and answer! all (is) beautiful!"

At the crocodile, ngwena, he sings:

"Changwena ulamba, pawa! ejo! ahapana mumpalapala mani!"
"Mr Crocodile cleverness, he sleeps at the side of the water!"

At mwezi, the moon:

"Amwezi ulamba, pawa! ejo, amani!"
"You moon cleverness, !"

Next, they come to wakolele ulawa, the people drunk with beer. Two men lie on the ground, feet to feet with nothing on; the pudenda are covered with bark-cloth and the whole of their bodies painted with earth and flour to look like two female figures in earth. The song is:

"Wakolele ulawa: hunindo awawi, wakolele ulawa!"
"Drunk with beer: come and see the women, drunk with beer!"

A moral is pointed: the disgrace to a woman who gets drunk, lies on the ground, and exposes her person. As the m'mikili makes these remarks, the figures breathe stertorously as a drunken woman would. He conducts the wali and all the other people past many of the other images such as chiwi, ngulu, ndemunda, mbala, etc., and only stays at those he considers his own special inyago. The seven specially dealt with by Mlemala were as above together with mbalapi, the sable antelope: [834 689]

3:Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

Peas, sesame (Pisum sativum), are grown in abundance. There are two other varieties; 244 mtsoo (groundnuts), and chimbowira. 262

Sweet potatoes: mbatata (Ipomoea batias), of which the natives are very fond; they distinguish a red and a white variety, mbatata ngunjejeu and mbatata ngunuwera.

The tuber-like root of a bush called ngumbu is also eaten, likewise the young underground shoots of a palm tree. The leaves of the sweet potato and the leaves of many wild growing plants are collected by the women and cooked like spinach; the flowers of pumpkins are used in a similar way. Of fruits eaten, the banana, kipombo, takes first place. A very large number of species of Ficus are grown, including makumbuka, mbinga, mkali, nanira nungunga, kabutu a dwarf banana, kirigwa a wild banana, and mlonga, the plantain. The paw-paw is found all over the district. There are several varieties of pumpkin, lyungu, including mbunda, chindondoli, and a very large species called mtuu wa ngwena, "the crocodile's head." Varieties of cucumbers include lingaka and kahitungula. 262 222

A large number of wild fruits are eaten, among them figs, hikuju (Ficus), kiuku (Uapaca), chitili and kiwago, the fruits of two species of Landolphia, matonga or Kaffir oranges (a species of Strychnos), chikundu, the fruits of Hyphaene (palms), makwakwa (Myrianthus) a wild tree belonging to the mulberry family, and others, ndawa, makangandembo, ndondowake, chingulungulu, chindopolya, malembe, likwenda, etc. The seeds from the heads of bulrushes (Typha) are mashed up and eaten.

All fish are eaten except the ngunga, which always causes urticaria.

The flesh of all the antelopes, of oxen, sheep and goats is eaten greedily; only bushbuck is avoided by some people as it is said to cause a skin eruption. Elephant is shunned by many on account of its rough skin, also rhinoceros because of the ulcers which it often has on its body, and hippopotamus on account of the marks on its back which are thought to be akin to leprosy. People eating the flesh of these animals are supposed often to sicken with leprosy, the pachydermatous skin, the ulceration or anaesthetic depigmented patches of that disease being reproduced, as the case may be. Few will eat pig or warthog on account of the digging habits of these animals. It is thought they may sometimes grub up bodies from graves. These flesh taboos may be due to Mohammedan influence. The lion, hyaena, and fox no one would touch, as they are supposed to be connected with uswi,[1] but the heart of the lion might be eaten to acquire courage. Few will touch leopard flesh, but Kasungo's descendants do so. All will eat of the flesh of the serval cat but very few of the common wild cat. The rock rabbit, ngungwira (mbira, Chin.), is refused by most Yao as it is a "beast without shame," having no tail to hide what should in decency be hid. Very few will partake of the baboon, but monkey is acceptable to many. A few reject porcupine, supposing they will break out in spots, while the zebra may cause stripes, and none will touch the skunk. No one eats zunje, a mouse that is believed to die if it crosses a path. All kinds of rats are eaten, but the shrew-rat and cane-rat only by boys. Snakes 262 753 262 [177] [834]

[1] Vide supra, p. 324.

6: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1947) 1949 FT7 Yao FT7

844 believe that she will die. The man's representatives are therefore able to establish the child's paternity from the birth-pang confessions of the woman.

846 The child is kept in the hut where it was born, for six or seven days, while the umbilical cord dries and falls off. During this time (kuli) the child is unnamed, and [553] it is named only when it is taken out of the hut. Should it die during this period of seclusion it remains unnamed and is referred to by a special term (litaya, pl. mataya). [128] I have therefore been able to enumerate live births by means of the distinction made between miscarriages and still-births (kwasanga) and children who lived long enough to be referred to as mataya. After the birth of the child the woman may not have 846 intercourse for four or five months. To do so would be to endanger the life of the [854] child with a disease called ndaka,[1] which is contracted by a sexually inactive person 834 when he comes into contact with a sexually active person. The husband may have intercourse with a second wife, but must take care to medicate himself so that he does not endanger the life of his child. When the child is about 4 or 5 months of age the parents perform ritual intercourse and medicate the child against the mystical dangers of sexual activity; sexual relations are then resumed.

834 The Yao say that a second child should not be born while the first is still being [853] suckled. Since lactation continues for about two years I am uncertain whether monogynists remain continent, as they say they do, or whether coitus interruptus is 464 practised. It is quite usual for husbands to become labour migrants when their 842 children are still very young. I have known women to write to their husbands who are away working and tell them to return because their children have 'grown', i.e. have been weaned. Labour recruiters had difficulty in recruiting men immediately after the soldiers had been demobilized at the end of the war, because the women objected, saying that they had remained childless long enough and the men must first wait until children were born. However, actual examination of birth-dates [163] shows that children are sometimes born within a year of one another and sometimes there are quite big gaps. The two-year gap between children is probably an ideal which few attain.

3. The Estimation of Fertility

(a) Sundbaerg's Age Divisions

128 As a preliminary estimate of fertility, Sundbaerg's trichotomy of ages may be considered. The argument behind this division of the population into Youth, Middle Age, and Old Age is that those populations with a high proportion of youth have a greater tendency to increase. Table V shows this trichotomy for the Yao with the same material for some other populations shown for comparison. Where the gross reproduction-rate is known for the period shown in the table, this is included.

128 At any one time a certain proportion of the population is absent from the area, 162 usually at some labour centre. Hence the proportions of the population are distributed abnormally. In all there appeared to be a total of sixty-three men, women, and children absent from the hamlets, who would otherwise have been living there. Hence in Table V these have been included in the totals in the 'Yao with absentees' proportions.

[171] [1] A disease of this sort is believed in by many Central African tribes. Among the Nyanja-speaking peoples it is known as tsunpha.

1: Tew . E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

775 782 Kangomba, used to persuade Nyanja to help in the sacrificial rite. When Kapeni in turn fled to Mount Soche from the Ngoni, and died there, the Yao addressed their offerings to him, not to Kangomba.[1] The word Mulungu has sometimes been interpreted to mean Supreme Being, God, Creator, but among the Yao it seems not to have [776] a personal connotation. It was used to describe the agent in any mysterious event,[2] or the place where the ancestor spirits (masoka) were supposed to dwell. Daily life was [769] full of acts of respect towards the ancestors, who were regarded as jealous of the living, and requiring constant propitiation.[3]

Sorcery

754 Accusations of witchcraft and measures for dealing with it play a dominant role in Yao social life. With certain exceptions nearly all diseases and deaths are thought to be caused by sorcery. The exceptional causes are: the hand of God, old age, the transgression of certain taboos, and battle wounds. If sorcery is suspected the relatives of the sick or dead man consult the diviner to identify the offender.

Yao (in common with the Maravi and many peoples of Central Africa) believe that sorcerers have a craving for human flesh, which they satisfy by killing with magic the victims of their malice and hatred. They acquire their magical powers by an apprentice- [835] ship, which might include incestuous relations with mother, sister, or mother-in-law, or sleeping on the grave of the mother for one night. The sorcerer then learns the medicines and finally demonstrates his power by killing a young relative by magic; [266] he waits till the victim is buried, and then magically exhumes him for the secret feast with his fellow sorcerers. Each sorcerer who shares the flesh owes a debt to the one who secured the victim.

[751] Charms are used as preventive measures against sorcery. When a diviner has 754 diagnosed the cause of death as sorcery, retaliatory measures are taken. The headmen 683 of the village could either call in the witchfinder to identify the offender or he could call in the diviner to take action against all the sorcerers in the village. After the [695] diviner, Mabisalila, had revealed the guilty ones, they were challenged to take the poison ordeal to prove their innocence. If they died, the proof and the punishment were simultaneously accomplished. If they survived, the diviner was held to have been at fault and they were acquitted. The witch doctor was supposed to entice sorcerers to the graveside, and slay them with magic more powerful than their own.

[695] The diviner's findings are to-day checked by the poison ordeal administered to a chicken. A sorcerer detected in this way might be asked to provide medicine for the man whose sickness he had caused, or after a death he might be compelled to pay compensation. If the accused is a village headman, he will not be summoned before a chief, but his brother will take the villagers away from the sphere of his influence, or he may be chased away from the district. Accusations of sorcery follow certain regular lines. Nearly all accusations fall on relatives. Diviners are consulted by matrilineal relatives of the sick or dead person, and the man most usually accused is the brother of the accuser, or the husband of his sister. Witchcraft is therefore a manner of expressing the hostilities latent in these relations, which are, in the Yao social system, full of tension.

[1] Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, p. 70.
[2] Hetherwick, 3, 1902.
[3] Heckel, 1935, pp. 14–15; Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, pp. 58–75, 204–13.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

593 brother, is called asyene mbumba, or 'the warden of the sorority-group'. As one would expect among a matrilineal people, the link between a man and his mother and sisters is strong. But it is the link with his sister that is strongest. She relies on him for protection, particularly when she becomes ill, but also in her [582] relationships with her husband. Her brother will be her junior marriage surety, and he will give the consent which will allow a man to marry her. Also a woman's brother will have to consult [731] the diviner and find the medicines when she or her children sicken. In times of distress, as, for example, if her crops have failed, she will appeal to her brother for help. Similarly the man is dependent on his sister in a number of subtle ways. He can always rely on her for hospitality, and is able to get a meal from her if he needs it. But his dependence on his sisters for prestige is much more important. The significance of this will emerge when we see the mbumba organization in the light of the segmentation and fission of the lineage. A man can only found a new village if he has the full support of his sisters. A sister also plays a most important rôle at the birth of his children. She represents him both at the first fœtal-quickening ceremony and at the birth of his child, when she listens to the birth-pang confessions of his wife.[1]

At the same time the relations of sister and brother are restricted by custom. A man must never appear too familiar with his sister, especially in sexual matters. He may not, for example, [513] sleep in the same hut as she does; if she is away and he sleeps in her empty hut he must not make his bed in the place where she usually sleeps. He may not even sit on her sleeping mat. [835] Authentic cases of incest with a sister are extremely rare, whereas I recorded three or four cases of father-daughter incest while I was in the field. Supposed cases of brother-sister incest are recounted and discussed widely. This is understandable because [754] a man who is suspiciously familiar with his sister is suspected of being a sorcerer, since it is widely believed that a sorcerer usually obtains the power that he needs for the performance of his dire deeds by sleeping with his sister. The riddle of the initiands—'What is the sweetest fruit which may not be tasted?' Answer, 'Your sister'—neatly reflects the attitude of the Yao.

The close link of brother and sister is also reflected in the

[1] The significance of this is explained in Chap. VII, p. 185.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

604 578 Mwanace. He was the junior marriage surety to the marriage and it was his duty to go to the man's marriage surety, report the matter and arrange to take some action to get the man well again. Mwanace, however, refused to take any action. Instead he tauntingly said, 'Take the matter to Ali Kasunka, it is his village.' The woman did so, and Ali Kasunka asked immediately whether she had not taken the matter to Mwanace. She replied that she had and repeated Mwanace's words. Ali Kasunka took the matter up with Mwanace who now objected to being ordered about. Ali Kasunka, however, impressed on Mwanace that the village was his (Ali Kasunka's) and the authority rested with him. He then went to the man's home to tell them of Wayison's illness. The man's representative came and he and Ali Kasunka consulted a diviner. They found that the man was ill from ndaka, which he had contracted in his home village. They found medicine and treated him and he recovered.

604 578 833 787 684 Things came to a head in 1947. Mwanace's younger sister Nyangu II (D11) was married to a soldier who was away. One morning she came to her mother's elder sister, Mbalasyao (C1),[1] and told her that she had found semen on her pudenda and could not recall having had intercourse with anyone. Mbalasyao told Ali Kasunka about this. It was clearly a matter for divination and Ali Kasunka called Mwanace and told him that they ought to consult a diviner. But Mwanace's attitude, even in such a crisis as this, was hostile. He refused and said it was not his work to do this sort of thing. Ali Kasunka therefore went to a diviner with his sister Mbalasyao. The diviner said the semen was Mwanace's. He said that he had entered her hut magically and had sexual intercourse with her without her knowing it.[2] When Ali Kasunka got back to the village he called Mwanace and asked him what tricks he was playing in the village. Mwanace said that he had done nothing—it was not his village. Ali Kasunka then vaguely hinted at his crime. Mwanace pressed for more details and Ali Kasunka accused him outright of sleeping with his sister. He had hardly uttered the accusation before Mwanace had drawn a knife and attacked him. Mwanace was screaming something to the effect that Ali Kasunka had come to him with lies about having seen a diviner. Ali Kasunka beat off the attack and reiterated the accusation. Mwanace now turned his rage upon the woman and tried to catch her. Two of the men in the village then caught Mwanace and subdued

[1] Her mother, Amaliama, was dead.

[2] This is called cigonecesya. It combines the use of magic with sister-incest. [835] To the Yao mind there could be no clearer proof of sorcery. I have already mentioned the importance of sister-incest in relationship to the beliefs surrounding the sorority-group. See p. 146.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

The father of one of my servants helped to clear out the remains of a body from his grain store on one occasion and shortly afterwards, it is supposed that his own sons who had said they could not allow it to go on any longer, employed some one to kill him, as he was found, one day, with his head smashed in. There are, I believe, a number of similar cases known. 266

A person is supposed to gain the powers of usawi by procuring medicine from some one willing to sell his secrets at a price, and by performing certain rites usually connected with his method of bathing. It is said that "such and such a one takes his bath on the top of an ant hill" or "on the roof of his house by moonlight." The usual initiation into usawi is a long business, the individual being successively initiated into all the various practices of ulwesa, the supernatural. Medicines are made from a still-born child, from various plants, from the hyaena, etc., and used for preparing the individual in the new science. He is introduced to the hyaena, the fox, etc. It is also asserted that a man may acquire supernatural powers by having sexual intercourse with a near relative, a sister or mother. I have had pointed out to me an old man who is said to have wished thus to acquire power but the women refused and he has been a laughing-stock ever since. 754 575 [835]

On one occasion, a man related to me the pathetic life story of his attempt to find his favorite sister who, like himself, had been taken away to the coast as a slave. In desperation he has adopted the above procedure to try to gain supernatural powers to help him but without result. It would therefore seem to be a method not particularly associated with usawi.

The mawi is supposed to bring about the death of his victim not by administering poison or other such direct means, but by the more subtle mode of making medicine "against" him. When the victim has succumbed and is in due course buried, the mawi arrives at the grave to secure that for which he has been working. To the mawi is attributed the power of making himself invisible, and of taking the form of an animal; owing to the carrion-eating habits of the hyaena, this animal form is most commonly taken. Other animal forms which are associated with the mawi are the leopard, the fox, and the owl, all night-going animals. The Yao say, "The cry of the fox (jackal) is heard at night because he associates with usawi doings." 754 [825]

Arrived at the grave after sunset, the mawi blows his horn, the horn of a small antelope, to call his brethren; a fire with a blue flame is made by the grave and around it they dance, or the grave may be illuminated by blue flame without a visible fire. The mawi calls upon the deceased to rise from the grave, addressing him by the name he bore before he was initiated, i.e. his child-name. Obeying the summons, the dead man rises to the surface of the ground, though how he comes out is not quite clear — "the hole may be ever so small." The risen dead is then killed again by magic medicine and his body divided to be eaten by the congregation of wasawi. It is said that the skull is made into a gourd, the eyes are used as beads, and the ribs formed into a girdle. [266]

11: Sanderson D-5 (ca.1920) 1920 FT7 Yao FT7

The alternative term, wesr, common to nearly all Bantu languages, is usually 601 reserved for "own father," but not always.

Latterly, though the relationship is really akwayo, the husbands of a man's "daughters" or "grand-daughters" are called atati—in a complimentary sense, not of course in defining relationship.

The word akwego is rapidly falling into desuetude for men, and is, nowadays, never used in speaking to a man of that relationship, though used freely as a mode of address to women.

Amao (or achikulu-wangu, -wao, etc., "my, his mother") may be further defined as "great" or "little" in the same manner as atati.

The parents of any atati or amao, and those of one's wife are called ambuje ("grandparent"). Great-grandparents are specified as "father" or "mother of my grandfather (or mother)."

The founder of a family is called Likolo, especially in prayer—except for the [782] augmentative prefix obviously the same word as Nangolo, "a parent," which includes all "fathers" and "mothers."

It is curious in this connection that a name for little girls in general, if one does not know their real name, is chikolo. All these words seem to be derived from -kola ("have," "possess"), and refer, probably, either to actual or potential possession of offspring.

Achinangolo are distinguished as "male" or "female" according as they belong to the father's or mother's side—irrespective of their own sex.

Conclusions.—The Yao nomenclature of relationships, bearing as it does the 601 evidence of former group marriages, is, like other classificatory systems, gradually 178 changing in conformity with the development of the race, so that it can be used [121] to express consanguinity; Rivers has, I believe, called attention to this process.

The Yao custom—now dying out—of lending one's wife to a visitor (usually a [837] close friend) may be a remnant of ideas carried on from communal marriage, though [514] such a privilege is never given to a relative.

In the same way a man who has had no children (a great stigma) may request [837] his friend to help him—he will never ask a relative—and all of the three parties will [840] keep the secret of the true paternity of any children resulting.

In many tribes the marriage of brother and sister, or a man with his 588 sister's child, is permitted to compensate for the law by which a man's property 835 goes to the son of a stranger, but nothing of the kind is allowed among the Yaos. Indeed, they view any incestuous union with particular horror, and such must be very rare. I have heard of a case of a man committing incest with the idea that he would thereby become endued with supernatural [624] power, but all he gained was ostracism; in the old days he would have been burned.

4: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1909)1910 FT7 Yao FT7 Maravi FR4

CIRCUMCISION AND INITIATION CEREMONIES.

Y 304 M [304] Circumcision was not practised among Anyanja. Among Amangoche, Machinga and Yao, the practice was known as Inyago wa lupanda.

Ku-umbala lupanda:—the prepuce was drawn forward and a nick made on the right side of the median line near the frenum. An application mixed with oil was applied. At the present time the Mohammedan practice is common Ku-umbala jando:—the prepuce is drawn forward through a split piece of bamboo and cut off with a sharp knife.

Circumcision is performed on boys usually at the age of nine to twelve years by a medicine man called Ngalika, an honourable calling, in a hut at the Inyago camp. Both patient and operator stand, unless the former is young, when he sits. The ceremony is witnessed only by the boy's friend. Among Mohammedans clitoridectomy used to be performed by a woman operator (nakanga), but, it is said, was discontinued, on account of the heavy mortality, about seven years ago. At the time of the operation a woman was given medicine to make her vomit all unlawful things she might have eaten.

Y 304 881 Initiation ceremonies (including circumcision) take place at irregular intervals. The chief or headman settles the date at which the Inyago shall be held, generally once a year in July, when there is no work and little else to do. Boys who are considered ready will then take part. The elder brother or a friend of a boy settles whether he is ready for circumcision. The mother then takes a present to the chief. The boys, their friends and the medicine man then depart for the bush, sometimes a couple of miles away from the village. The number may vary from three or four to as many as thirty or forty. In the bush grass huts (= masan) are erected for their shelter. Food is brought by the mothers and deposited a little way from the camp, and the friends who have accompanied the boys fetch and carry and act as sentinels to prevent approach of any "outsiders." Six months used to be spent in the bush, now four to eight weeks only, and all the circumcision wounds must be healed by the time of the candidates' return. If a boy die, the mother is not informed, she is allowed to bring food each day; at the end when the return is made rejoicing she is told by one of the men.

The exit from the village is accompanied by the friends dancing Tsanji or Masewe, the boys in old calico (formerly always in bark cloth) walk and sit down on arrival at the place appointed. The circumcision is performed the following day; Y [867] during the time which follows instruction is given them on their duties in after life as men, in good behaviour in their married life, re coitus, eating of food, superstitions regarding salt, etc. When this is all over a message is sent to the village, and the youths, walking quietly dressed in new cloths, are met half-way by the women and girls, who dance and sing; after the return to the village there is Y 551 drinking and dancing, the newly initiated refraining for one day. At the present 881 time the youth probably has some "friend" of the opposite sex with whom he sleeps; [836] until he has had coitus he may not eat food into which salt has been put. His

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

culties are settled by the marriage sureties [1] who only report to him after the affair is settled. In disputes of unusual gravity, the headman may call in unrelated persons [2] to arbitrate, but he himself must be present. 622 692

His own behaviour is expected to be exemplary. Any deviation from the norm is likely to be strictly censured, not only by his own villagers, but also by other village headmen, who may say, 'Important men do not behave in this way.' A man who had an argument with his sister's son was told this. He had taken the dispute to a neighbouring headman who decided against the village headman and rebuked him for behaving in a way not consonant with his position. Village headmen should be above squabbling with their villagers. A village headman who was also a leech had virtually raped a woman whom he was treating. He tried to maintain this was part of the treatment. Her matrilineal relatives reported the matter to the headman of her village and he brought the errant headman in front of the chief who said, 'You are wrong to do this when you are an important man. You are a big man and you act as a commoner does. You ought to be able to show the commoners how to behave.' He was made to pay a compensation of £2 10*s*. and fined 10*s*. Had he been a commoner he would have been made to pay a compensation of only 30*s*. 622 577 558 684

The ultimate sanction to which all headmen are subject, is that their people will leave them if they behave badly. This was the fate of Cikumba. 622 558 837

In 1944 Cikumba had a village of about 30 huts. The son of the first Cikumba, Meya, had two wives who were living virilocally in Cikumba's village. Meya had enlisted in the army. While he was away, Cikumba, the village headman who was Meya's father's sister's son (though he called him 'father' because of positional succession), started taking Meya's two wives to beer drinks. Meya's sister one day asked Cikumba about his behaviour, but he only said that Meya could not do anything as he was far away. Things had gone too far, however, when one morning he was seen coming out of the 166

[1] The representative of a spouse in all affairs arising from conjugal relationships. They are usually senior matrilineal relatives. See Chap. VI, pp. 176–7. Their rôle is discussed fully in Marriage among the Machinga Yao of Southern Nyasaland.

[2] Mundu juampambali, i.e. a person from outside.

622 hut of one of Meya's wives. Meya's sister wrote a letter to tell him 558 of this and he replied that he could do nothing until he returned.
837 In 1946, Meya returned to be demobilized. The third night after his 166 return he questioned his wives about their fidelity during his absence. They at first held out against him but before long he intimidated them into admitting that they had slept with the village headman. Meya now went to complain to Mapata, who was Cikumba's perpetual mother's brother, and he said that he would come to the village the next day.

When Mapata came he confronted Cikumba with the accusation. Cikumba denied it until Mapata called the women. When they confessed Cikumba was forced to admit his guilt. Mapata now decided to call in an arbitrator, Isa, an important but unrelated headman who lived close at hand. Isa said he would come the following day when the matter could be thrashed out. When Isa and Mapata came they asked the women about the affair in public. They admitted the charge and Cikumba did not deny it. Isa then remonstrated with him for being a bad man and said that he was ashamed to hear about it. Cikumba had to pay £6 10s. to the injured man, Meya, who, however, refused to take it. He argued that Cikumba ought to have behaved as a father to him. But Cikumba had not. He, Meya, could not remain living in the village because his wives would be as Cikumba's wives. Isa said that he could not object because Cikumba had caused the trouble and had broken the village himself. How could he complain? Meya took two-thirds of the huts in the village away with him.

The Headman as a Representative of a Corporate Group

622 The headman is not only responsible for keeping the peace
689 between the members of his village, but he is also supposed to control his members in their relationships with other villages. If members take corporate action against other villages, even if they do so without the consent of the headman, the chief will consider the village headman responsible. This was brought out clearly in the relationships between Cikoja, Mapata and Masimbo in Chiwalo's section.

622 Cikoja and Mapata are two of the more important headmen in 689 Chiwalo's section. Masimbo is a minor village headman who lives 423 in Mapata's village area. The quarrel arose over the question of 226 fishing rights in a small pool lying between the two main villages. This pool was excavated by Cikoja and his villagers in 1924 during the significance of this formulation of his position is clear. It is when he shows partiality that the village under him is likely to break up. If he sides with his children his matrilineal kin are almost sure to move out; if he sides with his matrilineal kin, his children are likely either to return to their matrilineal village or, if they are adult, split off to set up a village of their own. The situation is precarious for the headman and it is very difficult for him to avoid a split in the village if he cannot keep the two opposed groups at peace.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

My investigations show that few villages have contained patrilaterally-linked groups through the lives of two village headmen, unless these groups were descended from slaves. When the headman dies his successor assumes his name and social rôle. He also assumes the position of father towards the remaining children, who are in fact his cross-cousins. But his relationship towards them is not the same as that of father to children. The intimate link of the blood tie has been lost and the relationship becomes formalized. As more and more headmen succeed the genealogical link between the patrilaterally-linked groups and the dominant matrilineage becomes more and more remote, and the relationship becomes more and more casual. What usually happens is that shortly after the death of the headman and father, the patrilaterally-linked group takes exception to what the new headman does or says and moves off to found a village of its own. The case history I quoted earlier [1] brought this out clearly. The new headman had had intercourse with the wives of his 'son'. The son complained to the arbitrators in the dispute that 'he should have been as a father to me, and he is not'. The result was that the son refused compensation, and moved out of the village with his sisters to build on his own. When this happens the father-son relationship between the two villages is preserved and perpetuated, but the link is entirely formal and co-operation between them is limited to mutual attendance at funerals.

Patrilaterally-linked Groups as the Legacy of Slavery

Slave-groups in a village are usually linked patrilaterally to the dominant lineage. This is because the headman who was usually the captor of the slaves kept the women as concubines. They were given quasi-child status in the village, so that their children

[1] 'The Split of Cikumba Village', see Chap. V, p. 127.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

585 drum of her married life begins. The man and woman live together peaceably enough as 462 a rule, each attending to his own sphere of work. The man builds the house, the woman muds the floors, she sweeps and cooks, she is the hewer of wood and drawer of water. The man hunts, fishes, makes mats, baskets, the grain store, game traps, and bark-cloth; he looks after the tobacco, and makes the snuff, while his wife brews the beer. He it is who fashions the gourd vessels and carves the spoons, while the woman is the potter (Pl. III, 4) and pipe-maker. Together they hoe and together they harvest, but to the woman falls the monotonous drudgery of pounding and sifting the corn for flour.

842 The Yao have a custom like that of the Anyanja. A sister brings to the house of the [522] newly wedded pair a log of green wood from a mbanga tree which is very hard; the log may be two feet in diameter and four feet long. Should the bride not become pregnant before it is burned away, the husband is laughed at and they may both be teased by having
[558] many logs brought to the house. A man who has no children is much despised and there is a saying, "He must have eaten some ground-nuts," punning on the word for a thick-skinned variety of ground-nut, chimbuwila, a word which also means sterility. An impotent
[837] man may, with the consent of his wife, introduce some male friend into the house, any children born in consequence being claimed as the husband's. He usually chooses some friend from a distance to obviate any attachment springing up between him and the wife. Two married couples may, all consenting, exchange consorts for the night, but they never live together like this for long periods.

582 There is one well-defined marriage taboo; a man may not marry a woman of his own clan. In the old days, he was also restricted to his own tribe, except in the case of slave
[611] wives and wives by capture. Since the clan is inherited from the mother,[1] a man may not marry the daughters of his maternal aunts, but he may marry his other female cousins.
[587] He may not marry two sisters nor a deceased wife's sister; neither do two brothers marry two sisters.

595 The number of wives is limited only by the husband's ability to provide for them. In addition to free wives, a man might formerly have a number of slave wives. The head wife is called kusyeto, the other wives, mangumbu. The word given by Macdonald, akusyeto,[2] meaning the junior wives, is a Chinyanja word and, I think, wrongly applied.

582 It has been said that a man always marries into the village of his wife. For this reason,
[842] female children are always prized as it means an increase in the number of able-bodied men added to the village. In rare cases, the wife might be taken to the husband's village,
[583] as is the Anyanja practice.[3] This, of course, is true in the case of chiefs and headmen. Here, we may also note that no payment is made for the wife and no dowry is received with her.

584 To revert to betrothal, occasionally the sponsors will not agree to the marriage and a 843 runaway match takes place, but in the end, the marriage is usually regularized by the sponsors coming to an agreement. If, however, the woman has in the meantime become

[1] Vide infra, p. 262. [2] Op. cit., p. 131. [3] Stannus, op. cit., p. 309.

4: Stahnus D-5 (ca. 1909)1910 FT7 Yao FT7
Moravi FR4

M 832 this is then added to a brew of new beer and given to her husband to drink. He will then think of and love only herself. This is said to have caused the death of some husbands.

Mpasi: medicine made and drunk by a woman to make her beloved by a certain man.

M 837 844 [847] At confinement a woman has to answer whether she has ever committed adultery; if she denies an adultery she may die, if she owns up and gives the name of the man this can be remedied. Adultery on the part of the father or mother is said to be a cause of abortion.

M 837 A man going away from his village for several months and leaving his wife behind and wishing her to remain faithful puts a knife into its sheath and hangs it in the hut, telling his brother. It is then believed that should anyone commit adultery with his wife separation after the coitus is impossible till some third party comes and pulls the knife from its sheath, and in doing so becomes a witness of the adultery.

M 833 [M 262] [825] [522] Eating of eggs is believed to cause impotence in children or adults. Much fat eaten is said to have the same effect. It is believed that if a hare run up against the leg of a man while going through the forest he will become impotent. It is for this reason that dung of the hare is put at the door of a man to make fun of him as impotent. This is a trick played by Adsukulu.

M Y 837 263 753 If a woman who has committed adultery puts salt into the food while cooking, of which her husband will partake, will thereby cause his death. At the present time among the Yao-Mañanja community a woman always calls one of the children to do it—this speaks for itself. A woman, after connection with her husband, putting salt in food, may cause illness among any children partaking of the food.

M 837 If a man accuse his wife of adultery and she denies it, he will procure medicine and place it under her pillow, then in the middle of the night she will wake her husband and tell him the name of her lover.

M 787 777 Mpingu = ill omen. A journey would always be stopped if on setting out one of the party die; or should they meet an ant-eater or black snake. It used to be considered a sign of bad luck if one of them knocked the toes against a stone; now if blood flows from the big toe they say it presages good luck.

Y 832 826 The Yao at the age of sixteen years climbs the mtawke tree, and finding a fruit which is soft makes a hole in the middle and inserts the penis. After this procedure the penis is said to enlarge as the fruit grows; when the size desired is reached the fruit is cut down.

M 827 The native says that every one has a small animal inside the ear, the sounds it makes causes the man to hear. If the animal escapes the man becomes deaf. The animal is said to be ½-inch long, and wax is said to be its excrement.

M 484 777 Where a man rests on a journey he often puts a stone in the fork of the nearest tree; on many journeys there are regular halting places, often at cross roads, and here every passer-by adds a stone for luck, making quite big heaps.

ndembo, a woman who is pregnant for the first time;[1] kawembere, a woman who has one or two children; mjembere, a woman who has three or four children, and lastly, ndabwe, a woman who is past child-bearing age.

The information which I have been able to collect on abortifacients and contraceptives suggests that they are not used by married people merely to prevent their having more children, but that they are used by people who wish to avoid pregnancies which would be embarrassing, for example, by a woman whose husband is a labour migrant. To what extent the abortifacients and contraceptives are efficacious I cannot say; some, I know for certain, rely on a magical principle, for example, the medicated cord worn by a man during intercourse. On the other hand, the abortifacients taken orally may have some active ingredient.

A barren woman or an impotent man is regarded with some embarrassment and the marriage sureties (arisamangwe) of a childless couple will go to considerable trouble and expense consulting diviners and leeches in an attempt to make their wards productive. Childless couples are regarded as not fully adult and are treated in a patronizing way by those who have borne children. Since a man may marry other wives, barrenness in a woman is a cause of sorrow to her husband, but is not in itself a ground for divorce. Where the man is impotent, however, the woman may divorce him on this ground, though she usually takes a paramour and forces her husband to an action for damages which automatically leads to a divorce because it is the usual practice in these cases for the court to ask the woman if she wants to be divorced from her husband.

In contrast to the satisfaction shown at the birth of a child is the sense of awe evinced when a child is still-born or the woman miscarries. The Yao do not distinguish between still-births and abortions, both events being known by the word kwasanga. This is a verb and refers to the process of abortion; there is no term for the dead foetus itself. I made no attempt to enumerate miscarriages and still-births because they are supposed to be due to breaches of sexual taboos on the part of the husband and wife, and interviewees were naturally reluctant to mention them. Miscarriages and still-births are greatly feared, and the woman is considered to be in a very dangerous condition until she and her husband have carried out a ritual purification. Should a man have intercourse with a woman who has miscarried and not yet been purified he will contract a disease called kwaso which is believed to be invariably fatal. Still-born children or aborted foetuses are buried in a hole dug with sharpened sticks in the bush by the women, whereas children who are born alive and die afterwards are buried in the graveyard in graves dug by men with hoes. The burial spots of still-born babies or aborted foetuses are marked with a stone or broken pottery, since it is believed that to step on them will induce an illness.

The concern of the interested kin-groups is shown in the child-birth procedure. Birth normally takes place in a hut in the presence of the older female relatives of the woman and the female representatives of the man. The husband's representatives are necessary because the Yao, like many other Central African peoples, believe that an adulterine child will not be born to the woman unless she confesses (kapwa) the name of the genitor. If she persists in concealing the identity of the genitor, they

[1] ndembo = elephant, hence ivory. The terms ndembo and ndembo here both refer to the ivory bangles traditionally worn by the woman in the pregnancy initiation ceremony.

11: Sanderson D-5 (ca. 1920) 1920 FT7 Yao FT7

The alternative term, ooe, common to nearly all Bantu languages, is usually reserved for "own father," but not always. 601

Latterly, though the relationship is really ahwaye, the husbands of a man's "daughters" or "grand-daughters" are called atati —in a complimentary sense, not of course in defining relationship.

The word ahwaye is rapidly falling into desuetude for men, and is, nowadays, never used in speaking to a man of that relationship, though used freely as a mode of address to women.

Amao (or achikulu-wangu, -wao, etc., "my, his mother") may be further defined as "great" or "little" in the same manner as atati.

The parents of any atati or amao, and those of one's wife are called ambuje ("grandparent"). Great-grandparents are specified as "father" or "mother of my grandfather (or mother)."

The founder of a family is called Likolo, especially in prayer—except for the augmentative prefix obviously the same word as Nyapolo," a parent," which includes all "fathers" and "mothers." [180]

It is curious in this connection that a name for little girls in general, if one does not know their real name, is chikolo. All these words seem to be derived from -kola ("have," "possess"), and refer, probably, either to actual or potential possession of offspring.

Achiwanpolo are distinguished as "male" or "female" according as they belong to the father's or mother's side—irrespective of their own sex.

Conclusions.—The Yao nomenclature of relationships, bearing as it does the evidence of former group marriages, is, like other classificatory systems, gradually changing in conformity with the development of the race, so that it can be used to express consanguinity; Rivers has, I believe, called attention to this process. 601 198 [12]

The Yao custom—now dying out—of lending one's wife to a visitor (usually a close friend) may be a remnant of ideas carried on from communal marriage, though such a privilege is never given to a relative. [834] [514]

In the same way a man who has had no children (a great stigma) may request his friend to help him—he will never ask a relative—and all of the three parties will keep the secret of the true paternity of any children resulting. [837] [809]

In many tribes the marriage of brother and sister, or a man with his sister's child, is permitted to compensate for the law by which a man's property goes to the son of a stranger, but nothing of the kind is allowed among the Yaos. Indeed, they view any incestuous union with particular horror, and such must be very rare. I have heard of a case of a man committing incest with the idea that he would thereby become endued with supernatural power, but all he gained was ostracism; in the old days he would have been burned. 588 835 [24]

1: Tew E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

cipata yearly in the great initiation festival for boys and girls. Consequently as they repeat each year the lessons of their own initiation, the ceremonies are the main vehicle of Yao culture.[1]

There are also two Moslem ceremonies:

(1) Jando, the boys' Moslem baptism, which takes about seven days, and is usually worked in with lupanda:

(2) Nsondo, the girls' Moslem baptism, which is the same as jando, but usually quite separate from cipata. It is important that the wife of a Moslem should have her nsondo so that she knows how to prepare the food properly at Ramadan.

Menstrual and Other Taboos

Menstruation is held to be dangerous. A special mat is used by the woman during this time, and is rolled up and kept during the rest of the cycle. The hut is completely replastered after menstruation. Intercourse during menses leads to disease of the man. Sexual contact is dangerous to persons at certain other periods: during initiation ceremonies, during mourning, and for babies who have not been through the protective rite. The danger is thought to lie in ndaka, a dread disease characterized by swelling. This may be transmitted by salt in the food. Deaths are often attributed to 'salt'. Much of the significance of the mourning is that medicines are prepared which protect the mourners against the dangers attendant on sexual activity.

Burial Rites

News of a death must be sent to the chief by a messenger carrying a single fowl. The chief gives a present of calico for wrapping the body, and a goat for the burial men. These are called asuilo, neighbours unrelated to the dead, who volunteer for certain duties. They prepare the body for burial and carry it in procession to the graveyard outside the village. No uninitiated person is allowed to see the funeral. All who attend the burial are prohibited from sexual intercourse for one month. After this time the prohibition is lifted by a ceremony of beer drinking and feasting, and on the following day all fires in the village are extinguished, and then relit, and the mourners are shaved. A year later beer is brewed for a final ceremony.

For a period after her husband's death a widow is unclean, and has to be purified by ritual intercourse with a man who is paid. The widow is not allowed to remarry for two or three years. A widower leaves his wife's village, after receiving a parting gift. The widows of ordinary persons are not inherited. If a man has himself a 'name' (rank and social position), he has an heir, who inherits also the wives of his predecessor. But if the heir (the maternal nephew) has married a cross-cousin (mother's brother's daughter) he would not consider the wife's mother as his inherited wife.

Before the burial the dead man's hut used to be destroyed, together with his possessions. Immediately afterwards a consultation is held as to whether retaliatory action against sorcerers is called for. The asuilo's duties include not only the conducting of the burial, but also the subsequent inquiry and the conduct of the second ceremony, the beer drinking, at which they shave the mourners. A man who has

[1] Main sources for girls' initiation: Henkel, 1935, p. 19; Stannus, 1, 1910, pp. 189–7; 4, 1910, pp. 269–70; Stannus and Davey, 1913; Duff, 1903, pp. 312–15; Abdullah, 1919, pp. 16–17; Macdonald, 1882, vol. i, pp. 129–30; Werner, 1906, pp. 126–7; Johnston, 1897, p. 420.

3:Stanzas D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

584 betrothed. In this latter case, the child lives with one of his wives and is brought up in his house.

881 When this girl first menstruates, she tells the man's wife who in turn informs her husband. He then goes out into the bush with his axe, while the wife reports to the young girl's mother and to the man's female relatives. The girl is put to rest on a mat in the hut, the women remaining with her after shutting and fastening the door. The man, meantime, cuts a strip of bark, hammers it out into a piece of cloth, and puts the cloth, wound round and round the stem of the tree from which he has taken it, on the roof of the hut where the girl lies. The first passer-by who notices this sign, spreads the news; then all the women in the village assemble and trill with their tongues to show their joy, while the women in the house sing.

Until the girl's menstrual period is over, the old women relatives sleep each night in her hut, and instruct her in the taboos relating to menstruation. The front door is kept closed, and exit for purposes of nature is made only through the back door. When the girl is up again, the fire in the hut is extinguished, the bark-cloth which she has worn and her sleeping mat are rolled up and put away in the veranda-room, and the girl, having procured clay, replasters the floor of the entire hut. A woman then brings fresh fire from another hut.

●841 At subsequent menstrual periods, there is no ceremony. The girl, as is the custom of all women at such times, must sleep on a mat apart from her husband. Sexual intercourse is strictly forbidden under penalty of dire sickness. For the same reason, no menstruating woman may put salt in the food, etc. Until the girl's first menstrual period is over, the man to whom she is betrothed stays in the hut of another wife. Later, he may cohabit with the girl.

881 833 If the girl has not been to her initiation ceremony, Chipalu,[1] on returning to her husband's hut after this ceremony, the first coitus takes place in the veranda. It must be incomplete, so that ejaculation takes place after withdrawal and the semen falls upon her cloth. This should be taken by the girl to some of the old women in the village who report on the proceedings. Should withdrawal not have taken place, the man is considered bad and the girl, unless doctored, may sicken. Later, ordinary cohabitation is allowed. This species of ceremonial coitus is called Kwaza mauta or in Chinyanja, Ku-tapa mafuta, "to roll away the oil," referring to the oil with which the girl was anointed at Chipalu. A girl who has no betrothed, on returning from Chipalu to her grandmother is given medicine similarly to prevent her sickening.

584 Betrothal and marriage in adult life. Apart from child betrothal, when a man seeking a wife, sees a girl he fancies, he talks the matter over with his brother, uncle, or some friend, who then goes and makes overtures to the girl's uncle or brother, her guardian or sponsor[2] as he is called. The sponsor corresponds very closely to our idea of a god-parent; he may be called the sponsor. The word "surety" is used by Macdonald.[3]

[1] Vide index, p. 388. [2] Sponsor is a word adopted from the Chin. Nkaum.
[3] Macdonald, op. cit., vol. i, p. 118.

3:Stanzus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

30 that she is tattooed more profusely on the buttocks and legs. The cholet of beads was [548] formerly made like mapunda with a bark-cloth cove, called ubwale or ubule (bu-wule, to slip off), referring to the ubule being slipped off over the legs. The fashion now is to wear single strings of beads; each string is of one color but all the strings are different and perhaps number a dozen or more.

Lipamba: a bead belt three-inches wide, worn by Yao women near Lake Nyasa. A bead apron, kiejera, is also worn by them but not near Zombe (Pl. VI, fig. 2).

[783] A woman removes her beads when she is "unclean," that is: (a) during the menstrual period, (b) during the period of mourning for a near relative when coitus is forbidden, (c) before the birth of a child and afterwards until such time as she may resume intercourse with her husband.

A large variety of beads has long been used by the Yao. There are some rarely seen [172] now which were much prized in years gone by, while others are of quite recent introduction. There is no evidence that they themselves made beads and there are few which are probably not of European manufacture.

291 Clothing. The Yao used bark-cloth before the introduction of woven materials. The older people may still be seen in it and it is used in most of the ceremonies. At one time, they also used to weave a cloth called likomambo from a native cotton plant. This has been given up since the introduction of imported materials.

For the method of wearing cloth, see Pl. II, fig. 2. The very poorest people wear only a strip of calico round the pudenda, held in position by a string round the waist hanging long behind and in front; this is called ulitetke. Yao women, when menstruating, wear [841] under this a little piece of cloth called likumbi; it is only worn at this time and not always as in certain other tribes.

721 Warfare. Fighting has naturally played a large part in the life of the Yao as among other African tribes, but at no time were these people a trained fighting race. Warfare was of a desultory character consisting mostly of raids by one feudal chief upon another. A party of men belonging to a chief at enmity with another, meeting some of his followers would challenge them, "Ahumbe, who are you for?" The name of the rival chief in answer was the sign for battle to begin. A false answer would never be given to gain an advantage.
726 When about to throw a spear, the thrower calls to his adversary.

The Yao have possessed guns for a long time. Going out to fight, the Yao used to [177] leap from one foot to the other, and spin their guns around in their hands. They made their own stocks for the rifles. They also used to make a small, cast-iron cannon about three feet long, called kambale, "a little nose." It was carried in the arms and was touched
[534] off by a torch. Drums called ngoje were taken into battle. There is an old war drum at Malemya's village, taken in 1895 by the old Malemya from a Mang'anja chief called Mkulumbo who lived near Lake Chiuta. Since then, this drum has always gone into battle with Malemya. Around it his men would dance and anyone who had killed a man in battle would run up to it and spit upon it in salutation.

4: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1909) 1910 FT7 Yao FT7
Ngoni FR5
Maravi FR4

Women wear their cloth folded across the upper level of the breasts from right to left. Men and women often have two cloths, one over the loins, only the second fastening over the chest. M Y N 291

A menstruating woman also wears a small piece of calico corresponding to a diaper supported by string round the waist.[1] The same thing is worn after child-birth for six months. Angoni women always wear them. M Y N [241] [246]

The Angoni, Chipeta wear their cloth toga-fashion, carrying a fold of cloth on the left arm. An Angoni chief wears three such, blue, white and coloured, the first outside, the last next to the skin.

The material used is now practically everywhere European-made calico, formerly bark cloth only was used by Nyanja, though weaving had been accomplished by Angoni, where skins were and are used as articles of clothing. M Y N [246]

There is nothing to distinguish men of various grades, etc. Fashion at the present time is very capricious—some patterned cloth being much worn one month will have no sale a month later; this is true both of men and of women.

There is no class uniform, and no "costumes" are worn save in dancing (q.v.).

Men are now seen wearing a piece of calico twisted up on the head in turban form, a custom lately introduced from the coast—the only indigenous head-gear is the string skull-cap worn by Angoni widows. N [589]

Under the heading of dress must be included the bead aprons worn by Yao and Angoni. Among the former the use of this garment is restricted to the women, who in the house sometimes wear nothing else; among the Angoni the children often have them and no other clothing.

Sandals are sometimes made of skin and fastened on the foot with a thong when crossing thorny country.

Among Angoni the mwado only used to be worn; this is a small hard-cased fruit which was hollowed out and worn just covering the glans penis. N 291 [24]

FOOD, ETC.

The staple food throughout the country is either maize or rice, the latter only at various spots on the lake shore where it can be grown. Two fixed meals per diem are taken, at 9 or 10 a.m. and again at 6 p.m.; each consists of nsima porridge made from maize flour or rice flour or boiled rice with some ndiwo (relish) to which the salt is added. At odd times the native will eat anything that opportunity offers—a piece of cassava root, a boiled sweet potato, a roasted maize cob, etc. M Y 262 [264]

The nsima is made by stirring flour (ufa) into boiling water till a stiff paste is formed; this is kept cooking for five minutes and then scraped out with a wooden M Y 252

[1] Diaper m mikate; a woman keeps five or six; they are never put away in baskets but always hung up; a woman changes every time she bathes, using two or three per diem; they may be given to a female child to wear, but are then not worn again by a woman.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

613 he cannot escape the fact that in his wife's village he is only 593 a 'billy goat' and that his 'true home' is in his matrilineal 606 village. The pull of the matrilineal village on him, therefore, 591 is always very strong and he is constantly trying to return there.
621 His wife's responsible relatives are constantly trying to avoid this because they know that in time they are likely to lose the children who will probably settle in their father's village if they grow up there. In general, therefore, a husband must have a very good reason before he can get his wife's kinsmen's permission to take her and her children to his village. His wife's relatives do not easily yield. But a headman must live in his own village so that nearly all headmen bring at least one of their wives into their villages. Other men sometimes succeed in doing so especially if their wives are past child-bearing, but it is typically the headman's wife who lives virilocally.

621 The husband's interest in returning to his matrilineal village 591 is heightened by the fact that a man in his wife's village is looked 554 upon as the typical man without prestige: a stranger, whose duty is largely procreative. The theme song at the installation ceremony where the husband was compared with a billy goat, and the common epithet 'chicken rooster' for a husband, reflect the attitude of the Yao towards him. In the song I quoted, the husband was said to be unable to climb high in his village of marriage, however rich he may become.[1] He is, nevertheless, an essential member of the village and the Yao say that it can succeed neither economically nor physically without his aid.

A husband becomes more important when he stays in a village for a long time. He becomes known intimately to the villagers and is conversant with their affairs. He is, therefore, able to advise on many private intra-lineage and intra-village affairs and may even become a marriage surety if there is no more suitable person available. Also in time the husband's position in the village changes. As his children grow up and become active members in the matrilineage, his position of husband becomes supplanted by his position of father, which, in a matrilineal society like that of the Yao, is significant in the same way as that of the mother's brother is in patrilineal societies.

593 The Yao recognize the close bond between father and child.
842 This bond is conceived to be both social and physical and is

[1] See Chap. V, p. 119.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

rationalized in the Yao theory of conception.[1] They believe 593 that after intercourse the semen clots and embeds itself in the womb. From this the child develops and is nurtured by the 842 mother until it is due to be born. Subsequent acts of intercourse add semen to the body of the child and make it fat. Semen from other men may be used, too, to feed the child in its intra-uterine life, but its body and blood are derived from the semen which first clotted. In Yao opinion there can be one father only.

Not all acts of intercourse lead to impregnation because some- 593 times, for various reasons, especially in immature women, the semen fails to clot. There is therefore, to the Yao way of think- 842 ing, some difficulty in determining the 'father' of a child. This 845 difficulty is met by the belief that the intra-uterine child in some 848 way knows about the doings of its parents and in particular knows who its father is. It therefore refuses to be born unless its father is recognized.[2] Hence if a child is born without undue puerperal complications it is assumed to be the offspring of the man who is currently living with its mother. If labour is prolonged, however, the relatives call for confessions (kupaca) from both husband and wife. The husband's confessions are usually formal and simple. The wife's confessions on the other hand are detailed and complete. She confesses the name of an adulterer, and her midwives, including the husband's sisters as his witnesses, wait for the next birth-spasm. If the child is not born at this spasm she is told to confess again. Only after she has confessed to a lover whom the Yao assume to be the genitor will the child eventually be born. After this the aggrieved husband summons the adulterer to court and he is made to accept the fatherhood of the child.

The act of formally accepting the paternity of a child, which 593 is also done when a woman has a child out of wedlock, confers [848] rights of two types on the child. The first set of rights is directly economic and physical. The father is expected to give the mother salt, money for relish, and cloth to help her rear the child. But this side of a father's duties to his child ceases as soon as another 593 man marries the woman. The new husband than takes over the 586

[1] I have dealt with this more fully in Marriage among the Machinga Yao.

[2] It also refuses to be born for other reasons, but the first considered is always the adultery of its parents. See p. 138.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

585 drum of her married life begins. The man and woman live together peaceably enough as a rule, each attending to his own sphere of work. The man builds the house, the woman 462 mude the floors; she sweeps and cooks, she is the hewer of wood and drawer of water. The man hunts, fishes, makes mats, baskets, the grain store, game traps, and bark-cloth; he looks after the tobacco, and makes the snuff, while his wife brews the beer. He it is who fashions the gourd vessels and carves the spoons, while the woman is the potter (Pl. III, 4) and pipe-maker. Together they hoe and together they harvest, but to the woman falls the monotonous drudgery of pounding and sifting the corn for flour.

842 The Yao have a custom like that of the Anyanja. A sister brings to the house of the newly wedded pair a log of green wood from a mbanga tree which is very hard; the log [522] may be two feet in diameter and four feet long. Should the bride not become pregnant before it is burned away, the husband is laughed at and they may both be teased by having
[558] many logs brought to the house. A man who has no children is much despised and there is a saying, "He must have eaten some ground-nuts," punning on the word for a thick-skinned variety of ground-nut, chimbuwila, a word which also means sterility. An impotent
[837] man may, with the consent of his wife, introduce some male friend into the house, any children born in consequence being claimed as the husband's. He usually chooses some friend from a distance to obviate any attachment springing up between him and the wife. Two married couples may, all consenting, exchange consorts for the night, but they never live together like this for long periods.

582 There is one well-defined marriage taboo; a man may not marry a woman of his own clan. In the old days, he was also restricted to his own tribe, except in the case of slave
[611] wives and wives by capture. Since the clan is inherited from the mother,[1] a man may not marry the daughters of his maternal aunts, but he may marry his other female cousins.
[587] He may not marry two sisters nor a deceased wife's sister; neither do two brothers marry two sisters.

595 The number of wives is limited only by the husband's ability to provide for them. In addition to free wives, a man might formerly have a number of slave wives. The head wife is called kusyeto, the other wives, mangumba. The word given by Macdonald, akusyeto,[2] meaning the junior wives, is a Chinyanja word and, I think, wrongly applied.

582 It has been said that a man always marries into the village of his wife. For this reason,
[942] female children are always prized as it means an increase in the number of able-bodied men added to the village. In rare cases, the wife might be taken to the husband's village,
[583] as is the Anyanja practice.[3] This, of course, is true in the case of chiefs and headmen. Here, we may also note that no payment is made for the wife and no dowry is received with her.

584 To revert to betrothal, occasionally the sponsors will not agree to the marriage and a runaway match takes place, but in the end, the marriage is usually regularised by the 843 sponsors coming to an agreement. If, however, the woman has in the meantime become

[1] Vide infra, p. 292. [2] Op. cit., p. 134. [3] Stannus, op. cit., p. 309.

843 Pregnancy and childbirth. An event of the first importance in the Yao world is the 842 first conception or rather the "quickening" with the first child, Lítiwe; this is described below, together with the other ceremonies of the Unyago.[1] After the ceremony of Lítiwe, the period of waiting until the birth of the child passes without further event. A point of medical interest is that native women suffer in many cases from "morning sickness" during pregnancy. That they may have perverted appetites is also recognised, grain husks
[171] and crabs being among the things most commonly desired. As the Anyanja,[2] the Yao believe that the child develops from the semen of the male, although the growth of the child is in some way connected with the mother.

844 When labor commences, the woman retires to the bush a few hundred yards away from her house, attended by some friend, seldom a midwife, and never by her own people, though the mother and the mother-in-law will probably be near the spot. If labor is not completed by evening, they return to the house and the birth may take place actually within its walls.
[171] The attitude assumed in labor is the same as that adopted by the Anyanja,[3] the patient semi-reclining in the arms of another woman who sits behind, grasping her belly. The vulva is smeared with a decoction made from the bark of the mpoza tree as a lubricant, but no other help is given. Kumkuli is the name given to the place of confinement; m'huli means the house where the woman remains for a period after the confinement. The Yao recognise the protruding bag of amniotic fluid and call it the "oil-gourd". "Chisasi chikusichel (The oil-gourd, has it broken?)." They wait until the placenta is delivered before dividing the cord. This is done with the sharp edge of the outer covering of a maize stalk or sugar cane; a knife is never used. The section is made near the placenta or half-way between it and the child, after tying the proximal end with a bark string.

The woman who receives the child at birth is the ambusanga, friend or godmother. If the infant is born in the bush, she carries it back to the house whither they go as soon as labor is completed. The mother herself, unless she is very ill, goes out shortly afterwards and buries the placenta in the ash-heap, using a stick to dig the hole, never a hoe.

845 After the birth, the mother and child must remain in the house until the umbilical cord separates, during which time the husband does not enter, though he may come to the door to look in at the child.

The day on which exit from the house is made, the floor is entirely replastered with mud.
[852 The baby's head is shaved and a cross is made upon it with ngama, a kind of red pigment.
553 The husband may then receive the child and in the case of a first-born, it is he who gives it
302] its name; other children may be named by the ambusanga, the mother, or the aunt.

When the mother leaves the house to appear in public, the nakunga who put her litiwe on,[4] removes it.

So long as the infant remains in the house, care must be taken as to persons allowed to handle it. A woman who has recently had a menstrual period or coitus with her husband,

[1] Vide infra, p. 274. [2] Stannus, op. cit., p. 310. [3] Ibid. [4] Vide infra, p. 274.

3: Stanmus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

881 The following morning at dawn, each guardian washes her ward, anoints her from head to foot with oil and puts on her body new calico, ropes of beads being worn round the neck, and on the head a little bark-cloth cap fringed with beads called chiwala. At a given signal, each guardian picks up her ward on her shoulders and pretends to run away with her to her own village. This is the signal for the fathers of the girls to run up and redeem their children by making presents to the guardians. Each uwali is given her new name by her guardian, often the guardian's own or that of the girl's grandmother. The girls are then set down again, a procession is formed and all return to the village, with great rejoicing, as in the case of the boys. The girls then disperse and go back to live with their mothers or grandmothers. The uali may be made to give an exhibition of their dancing; they dance chawba.

On the occasion of the first visit to Chiputu, as a kind of accessory, there is a ceremony for young married men which forms, as mentioned elsewhere, the second part of their initiation ceremonies or Unyago.

It is known as Kulukwi and is a kind of test of manhood. It was formerly considered as important as Lupanda, but now, I think, the last Kulukwi has been performed; for the young men of the present day, largely emancipated from chief-rule and freed from the ties of tribal custom, care less and less for their old method of up-bringing.

881 When Chiputu is about to take place, any young newly married men whose wives have not become pregnant are pressed to go to their second ceremony. The wife may ask some ●842 woman friend to act as his guardian or some woman may volunteer for the service. Often the young fellow will make pretence of not wanting to go; he may be chased and caught, and with his hands tied behind his back, wearing bark-cloth, he is conducted to the ceremony by other men.

Each young man is attended by a woman guardian and during the first visit to Chiputu, they sleep in two rows of grass sheds facing each other, the women in one line, the young men in the other line, each facing his woman guardian, with fires in the free-way between the two rows of huts. Or they may sleep in one big grass shed, each woman-guardian next to the young man she attends, and so in pairs all down both sides of the grass shed, the fires being made in the middle. The young men have to pay for a share in the food and beer made for Chiputu, but each guardian cooks for her man.

On the afternoon of lyawa lya kuzyanga, the young men are taken off to a place in the bush perhaps a quarter to one mile away from Chiputu, ku-lukwi "to lukwi" as is said.

Here they are formed into a semi-circle of from half a dozen to ten or twenty of them, each with his guardian and a crowd of the grown-up population from the village in attendance. Good advice is given them as to their behavior, especially in regard to their wives and mothers-in-law. Anyone who has any particularly bad trait is sure to hear of it now, the mother or father of the young man having arranged that it shall be brought up. The woman guardian shows to her man red and white beads in her hand and tells him that white indicates health while red means sickness, thereby pointing out to him their deep-rooted beliefs in the diseases associated with intercourse or association with women during menstruation. 881 842

Then follows a test of manhood. The women guardians put little pieces of stick (lukwi = sticks or firewood) on their heads and sing: [533 539]

"Ngempe mkwengu lukwi lwa mauku'chamuno lini!"
"I must give my wife (when sick) firewood of the mauku although it gives lots of ashes!"

What is meant is that when his wife is ill, the husband should fetch the firewood even though he does not know which woods give least ash; the mauku tree gives many ashes. The little piece of wood a few inches long with a notch in the middle is then handed to the young man by his guardian. He places it on the ground in front of him, kneels down, and with a small axe he attempts to divide the stick at the notch. If he is successful, he is greeted with cheers, clapping, and much rejoicing. By proving his power to hit straight, he has also established his manhood; it is prophesied that he will soon have children. Should he miss through nervousness, shouts of derision welcome him and his guardian shows her disgust with his performance. If he is a young fellow well-liked in his village, he may be allowed to make a second attempt. After this ceremony, each couple bathes each other in their shelters by pouring water over the head and body without removing the clothes, thus making brotherhood. Forever after the man must treat this woman with great respect, must not address her for some time, and then only after making her a small present.

The woman guardian picks up the two pieces of the broken lukwi and on the morning before they all leave Chiputu, the mother or sister of the young man gives her a string of red or white beads saying, "These are to bind up the bundle of wood." The man's guardian binds up the pieces of wood with the beads and gives it to her man. When they have returned to the village, they go to the young man's wife and he presents them to her. The guardian, however, steps in and slips off the beads which she keeps, while the wife, pleased at her husband's success, drops the two pieces of wood into the fire.

During the weeks that the girl usili remain under instruction in the village, those young men who have been ku-lukwi sleep in one big enclosure away from their wives and do not cohabit until after the second return from Chiputu is made.

Another ku-lukwi test sometimes, I believe, introduced into Yao ceremonies but really one practiced by the Mpotola people and not proper to the Yao, is as follows: [177]

The guardian lies on the ground, wearing a small loin-cloth, and holding beads in her clenched hands, red in one, white in the other. Her man standing at her feet, bends over her and projects saliva on to her abdomen through a rolled up leaf held between his lips, at the same time choosing one of her hands. If he chooses the hand containing the white beads, he is hailed with delight as a man indeed, but should he choose the hand containing

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

881 the red beads, he is jeered at and laughed to scorn. In this case, the white beads are held to 842 indicate semen, the red beads menstrual blood.

843 Litiwe: This ceremony is enacted at the time when a young married woman quickens with her first child. Litiwe (ku-tiwa, to plait) refers to the plaited cord put round the woman's neck. The woman and her husband both are present, and in addition, only women, possibly with their babies.

For the man, Litiwe is looked upon as the third or completing ceremony of his Unyago. He must have been to Lupanda and Chiputu, otherwise he cannot be admitted to Litiwe. If, however, the husband is not eligible, some other man who has completed his Unyago, is married, and has children, may act as proxy to a woman at Litiwe.

In every district there is generally some woman who arranges and conducts the ceremony. She is called nakanga; naturally, no European has been present at Litiwe but my in-[115] formation was gained from Kuliati, a woman who for years acted as nakanga in the villages round Malemya's kraal, and Chilandana, her old mother who had acted in the same capacity before her and who had come from the old Machinga country where her mother in turn had been a well-known nakanga.

When a woman quickens with child for the first time, her women-folk visit the local nakanga, saying, "We are going to shave so and so (naming the woman) and to get bananas. Tomorrow, we start pounding flour. In three days we shall be ready, and you will come over to arrange things." At the appointed time, the nakanga having partaken of food early because she will not eat for the rest of the day, goes out of the village to some spot a half-mile away in the bush and there sees that all preparations are made and sufficient food collected. The food is supplied by the mothers of the man and woman, and consists essentially of beans (njama and njunde), porridge, sugar-cane, and bananas, but no beer.

All being ready, a procession in single file leaves the village for the appointed place, the woman's sponsor leading, the woman followed by the husband and his sponsor (a woman), and the married women assembled from nearby villages. The sponsor is known as mkamusi or alombwe. Neither mkamusi nor nakanga may have sexual relations with their husbands till after the birth of the child. The woman wears bark-cloth stained black, but may wear blue cloth on returning to the village, while her husband is decked out in his finest cloths and ornaments. They have partaken of food early in the day as they fast until the next day.

Arrived at the place, the man and woman take up their positions on mats separated from each other by some twenty or thirty paces, each with his mkamusi. The man's mkamusi sits on the same mat with him and never leaves him throughout the ceremony. The woman preserves a dignified quiet but the man is expected to make the most of himself sitting with hands on hips, and displaying his fine clothes worn after the fashion of a chief.

While all the assembled crowd of women sit round in a semi-circle, the nakanga commences the proceedings, singing a number of songs to the woman and the man in turn, 539 20. Wawilile galasaya mbasi!

He was "let in" badly over the fish-sticks!

A man had put a lot of fish on spits to roast round the fire. While he went to get some more firewood, a thief came and took all the fish. A stranger then approached and was examining one of the sticks, saying, "There must have been a very nice fat fish on this stick," when the owner returned and immediately accused the innocent stranger of stealing his fish. A native coming across a corpse will run away, using the above expression; for if he reports the matter, he may be the first to be accused.

21. Sungula wa wolechele (mwanache) mu uwile!
The impotent man had born to him a child in a joke!

[842 558] A native man who is impotent is very much looked down on and he is the laughing stock of the village. He is constantly made fun of by the women. The story goes that such a man when being chaffed, said, "All right, let me have the prettiest girl in the village," and they said, "All right, old sungula, you can do her no harm." But it came to pass that she became pregnant and the women were disgraced. The meaning of the expression is: what is done as a joke may become a reality.

22. Mwa winji ng'omba sya nyama unandi!
Days many, hairs of an animal few!

There are more days than there are hairs in an animal's coat! If A has done a good turn to B, and B behaves badly to A, A will remonstrate, using the above expression, meaning, "You may want my help again some day, but I shall then refuse and you will suffer."

23. Chilambe changalinga makono!
The (country) earth cannot (be) measured in cubits!

Meaning, "You never know when you may want return for your good deeds.

24. Kusowela kusalaya, kuruka kulijimiya! or kuponya pa moto!
To be generous (is) to save up, to be stingy (is) to deny oneself! or to throw in the fire!

Kindness returns to the doer.

25. Uwili ukoto, ujiku wangalikunda kunyuma!
Two-ness (is) good, oneness he cannot rub the back!

Ku-kunda = to rub the back of another person while bathing, a thing a native appreciates very much. An expression often used with the meaning, "There is safety in numbers," (winji iakoto!)

26. Kulagaga ukusiulilawilila!
Being in a state of poverty, one must not hang (oneself)!

Ku-laga = to be poor, to be in trouble. Do not give up hope.

27. Kusichilaga kajangalila kwiwoga!
Having become rich one must jump for joy in the dark corner of the house.

162 IT SHOULD
589 be noted that only 27—11 per cent. of the whole sample of 246 women—had never married and that 23, 80 per cent., of these (or 10 per cent. of the total) were under the age of 20 and therefore stood a good chance of yet marrying. Furthermore, 2 of the 4 women over 20 who had not married were known definitely to be incapable of marrying (one is insane and the other has violent epileptic fits).

There were 53 women who were divorcees or widows (21·5 per cent.), but it should be noted that 27 (or 11 per cent. of the 246 women) were over the age of 45 and therefore were past, or nearly past, the child-bearing period. Those in the younger age-groups stood good chances of remarrying. Table IV shows that though [586] the divorce rate is high[1] remarriage is common. By the time a woman's child-
[587] bearing period has ended she has been married on the average 1·7 times. Few marriages are contracted after child-bearing ceases.

TABLE IV. Marriages and Dissolutions of Marriage experienced by all Women over the Age of 13

162
586
587

Present age	No. of women	No. of marriages contracted	No. of divorces experienced	No. widowed	No. still married	No. of marriages per woman	No. of divorces per woman	No. of marriages per woman ended by death of husband	No. of marriages per woman still existing
13–20	45	22	1	..	21	0·49	0·02	0·00	0·46
20–30	79	104	36	4	64	1·32	0·45	0·05	0·81
30–45	70	121	50	18	55	1·73	0·71	0·23	0·79
Over 45	52	88	29	34	25	1·70	0·57	0·65	0·48
Total	246	335	116	54	165	1·36	0·47	0·22	0·67

●842 These statistics, showing the early age of marriage, the early commencement of child-bearing, the high incidence of marriage among women, and the high rate of remarriage during the child-bearing period, all point to the high valuation of [187] reproduction reflected in Yao culture. This is consistent with their social structure, [61] where the major corporate groups are kinship groups and reproduction is the principal method of recruitment to the group. Furthermore, because the standard of living is almost at subsistence level, children do not entail the economic losses
[593] they do in Western society. On the other hand, they are expected to support their [888] aged parents when they themselves are economically independent. In other words, there are few factors militating against reproduction and many in favour of it.

554 We may expect the beliefs and customs surrounding child-birth to reflect the value
884 of reproduction. For instance, the Yao distinguish clearly between women who have [187] borne children and those who have not. When a girl becomes pregnant for the [842] first time she undergoes a special ceremony (litiśo) attended only by women who
[843] have borne children. This ceremony has many of the features of a rite de passage and appears to mark the passing of the woman to a new social status. Furthermore, women are ascribed status according to the number of children they have borne. The word anwali signifies a young woman who has not yet borne a child; anwali

[1] Between a third and a half of the marriages contracted by women had been dissolved by divorce by the time that the child-bearing period had ended.

ndembo, a woman who is pregnant for the first time;[1] kacembere, a woman who has one or two children; mjembere, a woman who has three or four children, and lastly, ndalwa, a woman who is past child-bearing age. 554 584

The information which I have been able to collect on abortifacients and contraceptives suggests that they are not used by married people merely to prevent their having more children, but that they are used by people who wish to avoid pregnancies which would be embarrassing, for example, by a woman whose husband is a labour migrant. To what extent the abortifacients and contraceptives are efficacious I cannot say; some, I know for certain, rely on a magical principle, for example, the medicated cord worn by a man during intercourse. On the other hand, the abortifacients taken orally may have some active ingredient. 842

A barren woman or an impotent man is regarded with some embarrassment and the marriage sureties (arinamangorwe) of a childless couple will go to considerable trouble and expense consulting diviners and leeches in an attempt to make their wards productive. Childless couples are regarded as not fully adult and are treated in a patronizing way by those who have borne children. Since a man may marry other wives, barrenness in a woman is a cause of sorrow to her husband, but is not in itself a ground for divorce. Where the man is impotent, however, the woman may divorce him on this ground, though she usually takes a paramour and forces her husband to an action for damages which automatically leads to a divorce because it is the usual practice in these cases for the court to ask the woman if she wants to be divorced from her husband. [885] [554] [586] [837] [694]

In contrast to the satisfaction shown at the birth of a child is the sense of awe evinced when a child is still-born or the woman miscarries. The Yao do not distinguish between still-births and abortions, both events being known by the word kwasanga. This is a verb and refers to the process of abortion; there is no term for the dead foetus itself. I made no attempt to enumerate miscarriages and still-births because they are supposed to be due to breaches of sexual taboos on the part of the husband and wife, and interviewees were naturally reluctant to mention them. Miscarriages and still-births are greatly feared, and the woman is considered to be in a very dangerous condition until she and her husband have carried out a ritual purification. Should a man have intercourse with a woman who has miscarried and not yet been purified he will contract a disease called lwaso which is believed to be invariably fatal. Still-born children or aborted foetuses are buried in a hole dug with sharpened sticks in the bush by the women, whereas children who are born alive and die afterwards are buried in the graveyard in graves dug by men with hoes. The burial spots of still-born babies or aborted foetuses are marked with a stone or broken pottery, since it is believed that to step on them will induce an illness. 845 [783] [753] [766]

The concern of the interested kin-groups is shown in the child-birth procedure. Birth normally takes place in a hut in the presence of the older female relatives of the woman and the female representatives of the man. The husband's representatives are necessary because the Yao, like many other Central African peoples, believe that an adulterine child will not be born to the woman unless she confesses (kupaca) the name of the genitor. If she persists in concealing the identity of the genitor, they 844

[1] ndembo — elephant, hence ivory. The terms lilibo and ndembo here both refer to the ivory beads traditionally worn by the woman in the pregnancy initiation ceremony. [192] [361]

6: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1947) 1949 FT7 Yao FT7

844 believe that she will die. The man's representatives are therefore able to establish the child's paternity from the birth-pang confessions of the woman.

846 The child is kept in the hut where it was born, for six or seven days, while the umbilical cord dries and falls off. During this time (kuli) the child is unnamed, and [553] it is named only when it is taken out of the hut. Should it die during this period of seclusion it remains unnamed and is referred to by a special term (litaya, pl. mataya). [128] I have therefore been able to enumerate live births by means of the distinction made between miscarriages and still-births (kwatanga) and children who lived long enough to be referred to as mataya. After the birth of the child the woman may not have 846 intercourse for four or five months. To do so would be to endanger the life of the [854] child with a disease called ndaka,[1] which is contracted by a sexually inactive person 834 when he comes into contact with a sexually active person. The husband may have intercourse with a second wife, but must take care to medicate himself so that he does not endanger the life of his child. When the child is about 4 or 5 months of age the parents perform ritual intercourse and medicate the child against the mystical dangers of sexual activity; sexual relations are then resumed.

834 The Yao say that a second child should not be born while the first is still being [853] suckled. Since lactation continues for about two years I am uncertain whether monogynists remain continent, as they say they do, or whether coitus interruptus is 464 practised. It is quite usual for husbands to become labour migrants when their 842 children are still very young. I have known women to write to their husbands who are away working and tell them to return because their children have 'grown', i.e. have been weaned. Labour recruiters had difficulty in recruiting men immediately after the soldiers had been demobilized at the end of the war, because the women objected, saying that they had remained childless long enough and the men must first wait until children were born. However, actual examination of birth-dates [163] shows that children are sometimes born within a year of one another and sometimes there are quite big gaps. The two-year gap between children is probably an ideal which few attain.

3. The Estimation of Fertility

(a) Sundbaerg's Age Divisions

128 As a preliminary estimate of fertility, Sundbaerg's trichotomy of ages may be considered. The argument behind this division of the population into Youth, Middle Age, and Old Age is that those populations with a high proportion of youth have a greater tendency to increase. Table V shows this trichotomy for the Yao with the same material for some other populations shown for comparison. Where the gross reproduction-rate is known for the period shown in the table, this is included.

128 At any one time a certain proportion of the population is absent from the area, 162 usually at some labour centre. Hence the proportions of the population are distributed abnormally. In all there appeared to be a total of sixty-three men, women, and children absent from the hamlets, who would otherwise have been living there. Hence in Table V these have been included in the totals in the 'Yao with absentees' proportions.

[1] A disease of this sort is believed in by many Central African tribes. Among the Nyanja-speaking peoples it is known as tumpha. [171]

11: Sanderson D-5 (ca. 1920) 1920 FT7 Yao FT7

The alternative term, wese, common to nearly all Bantu languages, is usually reserved for "own father," but not always. 601

Latterly, though the relationship is really akwayo, the husbands of a man's "daughters" or "grand-daughters" are called atati—in a complimentary sense, not of course in defining relationship.

The word akwayo is rapidly falling into desuetude for men, and is, nowadays, never used in speaking to a man of that relationship, though used freely as a mode of address to women.

Amao (or achikulu-wangu, -wao, etc., "my, his mother") may be further defined as "great" or "little" in the same manner as atati.

The parents of any atati or amao, and those of one's wife are called ambuje ("grandparent"). Great-grandparents are specified as "father" or "mother of my grandfather (or mother)."

The founder of a family is called Likolo, especially in prayer—except for the augmentative prefix obviously the same word as Nawyolo, "a parent," which includes all "fathers" and "mothers." [182]

It is curious in this connection that a name for little girls in general, if one does not know their real name, is chikolo. All these words seem to be derived from -kola ("have," "possess"), and refer, probably, either to actual or potential possession of offspring.

Achinangolo are distinguished as "male" or "female" according as they belong to the father's or mother's side—irrespective of their own sex.

Conclusions.—The Yao nomenclature of relationships, bearing as it does the evidence of former group marriages, is, like other classificatory systems, gradually changing in conformity with the development of the race, so that it can be used to express consanguinity; Rivers has, I believe, called attention to this process. 601 198 [12]

The Yao custom—now dying out—of lending one's wife to a visitor (usually a close friend) may be a remnant of ideas carried on from communal marriage, though such a privilege is never given to a relative. [834] [514]

In the same way a man who has had no children (a great stigma) may request his friend to help him—he will never ask a relative—and all of the three parties will keep the secret of the true paternity of any children resulting. [837] [840]

In many tribes the marriage of brother and sister, or a man with his sister's child, is permitted to compensate for the law by which a man's property goes to the son of a stranger, but nothing of the kind is allowed among the Yaos. Indeed, they view any incestuous union with particular horror, and such must be very rare. I have heard of a case of a man committing incest with the idea that he would thereby become endued with supernatural power, but all he gained was ostracism; in the old days he would have been burned. 588 835 [24]

1: Tew E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

return to the lupanda, where the initiates are welcomed by their friends. An essential part of the ceremony which takes place at this stage is the exhibition of animal shapes made by the m'mirira, with mounds of earth outlined in flour. These animal shapes differ from lodge to lodge. On the last night before the return to the village the initiates undergo a ceremonial bathing, each boy being carried to the stream by a woman, who thereafter is addressed as 'elder sister'. Finally, with new names, and freshly oiled and decorated, they march to the chief's village to be redeemed by him from the m'mirira with gifts of cloth. After initiation it is a deadly insult to call a boy by his child-name. All who pass through initiation together consider themselves bound by mutual obligations of hospitality.[1]

Girls' initiation takes place in three stages. First, there is cipute, the general initiation before puberty, which corresponds to the boys' lupanda. It takes place at the same time of year, and though it lasts for less than a week, its conclusion is celebrated at lupanda jointly with the conclusion of the boys' initiation. A hut is built in the bush, like the long dormitory of the boys, and four days are spent in dancing and singing. Each girl (aged about eight years) is accompanied by a sponsor, a woman friend who continues to be her mentor during subsequent rites, and who assists in giving the girl instruction in her womanly duties. At the end the girls are bathed and anointed, dressed in new clothes, and each is carried to lupanda by her sponsor. Here they prove their skill in dancing and receive gifts from their friends. Ritual deflloration follows the cipute initiation.[2] Among Mohammedans, clitoridectomy used to be performed by a woman operator, but, it is said, was discontinued in about 1903 on account of the heavy mortality.[3]

After this first general celebration, first pregnancy and first birth are the occasions of separate rites for each girl. According to some informants there were once two ceremonies connected with pregnancy. One, for the young married men whose wives had not yet conceived, used to take place at the same time as cipute; each man was attended by a woman sponsor not his wife, given good advice, and put through various tests of manhood. Mitchell does not confirm the present existence of this ceremony, but in the old days if a man was betrothed or married to a child going through her cipute he had to accompany her.

The litiaw ceremony takes place when a young married woman quickens with child for the first time.[4] The woman, with her sponsor and the married women of the neighbourhood, went out in procession for a ceremony of singing and dancing and instruction to the young couple, followed by a feast. Nowadays no men are allowed to attend litiaw. A child born of a woman who had not undergone this rite used to be buried alive; nowadays her ayeme mbumbu is charged by the chief.

Finally, six days after the first child is born, its naming ceremony forms a last initiation rite for its mother. The husband is formally led into her hut by her sponsor and the married women of the neighbourhood, and the child is taken out for the first time to the accompaniment of feasting and dancing.

Most Yao men and women act as sponsors of initiates at least once, and all parti-

[1] Sources for boys' initiation: Stannus and Dewey, 1913; Werner, 1906, pp. 124-6; Stannus, 4, 1910, pp. 127-63; Henkel, 1935, pp. 19 ff.; Johnston, 1897, p. 409; Weule, 1, 1909, p. 304.
[2] Stannus, 4, 1910, p. 134. [3] Ibid., 1, 1910, p. 296.
[4] Ibid., 4, 1910, p. 174; Henkel, 1935, p. 23, calls it ciwumbu (belly).

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

Native Authority, to the Native Authority, and eventually to the District Commissioner if the case is one which he will countenance. In practice, most cases reach the chief and go no further. Most people accept his decision. Thus the chief has important judicial functions. 692 643

The Chief as his People's Representative

In special situations where the welfare of the chiefdom as a whole has been endangered by an infringement of the mores, the chief may take action. For example, a chief prosecutes a village headman who allows a woman in his village to bear her first child before she has been through the litiwo ceremony. Every woman who becomes pregnant for the first time must undergo this ceremony, during which she is instructed in child welfare and child care. If she bears a child without undergoing the ceremony, she is said to have 'spoilt the country' (ajalwice cilambo), in the sense that she has besmirched its reputation.[1] 643 687 843

Chiefs usually call in magicians 'to smell out' those responsible for keeping back the rain.[2] When the rains fail as they did in 1948–9, their failure is held to be due to the magic of some evilly disposed person. It then becomes the chief's duty to call in a magician to indicate who this person is. The fees for this duty are paid by the chief himself on behalf of his people. 643 787 821

The chief also acts as a representative of his people when they are affected as a whole. For example, Nyambi called in a magician after man-eating lions had taken some of his subjects. This magician called for the hearth-stones and domestic utensils from all the villages in the area, and built them up into a pyramid over which he made some anti-lion medicine. This was to clear the whole chiefdom of man-eating lions. 643 789 731

Nowadays, the chief's representation of his people is seen most clearly in his position in the Administrative framework.[3] The chief represents the Administration to his people since they approach it through him. At the same time the Administration clearly treats him as the representative of his people and consults 643

[1] I was told in Mponda's area that the women undergo this ceremony after the birth of the child, but that it is still obligatory.

[2] Kutowa ulo—lit. 'to tie or bind the rain', in the sense of to make it a prisoner.

[3] I have dealt with this aspect more fully in 'The Political Organization of the Yao of Southern Nyasaland'.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

621 making the oblation, pours the beer or sprinkles the flour at the 613 root (lipata) of a shrine-tree. As would be consistent with this 769 way of looking at the lineage, genealogically-distant ancestors are said to be 'below' (pasi), so that if a Yao wishes to say that a certain person was a matrilineal ancestor many generations back, he would say that he was 'very much below'.

The Concept of 'The Mother'

613 The matrilineal descendants of the founder look upon them-
562 selves as having been fed from the same breast and may express this by saying 'we are of one breast'.[1] Deep sentiment is 843 attached to the idea of the mother among the Yao. There is, for example, a sharp distinction drawn between those women who have had children and those who have not. When a woman becomes pregnant for the first time, she is given instruction in child welfare when she undergoes a special ceremony (litiwo). This is a ceremony which is publicly announced and attended by most of her matrilineal and other kinswomen and acquaintances. No woman may attend this ceremony if she has not herself had a baby. Thus her change in status in the community is clearly shown by the public recognition of her condition, and the fact that she is initiated into secrets which are shared by other mothers only. Her position in the lineage is much enhanced when she becomes a mother. It is the most important step towards becoming a village founder herself.

562 The concept of 'the mother', in general, also appears in the 601 boys' initiation ceremonies. Certain phases of ceremonies may be conducted only with the help of the women. They have to
881 clap the rhythm to which the 'tailmen'[2] do their dances. Here all women are classified as 'mothers' and without their co-operation the ceremonies could not be conducted. During the same ceremonies three women appear with baskets of food on their heads. The tailmen remove the baskets and sacralize the

[1] Tuli peûele pamo. The word mlango, a doorway, is also commonly used. The idea in essence is exactly the same. It is the concept of the children who come to settle around a woman's hut door. It is used as ûandu pamlango pao, the people of his lineage section.

[2] The m'mchira. These are the functionaries in the initiation ceremonies. They carry medicated zebra tails during these ceremonies, and this gives them their names. See especially Stannus, 'The Wayao of Nyasaland', 229 ff.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

613 members goes to an outsider and grumbles to him about the 754 family squabbles[1] and quarrels. The outsider then takes the 578 opportunity of using this squabble to introduce his sorcery into 626 the lineage. The Yao greatly fear backbiting because of their dread of sorcery and none dreads it more than a village headman, a warden of a sorority-group,[2] or a person in the position of having to keep a matrilineage or section together. These people are continually adjuring the women under them—for it is the women who are believed to be the main culprits—not to fight among themselves; and if they do, not to take their complaints to an outsider but to the senior member of the matrilineage. The significance of this in relation to lineage unity is plain enough.

613 Apart from sorcery, strained relationships between members of 578 a matrilineage are believed to be dangerous for other reasons.
843 Malice may adversely affect people who are in mystically danger-
224 ous states. The most common of these states is pregnancy. If a woman has a quarrel with a matrilineage member while she is pregnant she is likely to have a difficult labour. The Yao say 'the womb has heard these bad words'. Another situation where malice or quarrelling will cause difficulties is in hunting. The luck of the chase is capricious and malice may easily bring bad fortune to an otherwise good hunter. For example, a successful hunter once gave each of his two sisters a piece of venison. Each complained that the other had been given the larger piece and quarrelled vehemently about it for weeks. The hunter now found that no game fell into his traps. He went to a diviner who indicated the quarrel of the sisters as the cause of his failure and told the hunter to get them to 'blow water' (kupetya). He did this; good relationships were restored and his traps were filled once more.

613 These deleterious effects, like the curse, are connected in some 578 way with the ancestor spirits. This is sometimes expressed quite 769 clearly when a person is called upon to 'blow water'. A mother who wishes to revoke a curse, a woman who wishes to 755 recant her malice towards her matrilineal relative who is suffering in childbirth, or a man whose sister's son is ill supposedly because

[1] This is called mimi, which I have translated as 'backbiting'. This idea is extremely important, as we shall see later.

[2] i.e. those men who are responsible for their sisters and their descendants. See p. 145 ff.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

585 from of her married life begins. The man and woman live together peaceably enough as a rule, each attending to his own sphere of work. The man builds the house, the woman 462 made the floors; she sweeps and cooks, she is the hewer of wood and drawer of water. The man hunts, fishes, makes mats, baskets, the grain store, game traps, and bark-cloth; he looks after the tobacco, and makes the snuff, while his wife brews the beer. He it is who fashions the gourd vessels and carves the spoons, while the woman is the potter (Pl. III, 4) and pipe-maker. Together they hoe and together they harvest, but to the woman falls the monotonous drudgery of pounding and sifting the corn for flour.

842 The Yao have a custom like that of the Anyanja. A sister brings to the house of the newly wedded pair a log of green wood from a mbanga tree which is very hard; the log [522] may be two feet in diameter and four feet long. Should the bride not become pregnant before it is burned away, the husband is laughed at and they may both be teased by having [558] many logs brought to the house. A man who has no children is much despised and there is a saying, "He must have eaten some ground-nuts," punning on the word for a thick-skinned variety of ground-nut, chimbumba, a word which also means sterility. An impotent [837] man may, with the consent of his wife, introduce some male friend into the house, any children born in consequence being claimed as the husband's. He usually chooses some friend from a distance to obviate any attachment springing up between him and the wife.
Two married couples may, all consenting, exchange consorts for the night, but they never live together like this for long periods.

582 There is one well-defined marriage taboo; a man may not marry a woman of his own clan. In the old days, he was also restricted to his own tribe, except in the case of slave [611] wives and wives by capture. Since the clan is inherited from the mother,[1] a man may not marry the daughters of his maternal aunts, but he may marry his other female cousins.
[587] He may not marry two sisters nor a deceased wife's sister; neither do two brothers marry two sisters.

595 The number of wives is limited only by the husband's ability to provide for them. In addition to free wives, a man might formerly have a number of slave wives. The head wife is called kwapele, the other wives, mangumbo. The word given by Macdonald, akwapele,[2] meaning the junior wives, is a Chinyanja word and, I think, wrongly applied.

582 It has been said that a man always marries into the village of his wife. For this reason, [843] female children are always prized as it means an increase in the number of able-bodied men added to the village. In rare cases, the wife might be taken to the husband's village, [583] as is the Anyanja practice.[3] This, of course, is true in the case of chiefs and headmen. Here, we may also note that no payment is made for the wife and no dowry is received with her.

584 To revert to betrothal, occasionally the sponsors will not agree to the marriage and a 843 runaway match takes place, but in the end, the marriage is usually regularized by the sponsors coming to an agreement. If, however, the woman has in the meantime become

[1] Vide infra, p. 363. [2] Op. cit., p. 134. [3] Stannus, op. cit., p. 338.

3:Stannus D-5 (ca.1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

pregnant, the meeting of the sponsors will have to be postponed until after the ceremony 584 connected with her first quickening with child, Lilisu.[1] This ceremony must be performed 843 whether the girl is regularly married or not. One party cannot ask the other for permission that both ceremonies take place at the same time. The answer would be given, "You are asking me to kill two beasts with one bullet." In rare cases, the chief may sanction the marriage and Lilisu ceremonies taking place at about the same time, i.e. the marriage is arranged before the child is born.

Widowhood. A widow is considered unclean for a period after the death of her husband. 589
She wears a band of palm-leaf or string around her forehead. When the period is passed 587 and some man wishes to marry her, arrangement is made with some other man to cohabit [835] with her for payment; she is then said to be clean and can go to her prospective husband. This ceremony is called kutema mpanji, "to cut the strings," or in Chinyanja, ku-dula mlusu, "to cut the palm"; unless it is performed, the new husband will sicken. The man introduced for the purpose is called by the Yao, kitwa, the "hyaena," "he who comes by night."

Divorce. From time to time, married people disagree and one deserts the other. If the 586 woman leaves the man, he has a claim against her and the man to whom she goes for all the clothes he has supplied her with during their married life. The husband usually sides with the wife's relatives and arranges that they look after the children; he does not claim them. When the husband and wife mutually wish to separate, they both meet with their sponsors and everything is duly arranged. The husband will give his wife an arrow, saying, "Mpamba (the arrow)," meaning, "If I come back, may it kill me." The place of the arrow may be taken by a bullet or any other object, even a piece of grass. The man will add, "Swaka, swaka, na likuwa! (rattling, rattling, it is a rat!)," inferring that if his wife hears something rattling in the house, it is a rat, not himself trying to come back. There is no definite payment of compensation. If the woman marries again, she presents the "arrow" to her second husband as a sign that she has been freed from her first marriage; without this token, no man would marry her.

Actual adultery was in the old days very rare owing to the strict enforcement of rules, 684 and the case of a woman demanding divorce on account of the adultery of her husband 586 formed a causa célèbre. The case heard by the chief would last for days and hundreds of people would come to listen. Neighboring Anyanja pleaders would be invited to speak and great excitement prevailed, as these latter would be accompanied by their villagers, who, to the accompaniment of continuous drumming, would sing, "Mbawala anakafwa m'nkonda,[2] (The bush-buck has run his head into the net)," while they ran about running their heads into their game-nets.

Other causes of separation are neglect of duty, sterility of the wife, and habitual death 586 of the children born.

[1] Vide infra, p. 274. [2] Chin.

843 Pregnancy and childbirth. An event of the first importance in the Yao world is the first conception or rather the "quickening" with the first child, Lilaw; this is described below, together with the other ceremonies of the Usanga.[1] After the ceremony of Lilaw, the period of waiting until the birth of the child passes without further event. A point of medical interest is that native women suffer in many cases from "morning sickness" during pregnancy. That they may have perverted appetites is also recognised, grain husks and crabs being among the things most commonly desired. As the Anyanja,[2] the Yao believe that the child develops from the semen of the male, although the growth of the child is in some way connected with the mother.

844 When labor commences, the woman retires to the bush a few hundred yards away from her house, attended by some friend, seldom a midwife, and never by her own people, though the mother and the mother-in-law will probably be near the spot. If labor is not completed by evening, they return to the house and the birth may take place actually within its walls. The attitude assumed in labor is the same as that adopted by the Anyanja,[3] the patient semi-reclining in the arms of another woman who sits behind, grasping her belly. The vulva is smeared with a decoction made from the bark of the mpoza tree as a lubricant, but no other help is given. Kanduli is the name given to the place of confinement; m'buli means the house where the woman remains for a period after the confinement. The Yao recognise the protruding bag of amniotic fluid and call it the "oil-gourd". "Chiusi chikusiche? (The oil-gourd, has it broken?)." They wait until the placenta is delivered before dividing the cord. This is done with the sharp edge of the outer covering of a maize stalk or sugar cane; a knife is never used. The section is made near the placenta or half-way between it and the child, after tying the proximal end with a bark string.

The woman who receives the child at birth is the ambuasanga, friend or godmother. If the infant is born in the bush, she carries it back to the house whither they go as soon as labor is completed. The mother herself, unless she is very ill, goes out shortly afterwards and buries the placenta in the ash-heap, using a stick to dig the hole, never a hoe.

846 After the birth, the mother and child must remain in the house until the umbilical cord separates, during which time the husband does not enter, though he may come to the door to look in at the child.

852 553 302 The day on which exit from the house is made, the floor is entirely replastered with mud. The baby's head is shaved and a cross is made upon it with mpemu, a kind of red pigment. The husband may then receive the child and in the case of a first-born, it is he who gives it its name; other children may be named by the ambuasanga, the mother, or the aunt.

When the mother leaves the house to appear in public, the mlongo who put her lilaw on,[4] removes it.

So long as the infant remains in the house, care must be taken as to persons allowed to handle it. A woman who has recently had a menstrual period or coitus with her husband,

[1] Vide infra, p. 274. [2] Stannus, op. cit., p. 310. [3] Ibid. [4] Vide infra, p. 274.

281 842 the red beads, he is jeered at and laughed to scorn. In this case, the white beads are held to indicate semen, the red beads menstrual blood.

843 Lítiwe: This ceremony is enacted at the time when a young married woman quickens with her first child. Lítiwe (ku-tiwa, to plait) refers to the plaited cord put round the woman's neck. The woman and her husband both are present, and in addition, only women, possibly with their babies.

For the man, Lítiwe is looked upon as the third or completing ceremony of his Unyago. He must have been to Lupanda and Chiputu, otherwise he cannot be admitted to Lítiwe. If, however, the husband is not eligible, some other man who has completed his Unyago, is married, and has children, may act as proxy to a woman at Lítiwe.

In every district there is generally some woman who arranges and conducts the ceremony. She is called nakunga; naturally, no European has been present at Lítiwe but my information was gained from Kuliati, a woman who for years acted as nakunga in the villages round Malemya's kraal, and Chilandana, her old mother who had acted in the same capacity before her and who had come from the old Machinga country where her mother in turn had been a well-known nakunga. [115]

When a woman quickens with child for the first time, her women-folk visit the local nakunga, saying, "We are going to shave so and so (naming the woman) and to get bananas. Tomorrow, we start pounding flour. In three days we shall be ready, and you will come over to arrange things." At the appointed time, the nakunga having partaken of food early because she will not eat for the rest of the day, goes out of the village to some spot a half-mile away in the bush and there sees that all preparations are made and sufficient food collected. The food is supplied by the mothers of the man and woman, and consists essentially of beans (njama and ngunde), porridge, sugar-cane, and bananas, but no beer.

All being ready, a procession in single file leaves the village for the appointed place, the woman's sponsor leading, the woman followed by the husband and his sponsor (a woman), and the married women assembled from nearby villages. The sponsor is known as nkumusi or olombwe. Neither nkumusi nor nakunga may have sexual relations with their husbands till after the birth of the child. The woman wears bark-cloth stained black, but may wear blue cloth on returning to the village, while her husband is decked out in his finest cloths and ornaments. They have partaken of food early in the day as they fast until the next day.

Arrived at the place, the man and woman take up their positions on mats separated from each other by some twenty or thirty paces, each with his nkumusi. The man's nkumusi sits on the same mat with him and never leaves him throughout the ceremony. The woman preserves a dignified quiet but the man is expected to make the most of himself sitting with hands on hips, and displaying his fine clothes worn after the fashion of a chief.

While all the assembled crowd of women sit round in a semi-circle, the nakunga commences the proceedings, singing a number of songs to the woman and the man in turn, the other women joining in the refrain. A number of these songs are here given but each nahanga has her own favorites which she sings. They are only sung at Litiso. 843 843 533 539

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

Alitete, kainjeni: alitete kainjeni; Chorus Mbiranjirani.
Now you are clucking before laying an egg. Be content then, you must not be running about any more: (Chorus) Call her back for me.

Ku-itera, " to cluck as a hen " comes from ite! ite! the sound of the hen. Another song is:

Aiterejo atolo ta. Chorus Aiterejo.
You must cluck, cluck, cluck, little mouse.

A set of songs sung by Kuliati are as follows:

1. Mbuo ngulunia, kumalambe; amao!
   I have a headache, surely; oh dear me!
2. Japolo, japolo, chemuali, kuutuka wuanyama!
   Startled (like a rabbit), little girl running like a wild animal.
3. Acungula'wa walapire ulambe!
   The rabbit they praise for its cleverness!
   Kumbamula ngolokototo kumlemba ilemba!
   He caught (the name of a little bird) and cut his hair in the ilemba fashion!
4. Uneji ndiri jua ntima; ndigomile, Chenjewero apite!
   I have a good heart; I am contented, Chenjewero has gone!
   Ajipwe mahoutapse, amao! achamao!
   He has taken away all his dancing things, dear me! oh dear me!
5. Wakwambapa'wala, lawe! nowe atulanjire hualala!
   Those who are speaking (an exclamation) show us that we may see!
   Mlasi upwile mbunge, tatemera, chikata, ngolokwe, uujoje; ngolongolokwe uujoje!
   The bamboo has fallen with the wind, they shivered with fear (an alluvial plain), (a thing which is stuck) (well-dressed).

In native songs, full poetical license is indulged in and it is often difficult to give exact translations of them. The first has reference to the woman making a fuss because she feels ill with her pregnancy; this she is not supposed to do. Number 2 refers to the fact that she has a new experience which may cause her to be startled, but she need not fear. In number 3, ngolokototo is a bird which has a mark running back on either side of the mid-line of the crown of its head, resembling a method of hair dressing wherein two bands are shaved from front to back parallel to the mid-line. Chenjewero (number 4) is the name of a man but this reference is apparently now without point. Number 5 is sung by the nahanga when she hears murmurs of others in the crowd starting to sing other songs; she intimates, " Here are we singing, let us hear you others who wanted to sing; you are probably afraid now." In the latter part of this song, words are made use of which have a slang meaning known only to women. Chikata is a woman's slang word for the female pudenda; ngoloko, 843 539

843 538 when in child-birth there is delay in delivery it is said of the woman "Ahalehwe," "she is stuck," from ku-halehwe "to be suspended, to be caught by a thorn"; usajeje, well dressed, is a slang exclamation meaning "everything, everything is out!" The verse refers, of course, as all obstetricians will recognise, to the moment of crowning of the concealing head during parturition when it appears to be stuck; then suddenly it slips over the perineum and "everything, everything is out."

843 533 The nakanga now gives way to the songs of the other women. In different districts different versions of the songs are sung, but the other women will quickly pick up the refrain of the song sung by a woman who has come in from some distance.

843 After these songs, the nakanga instructs the woman and her husband in the care they must take until after the child is born. Macdonald says, speaking of the instructions "but of the quality, we prefer to be silent."[1] What a pity he allows no one else to judge!

The woman is especially cautioned against sitting with her legs crossed; they must be kept apart lest the child in her womb be suffocated. She is also told many useful things concerning her pregnancy and confinement. The husband is cautioned to cease intercourse with his wife or if he has intercourse, his wife may not lie on her back, lest the child be injured.

While this instruction is going on, all the assembled women cook and eat the feast [751] which has been made for them. When all has been said, the nakanga anoints the man with castor oil, which has in the meantime been warmed, and ties round the neck of the woman the litiwo, a cord made of plaited bark-cloth with a tassel in front; at the base of the tassel white beads are strung for good luck, and at the end of the tassel, red beads are affixed, having symbolic reference to the haemorrhage at the time of childbirth. The woman wears only a strip of calico of two hands breadth called wletu. She is anointed on the head, body, and limbs.

The tying of the litiwo is the sign for dancing to begin. It is a dance in which women try to excel one another. They come with all their tattoo marks on buttocks, thighs, and abdomen renovated; they wear diaper-fashion a narrow strip of cloth, always black in color, and round their bodies numerous strings of beads. With the beginning of the dancing, their other clothes are thrown off and practically naked, they vie with one other in exhibiting their charms and skill in dancing, which afterwards becomes the subject of much discussion among the women onlookers. "So and so is really too old and skinny for such exhibition," and "So and so has buttocks as flat as a wall," while "Such and such a one is fat and beautiful and dances wonderfully, with such abandon," etc. In front of the woman [431] is set a wooden plate, in front of the man a mat, and on these are thrown donations by the dancers and onlookers, consisting of beads etc., or nowadays pennies and small silver coins to help to pay the expenses of the entertainment and, in the woman's case, to buy medicine which may be necessary should the baby fall ill. When the wedded couple are

[1] Africana, op. cit., vol. 1, p. 129.

3:Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

generous and popular, the donations may mount up to a useful sum. Dancing goes on late into the afternoon when all return to the village. 843

The man may not speak to his guardian again until after the birth of the child. The two women guardians, the mbususi and the nahunga, as a rule cease sexual intercourse with their husbands during the same period or, at all events, during the last month before the birth of the child.

The child born of a woman who has not gone through Litiwe is buried alive. [847]

Chieftainship. The Yao when they migrated to their present country were headed by a number of their chiefs. These eventually settled in different areas adjacent to one another, each ruling over a considerable tract of country. The chief was supported by a number of headmen, each of whom looked after a village; the chiefs and headmen in turn being assisted by the village elders. 622 643

Often among a chief's counselors one found a number of his relatives, and sons and brothers were often made headmen. A man assuming chieftainship often had to dispose of a brother of whom he was afraid. 643

Chieftainship is hereditary, the chief's name being passed on to each successor. Succession is to eldest son of the eldest sister or a son of some other sister. Failing these, it passes to a grand-nephew. If there is no acceptable adult nephew, a full brother may succeed.

Macdonald's account of the Malemya's succession[1] is, I believe, incorrect. The old Malemya (Nalutumbo) was succeeded according to custom by his nephew, Kasabola who, as Malemya, was called Ndalama. Kumtaja was not a younger brother of Nalutumbo or Kasobola, but a cousin of the latter. Ndalama was succeeded by a nephew, not the eldest but the second son of a sister, the eldest having already succeeded to the chieftainship of Kumtaja was therefore ineligible. The present Malemya will be succeeded by a grand-nephew, the son of a daughter of his eldest sister, his sister having no sons. [114]

A successor inherited all the wives and slaves of the deceased chief and all his goods and chattels, guns, ivory and gardens. Any small possessions might be divided among the deceased's children and in the case of guns, those who had always used them often laid claims not to be separated from their weapons; these claims were often allowed by the new chief. 643 428

In the same way, any ordinary man's successor is his nephew, the son of a sister, who inherits all goods and chattels and slave wives, but not free-born wives, nor gardens, which go to the free wives. Stock is generally divided among the children.

Before 1891, when a British Protectorate was formally declared over Nyasaland, each chief ruled supreme. He was consulted as to the dates for Unyago; he directed the harvesting, etc.; he proclaimed war and generally was paramount among his people. It will be seen, therefore, that he was a busy man, but he received no direct remuneration. His wealth consisted of slaves and ivory. Slaves he obtained in warfare and as blood money, 643 [556]

[1] Op. cit., vol. 1, p. 189.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

771 784 6. It is believed that signs of guilt are visible in the eye of a murderer; medicine is procured in the hope of getting rid of these signs.

7. The possession of the hair of another person is supposed to give the possessor power over that person, hence a medicine man, when the patient he has been treating is cured, shaves the patient and keeps the hair until payment is made.

[826] 8. A native with light greenish-grey eyes is not to be trusted. He is said to have eyes like a cat and is called majerijeri; these eyes are rare among natives.

9. It is unlucky for a child to get into a basket; he may be burned.

10. Should a woman turn the porridge pot upside down, every one who has eaten will become constipated. For the same reason, a woman, after turning out the porridge from the pot, just touches the top of the mass of porridge with the bottom of the pot.

11. A woman will never leave the pounding stick in the grain-mortar. Should she do so, the heavens would fall.

12. When a sebra is killed, a knot is tied in its tail so that eating of the meat shall not cause indigestion.

13. It is unlucky to sit upon a headrest, the masuilo. The person would surely be bitten by a snake.

[843] 14. If a man commits murder, and his wife is pregnant at the time, she must sleep on the spear used.

15. Children are told that they must not eat at night; that if they are hungry, they must lie quiet and try to go to sleep again. If they don't obey and sit up eating porridge, a long hairy arm will come through the fastened door and beg for some, the voice of the unseen saying:

[539]

> "Npse chimkuti'chesi nuspe ni mjase!"
> "Give me that which you put to your nose to smell and throw away," the repeated movements of the hand to the mouth (nose) and back to the pot being supposed to make the "bogey" think that they are not really eating but merely smelling and throwing away the food.

16. A male should not scrape the porridge off the porridge stick; this is only allowed to the woman. Should a man do so, it is supposed that when he goes hunting, he will hit anything he shoots at, only in the tail.

17. There is a saying that the men and boys may eat little pieces of porridge which fall out of the pot, while cooking, on to the supporting stones and it will give them power to escape unhurt from battle. The fragments are called ngulupuke, (from ku-lupuka "to escape").

18. Children are instructed to take their food sitting down instead of being in a hurry and standing to take it. They are told that if they do not obey, their porridge will not go into their stomachs but into their legs and swell out their knee-joints.

3: Stanzus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

262 no one will touch. With the exception of carrion birds such as the crow and the hawk, most birds are considered fit to eat. The hornbill is not eaten, as it is supposed to carry part [825] of a corpse on its nose.[1] Fowls form a regular article of diet, but some taboos in this connection are mentioned elsewhere.

Eggs are eaten only by children and old people; that is, by those outside the child propagating age. Milk is never consumed in any form. They say, "What a disgusting habit, to suck the juice of an animal while it is still alive!"

[843] Pregnant women will not eat certain things lest the child be born with some deformity, such as the snout of a pig, or the white stripes of a zebra.

532 Art and decoration. Sculpture can hardly be said to be an art known to the Yao. The only piece of stone work I have ever seen was a granite boulder, on the surface of which cup-holes had been made for the game of Bau (Pl. IV, fig. 4).

Of late years, individuals here and there have begun carving wooden figures of men and animals. The Yao, of course, make no idols. It is uncertain exactly how long it is since any of these people started producing wooden figures. I should think that this art has sprung up within the past twelve or thirteen years, that is to say, since there has been a market for them among European residents. In the first place only natives and some of the common animals, the eland and leopard, were represented; since then, many animals and Europeans have been copied. The native is extraordinarily clever in reproducing characteristic features in dress, etc., so that a Portuguese is easily distinguished from an Englishman. The little models in ivory of animals and native household objects, made by the Swahili people on Lake Nyasa, have never been copied by the Yao. Neither do they make clay images of men and cattle as do the Zulu-descended Angoni and cattle-keeping Wankonde. No native would allow any wooden figure to remain in his house for [777] fear of ill luck; the women especially would look askance at them, fearing some misfortune in their next pregnancy. Little wooden figures of birds, however, are sometimes seen affixed to the point of the hut roof.

[177] The making of carved figures, then, is of recent introduction, or rather is a recent event in the evolution of the Yao, as they were not taught but self-inspired in the work.

The ability to make representations of objects by drawing appears in the same way to originate spontaneously here and there as a sport. Natives with a talent for drawing are found among all the tribes, and among the Yao, it is said, there have always been some who have been able to draw. Naturally enough, their reproductions are made on the walls of their houses, and their subjects are generally animals of the forest, sometimes men and houses, or some other object of particular interest[2] (Pl. VIII, fig. 1). I also give sketches of some other drawings I have noted (Pl. XVIII); the line figure of a man at Makanjila's

[1] Vide supra, p. 327.

[2] Cf. A. Werner, 'A Native Painting from Nyasaland,' (Jour. Afric. Soc., London 1908, vol. 8, no. 30, p. 190-192).

IT SHOULD
162 be noted that only 27—11 per cent. of the whole sample of 246 women—had never 589 married and that 23, 80 per cent., of these (or 10 per cent. of the total) were under the age of 20 and therefore stood a good chance of yet marrying. Furthermore, 2 of the 4 women over 20 who had not married were known definitely to be incapable of marrying (one is insane and the other has violent epileptic fits).

There were 53 women who were divorcees or widows (21·5 per cent.), but it should be noted that 27 (or 11 per cent. of the 246 women) were over the age of 45 and therefore were past, or nearly past, the child-bearing period. Those in the younger age-groups stood good chances of remarrying. Table IV shows that though [586] the divorce rate is high[1] remarriage is common. By the time a woman's child-
[587] bearing period has ended she has been married on the average 1·7 times. Few marriages are contracted after child-bearing ceases.

TABLE IV. Marriages and Dissolutions of Marriage experienced by all Women over the Age of 13

162
586
587

Present age	No. of women	No. of marriages contracted	No. of divorces experienced	No. widowed	No. still married	No. of marriages per woman	No. of divorces per woman	No. of marriages per woman ended by death of husband	No. of marriages per woman still existing
13–20	45	22	1	..	21	0·49	0·02	0·00	0·46
20–30	79	104	36	4	64	1·32	0·45	0·05	0·81
30–45	70	121	50	16	55	1·73	0·71	0·23	0·79
Over 45	52	88	29	34	23	1·70	0·57	0·65	0·48
Total	246	335	116	54	163	1·36	0·47	0·22	0·67

842 These statistics, showing the early age of marriage, the early commencement of child-bearing, the high incidence of marriage among women, and the high rate of remarriage during the child-bearing period, all point to the high valuation of [182] reproduction reflected in Yao culture. This is consistent with their social structure,
[61] where the major corporate groups are kinship groups and reproduction is the principal method of recruitment to the group. Furthermore, because the standard of living is almost at subsistence level, children do not entail the economic losses
[593] they do in Western society. On the other hand, they are expected to support their [888] aged parents when they themselves are economically independent. In other words, there are few factors militating against reproduction and many in favour of it.

554 We may expect the beliefs and customs surrounding child-birth to reflect the value
884 of reproduction. For instance, the Yao distinguish clearly between women who have [182] borne children and those who have not. When a girl becomes pregnant for the [842] first time she undergoes a special ceremony (litiwo) attended only by women who
[843] have borne children. This ceremony has many of the features of a rite de passage and appears to mark the passing of the woman to a new social status. Furthermore, women are ascribed status according to the number of children they have borne. The word anwali signifies a young woman who has not yet borne a child; anwali

[1] Between a third and a half of the marriages contracted by women had been dissolved by divorce by the time that the child-bearing period had ended.

1: Tew E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

Birth

Birth takes place in the bush, some distance from the hamlet, in the presence of female relatives of the woman and of her husband. If the child is stillborn, or miscarried, it is buried in the bush. The husband and wife must abstain from sexual intercourse for some months, until a special ritual intercourse is performed. A man who breaks this taboo is liable to contract a fatal disease, kwasanga. Difficult births are attributed to: (a) a curse spoken by a matrilineal relative—this is made effective by the intervention of the ancestors, and to remove it it is necessary to perform a rite making clear that no malice is borne; (b) the adultery of the woman or her husband, in which case confession will save the woman from dying; and (c) sorcery. 844 [845] 845

If a child is born alive it is brought to the hut of the mother or one of her female relatives, where it is secluded until its naming ceremony, about six days later. Only after the naming is the child considered to be a member of society. A second child should not be born while the first is still suckling, i.e. for about two years. When the child is about four or five months old it is ritually immunized against the dangers of sexual activity, and the parents may resume relations. Elaborate magical precautions are taken to ensure the child's survival. Children sleep with their mother, the boys until they are old enough to go to the boys' dormitory, and the girls until marriage.[1] 844 852 [513]

Initiation

The yearly initiation ceremonies, unyago, are the principal cultural institution of the Yao. That for the boys, lupanda, is the most important, and may only take place under a chief or superior village headman, whereas a girls' initiation ceremony may take place under an ordinary headman. The right to hold a boys' initiation ceremony therefore becomes a mark of status which is jealously disputed.[2] The right is expressed as 'having a ciselo'. A ciselo is the small basket in which the special sacrificial flour is carried. 881 852 [554]

Yao carry out initiation between the ages of seven and eleven, whereas generally in East Africa it is postponed until puberty.[3] In response to requests from the headmen the chief appoints the time and place of the boys' initiation ceremony for a group of villages. It is held at the end of the dry season, before the bush is burned. Each initiate is accompanied by a sponsor, nkamusi, who may be a brother, uncle, or friend. Before they set out for the place appointed to be lupanda, they all assemble before the chief to be anointed with millet-flour specially prepared by his head wife. The word lupanda refers to a forked stick over which the sacrificial flour is poured. This stick is planted at the place of assembly, the masakasa. The boys, their sponsors, and the master of ceremonies, m'micira, are accompanied with dancing as far as masakasa by their friends. The next day the initiates go to a spot in the bush, where the circumcision (formerly only an incision) is performed, and remain in the bush school, ndagala, for about two months, until the wounds are completely healed. The Yao circumcision rite is said not to have been introduced by the Arabs.[4]

During these weeks the boys are subjected to rigorous discipline and instructed in various skills and tribal lore. They sleep in long dormitory huts, with partitions dividing the boys of different villages from each other. The chief appoints the day for

[1] Werner, 1906, pp. 144–5.
[2] Stannus and Davey, 1913, p. 119.
[3] Duff, 1903, p. 312.
[4] Livingstone, 1874, p. 81.

1: Tew E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

return to the lupanda, where the initiates are welcomed by their friends. An essential part of the ceremony which takes place at this stage is the exhibition of animal shapes made by the m'micira, with mounds of earth outlined in flour. These animal shapes differ from lodge to lodge. On the last night before the return to the village the initiates undergo a ceremonial bathing, each boy being carried to the stream by a woman, who thereafter is addressed as 'elder sister'. Finally, with new names, and freshly oiled and decorated, they march to the chief's village to be redeemed by him from the m'micira with gifts of cloth. After initiation it is a deadly insult to call a boy by his child-name. All who pass through initiation together consider themselves bound by mutual obligations of hospitality.[1]

Girls' initiation takes place in three stages. First, there is ciputu, the general initiation before puberty, which corresponds to the boys' lupanda. It takes place at the same time of year, and though it lasts for less than a week, its conclusion is celebrated at lupanda jointly with the conclusion of the boys' initiation. A hut is built in the bush, like the long dormitory of the boys, and four days are spent in dancing and singing. Each girl (aged about eight years) is accompanied by a sponsor, a woman friend who continues to be her mentor during subsequent rites, and who assists in giving the girl instruction in her womanly duties. At the end the girls are bathed and anointed, dressed in new clothes, and each is carried to lupanda by her sponsor. Here they prove their skill in dancing and receive gifts from their friends. Ritual defloration follows the ciputu initiation.[2] Among Mohammedans, clitoridectomy used to be performed by a woman operator, but, it is said, was discontinued in about 1903 on account of the heavy mortality.[3]

After this first general celebration, first pregnancy and first birth are the occasions of separate rites for each girl. According to some informants there were once two ceremonies connected with pregnancy. One, for the young married men whose wives had not yet conceived, used to take place at the same time as ciputu; each man was attended by a woman sponsor not his wife, given good advice, and put through various tests of manhood. Mitchell does not confirm the present existence of this ceremony, but in the old days if a man was betrothed or married to a child going through her ciputu he had to accompany her.

The litiwo ceremony takes place when a young married woman quickens with child for the first time.[4] The woman, with her sponsor and the married women of the neighbourhood, went out in procession for a ceremony of singing and dancing and instruction to the young couple, followed by a feast. Nowadays no men are allowed to attend litiwo. A child born of a woman who had not undergone this rite used to be buried alive; nowadays her asyene mbumba is charged by the chief.

Finally, six days after the first child is born, its naming ceremony forms a last initiation rite for its mother. The husband is formally led into her hut by her sponsor and the married women of the neighbourhood, and the child is taken out for the first time to the accompaniment of feasting and dancing.

Most Yao men and women act as sponsors of initiates at least once, and all parti-

[1] Sources for boys' initiation: Stannus and Davey, 1913; Werner, 1906, pp. 124–6; Stannus, 4, 1922, pp. 247–63; Heckel, 1935, pp. 19 sq.; Johnston, 1897, p. 409; Weule, 1, 1909, p. 304.

[2] Stannus, 4, 1922, p. 234.

[3] Ibid., 1, 1910, p. 296.

[4] Ibid., 4, 1922, p. 274; Heckel, 1935, p. 23, calls it cinumbu (belly).

843 842 Pregnancy and childbirth. An event of the first importance in the Yao world is the first conception or rather the "quickening" with the first child, Litiwo; this is described below, together with the other ceremonies of the Unyago.[1] After the ceremony of Litiwo, the period of waiting until the birth of the child passes without further event. A point of medical interest is that native women suffer in many cases from "morning sickness" during pregnancy. That they may have perverted appetites is also recognised, grain husks and crabs being among the things most commonly desired. As the Anyanja,[2] the Yao believe that the child develops from the semen of the male, although the growth of the child is in some way connected with the mother.

[171]

844 When labor commences, the woman retires to the bush a few hundred yards away from her house, attended by some friend, seldom a midwife, and never by her own people, though the mother and the mother-in-law will probably be near the spot. If labor is not completed by evening, they return to the house and the birth may take place actually within its walls. The attitude assumed in labor is the same as that adopted by the Anyanja,[3] the patient semi-reclining in the arms of another woman who sits behind, grasping her belly. The vulva is smeared with a decoction made from the bark of the mpeu tree as a lubricant, but no other help is given. Kumhuli is the name given to the place of confinement; m'huli means the house where the woman remains for a period after the confinement. The Yao recognise the protruding bag of amniotic fluid and call it the "oil-gourd". "Chiansi chikuseiche? (The oil-gourd, has it broken?)." They wait until the placenta is delivered before dividing the cord. This is done with the sharp edge of the outer covering of a maize stalk or sugar cane; a knife is never used. The section is made near the placenta or half-way between it and the child, after tying the proximal end with a bark string.

[171]

The woman who receives the child at birth is the ambuzanga, friend or godmother. If the infant is born in the bush, she carries it back to the house whither they go as soon as labor is completed. The mother herself, unless she is very ill, goes out shortly afterwards and buries the placenta in the ash-heap, using a stick to dig the hole, never a hoe.

846 After the birth, the mother and child must remain in the house until the umbilical cord separates, during which time the husband does not enter, though he may come to the door to look in at the child.

The day on which exit from the house is made, the floor is entirely replastered with mud. [852] The baby's head is shaved and a cross is made upon it with upama, a kind of red pigment. [553] The husband may then receive the child and in the case of a first-born, it is he who gives it [302] its name; other children may be named by the ambuzanga, the mother, or the aunt.

When the mother leaves the house to appear in public, the nalunga who put her litiwo on,[4] removes it.

So long as the infant remains in the house, care must be taken as to persons allowed to handle it. A woman who has recently had a menstrual period or coitus with her husband,

[1] Vide infra, p. 274. [2] Stannus, op. cit., p. 348. [3] Ibid. [4] Vide infra, p. 274.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

or a girl who has just returned from Chíputu must not touch the child, as it is said, "Her body is hot and would give fever to the child." To guard against such a happening, some "clean" woman, after handing some beads to the mother, will ask to be allowed to take the infant. This indicates that should it sicken, the beads will pay the medicine-woman who comes to cure it. The mother and baby are simply washed in water and are not treated with medicine, unless meconium has been voided before the child was delivered.[1] If the infant dies before it is presented to the outside world, it is disposed of in the same way as a stillborn child, i.e. buried in the ash-heap. About the tenth day, the baby is adorned with a girdle of beads and two little pieces of stick obtained from a medicine-woman to make the infant grow fat. 846 [845 766] [856]

The length of time during which the father and mother refrain from cohabitation after the birth of a baby varies greatly according to circumstance. Four months is probably a minimum, while two years, during which the woman suckles the child, is the common interval. After the first coitus, the man and woman wash themselves and the baby is bathed in the same water to prevent any ill coming to it. 833

Suckling often continues much longer than two years. If the mother dies, the child may be suckled by the grandmother, an aunt, or some other woman, but the breasts must first be treated with medicine or the child would die 853

A child born breech first is called salanga, a word which is also used to denote a variety of domestic fowl which always has the appearance of having its feathers ruffled. A child who dies before the father and mother have resumed sexual relations is buried in a graveyard apart from that of adults. The grave, dug with sticks, not hoes, is very shallow, and when it is filled in, a heap of stones is made above it. Only women attend the burial. A deep grave would cause the mother to go on losing children at an early age. The body of such a child is called litunu, "hyaena." 845 766

A woman dying undelivered is placed in the grave in the usual way and then, before filling in the earth, one of the grave-diggers descends into the pit, cuts through the enveloping shroud, and incises the abdomen. One end of a long bamboo stick or reed is inserted in the incision and the other end is brought out to the surface of the grave. If this were not done, "many would die in childbirth." 844 766

Twins are not killed by the Yao but are well treated and always cared for equally. They are given similar clothing and food.[2] There is a story that the mother of Nkwamba, 845

[1] Chíputu, vide infra, p. 286.

[2] Cf. A. Werner, 'Among the Congo Cannibals, by John H. Weeks, London, 1913, a review,' (Man, vol. 14, no. 18, 1914, p. 18).

I take this opportunity of referring to Miss Werner's review in which, speaking of twins, she says, "They are always among the Anyanja given the names Mapali and Nyama." Mapali in Chinyanja refers to a kind of musical instrument and the Chiyao meaning is "movement pain." Nyama is a Chiyao word which certainly means "the back." It is sometimes used of the second born twin but does not occur in Chinyanja. I have never heard of twins either among the Wayao or the Anyanja spoken of by these names. A mother carries the first born on the right arm and the second born on the left, but, so far as I know, she does not give a duplicate greeting nor make a habit of eating equally with both hands. [114]

ndembo, a woman who is pregnant for the first time;[1] kwembere, a woman who has one or two children; mjembere, a woman who has three or four children, and lastly, ndabwa, a woman who is past child-bearing age. 554 584

The information which I have been able to collect on abortifacients and contraceptives suggests that they are not used by married people merely to prevent their having more children, but that they are used by people who wish to avoid pregnancies which would be embarrassing, for example, by a woman whose husband is a labour migrant. To what extent the abortifacients and contraceptives are efficacious I cannot say; some, I know for certain, rely on a magical principle, for example, the medicated cord worn by a man during intercourse. On the other hand, the abortifacients taken orally may have some active ingredient. 842

A barren woman or an impotent man is regarded with some embarrassment and the marriage sureties (arisamangoswe) of a childless couple will go to considerable trouble and expense consulting diviners and leeches in an attempt to make the[illegible] wards productive. Childless couples are regarded as not fully adult and are treat[illegible] in a patronizing way by those who have borne children. Since a man may marry other wives, barrenness in a woman is a cause of sorrow to her husband, but is not in itself a ground for divorce. Where the man is impotent, however, the woman may divorce him on this ground, though she usually takes a paramour and forces her husband to an action for damages which automatically leads to a divorce because it is the usual practice in these cases for the court to ask the woman if she wants to be divorced from her husband. [585] [554] [586] [837] [694]

In contrast to the satisfaction shown at the birth of a child is the sense of awe evinced when a child is still-born or the woman miscarries. The Yao do not distinguish between still-births and abortions, both events being known by the word kwasanga. This is a verb and refers to the process of abortion; there is no term for the dead foetus itself. I made no attempt to enumerate miscarriages and still-births because they are supposed to be due to breaches of sexual taboos on the part of the husband and wife, and interviewees were naturally reluctant to mention them. Miscarriages and still-births are greatly feared, and the woman is considered to be in a very dangerous condition until she and her husband have carried out a ritual purification. Should a man have intercourse with a woman who has miscarried and not yet been purified he will contract a disease called lwazo which is believed to be invariably fatal. Still-born children or aborted foetuses are buried in a hole dug with sharpened sticks in the bush by the women, whereas children who are born alive and die afterwards are buried in the graveyard in graves dug by men with hoes. The burial spots of still-born babies or aborted foetuses are marked with a stone or broken pottery, since it is believed that to step on them will induce an illness. 845 [783] [753] [766]

The concern of the interested kin-groups is shown in the child-birth procedure. Birth normally takes place in a hut in the presence of the older female relatives of the woman and the female representatives of the man. The husband's representatives are necessary because the Yao, like many other Central African peoples, believe that an adulterine child will not be born to the woman unless she confesses (kupaza) the name of the genitor. If she persists in concealing the identity of the genitor, they 844

[1] ndembo – elephant, hence ivory. The terms lilibo and ndembo here both refer to the ivory beads traditionally worn by the woman in the pregnancy initiation ceremony. [192] [361]

6: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1947) 1949 FT7 Yao FT7

believe that she will die. The man's representatives are therefore able to establish the child's paternity from the birth-pang confessions of the woman.

The child is kept in the hut where it was born, for six or seven days, while the umbilical cord dries and falls off. During this time (lusi) the child is unnamed, and it is named only when it is taken out of the hut. Should it die during this period of seclusion it remains unnamed and is referred to by a special term (litupa, pl. matupa). I have therefore been able to enumerate live births by means of the distinction made between miscarriages and still-births (kwatanga) and children who lived long enough to be referred to as matupa. After the birth of the child the woman may not have intercourse for four or five months. To do so would be to endanger the life of the child with a disease called ndoka,[1] which is contracted by a sexually inactive person when he comes into contact with a sexually active person. The husband may have intercourse with a second wife, but must take care to medicate himself so that he does not endanger the life of his child. When the child is about 4 or 5 months of age the parents perform ritual intercourse and medicate the child against the mystical dangers of sexual activity; sexual relations are then resumed.

The Yao say that a second child should not be born while the first is still being suckled. Since lactation continues for about two years I am uncertain whether monogynists remain continent, as they say they do, or whether coitus interruptus is practised. It is quite usual for husbands to become labour migrants when their children are still very young. I have known women to write to their husbands who are away working and tell them to return because their children have 'grown', i.e. have been weaned. Labour recruiters had difficulty in recruiting men immediately after the soldiers had been demobilized at the end of the war, because the women objected, saying that they had remained childless long enough and the men must first wait until children were born. However, actual examination of birth-dates shows that children are sometimes born within a year of one another and sometimes there are quite big gaps. The two-year gap between children is probably an ideal which few attain.

5. The Estimation of Fertility

(a) Sundbaerg's Age Divisions

As a preliminary estimate of fertility, Sundbaerg's trichotomy of ages may be considered. The argument behind this division of the population into Youth, Middle Age, and Old Age is that those populations with a high proportion of youth have a greater tendency to increase. Table V shows this trichotomy for the Yao with the same material for some other populations shown for comparison. Where the gross reproduction-rate is known for the period shown in the table, this is included.

At any one time a certain proportion of the population is absent from the area, usually at some labour centre. Hence the proportions of the population are distributed abnormally. In all there appeared to be a total of sixty-three men, women, and children absent from the hamlets, who would otherwise have been living there. Hence in Table V these have been included in the totals in the 'Yao with absentees' proportions.

[1] A disease of this sort is believed in by many Central African tribes. Among the Nyanja-speaking peoples it is known as ziwipile.

1: Tew E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

Birth

Birth takes place in the bush, some distance from the hamlet, in the presence of 844 female relatives of the woman and of her husband. If the child is stillborn, or miscarried, it is buried in the bush. The husband and wife must abstain from sexual intercourse [845] for some months, until a special ritual intercourse is performed. A man who breaks this taboo is liable to contract a fatal disease, kwassaga. Difficult births are attributed 845 to: (a) a curse spoken by a matrilineal relative—this is made effective by the intervention of the ancestors, and to remove it it is necessary to perform a rite making clear that no malice is borne; (b) the adultery of the woman or her husband, in which case confession will save the woman from dying; and (c) sorcery.

If a child is born alive it is brought to the hut of the mother or one of her female 844 relatives, where it is secluded until its naming ceremony, about six days later. Only after the naming is the child considered to be a member of society. A second child 852 should not be born while the first is still suckling, i.e. for about two years. When the child is about four or five months old it is ritually immunized against the dangers of sexual activity, and the parents may resume relations. Elaborate magical precautions are taken to ensure the child's survival. Children sleep with their mother, the boys until [513] they are old enough to go to the boys' dormitory, and the girls until marriage.[1]

Initiation

The yearly initiation ceremonies, wayago, are the principal cultural institution of the 881 Yao. That for the boys, lupanda, is the most important, and may only take place under a chief or superior village headman, whereas a girls' initiation ceremony may take 852 place under an ordinary headman. The right to hold a boys' initiation ceremony therefore becomes a mark of status which is jealously disputed.[2] The right is expressed as [554]
'having a cinela'. A cinela is the small basket in which the special sacrificial flour is carried.

Yao carry out initiation between the ages of seven and eleven, whereas generally in East Africa it is postponed until puberty.[3] In response to requests from the headmen the chief appoints the time and place of the boys' initiation ceremony for a group of villages. It is held at the end of the dry season, before the bush is burned. Each initiate is accompanied by a sponsor, nkumwi, who may be a brother, uncle, or friend. Before they set out for the place appointed to be lupanda, they all assemble before the chief to be anointed with millet-flour specially prepared by his head wife. The word lupanda refers to a forked stick over which the sacrificial flour is poured. This stick is planted at the place of assembly, the masakasa. The boys, their sponsors, and the master of ceremonies, m'mirira, are accompanied with dancing as far as masakasa by their friends. The next day the initiates go to a spot in the bush, where the circumcision (formerly only an incision) is performed, and remain in the bush school, ndagala, for about two months, until the wounds are completely healed. The Yao circumcision rite is said not to have been introduced by the Arabs.[4]

During these weeks the boys are subjected to rigorous discipline and instructed in various skills and tribal lore. They sleep in long dormitory huts, with partitions dividing the boys of different villages from each other. The chief appoints the day for

[1] Warner, 1906, pp. 140–3.
[2] Stannus and Dewey, 1913, p. 119.
[3] Duff, 1903, p. 312.
[4] Livingstone, 1874, p. 81.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

adjusts itself to the changes in its composition. At this point I wish only to indicate how the differentiation among the various segments of a matrilineage is reflected in the way the members site their huts in a village.

The Segmentary Process

The segmentary tendencies within the lineage are countered by unifying forces, but the cleavages between the lineage sections show up at the slightest provocation. Once the cleavage starts it widens rapidly and charges of sorcery become more and more frequent between the two sections until eventually one moves out to found a new village. A cleavage of this type has been developing in Cikoja village for the last eight years. When I left the field in 1949, talk of migration was in the air but it had not yet happened. I summarize the major events which led to the present situation.

The cleavage first manifested itself in 1942 when Bt. Mbwana (F2)[1] fought with her mother's younger 'sister' Ayesi (E8). These two were pounding at the same place in the village and Bt. Mbwana took Ayesi's flat sifting basket. She retained it for about four days without telling Ayesi that she had it. One day Ayesi saw it at the pounding point and asked Bt. Mbwana where she got it. They had a few words about it and Bt. Mbwana returned it and thought no more of it. She was pregnant at the time and was confined about a month later. It was her fifth child but she had a greatly prolonged labour. After labour had been going on for some hours, Cilimba (F1), her eldest brother, thought that there must be something wrong and sent his two younger brothers, Kausi (F3) and Gwili (F4) to a diviner. The diviner indicated that the cause of the difficult birth was that her 'younger mother' Ayesi was bearing her malice,[2] and advised that Ayesi should blow water from her mouth and declare that she bore no malice. Kausi and Gwili returned and went to Bt. Amisa (E4) who was Ayesi's elder sister and told her what the diviner had said. Bt. Amisa did as she was advised and fetched Ayesi to the door of the hut in which Bt. Mbwana was lying, and made her confess. The child was born immediately. After a week Cilimba and Kausi brought a complaint to the village headman Cikoja (E7). They accused Ayesi of trying to kill their sister. Cikoja sent a message to

[1] The reference numbers refer to the genealogy in Appendix D.

[2] Difficult labour is usually assumed to be due to adultery, but it may also be due to sorcery or malice. See p. 138, and Chap. VII, p. 185.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

613 578 845 683

his eldest uterine sister's first-born and second-born sons, Amidu (F18) and Kanyenga (F19), to advise them of this dispute, and told them that they would have to assume responsibility for the actions of their mother's younger sister, Ayesi. At the same time he sent to a neighbouring village to call in an unrelated man to act as arbitrator in the dispute. There was much argument and eventually the arbitrator awarded 15*s.* to be paid by Cikoja as leader of the junior lineage section to Cilimba as leader of the senior section. Amidu and Kanyenga found 10*s.* between them and gave it to Cikoja to give to Cilimba. The other 5*s.* they said they would try to find and pay later.

This payment formally settled the dispute but the tension was near to the surface. Amidu and Kanyenga said that there was separation in the group now that they had started to eat money. They were not wrong. Ayesi was pregnant and near to confinement. When she was confined her labour was as difficult as Bt. Mbwana's (it was also her fifth confinement). When her birthpang confusions seemed to be unavailing Bt. Bwana Isa (F16), her elder sister's daughter, went to Kanyenga to tell him that their 'younger mother' was having a difficult childbirth. Kanyenga remarked that she had had many children before and had not suffered, so that there must be some reason for her difficulty. Then Kanyenga and his sister went to Ayesi's husband's sister's hut[1] to find a representative to go with them to a diviner. When they got there Ayesi's husband's sister told her son to accompany her brother's wife's representative to the diviner. The diviner indicated that the cause of the prolonged birth was the malice felt by Bt. Mbwana because the rest of the compensation awarded had not yet been paid. He said that the only thing to do was to call Bt. Mbwana and to get her to blow water from her mouth at the hut door where Ayesi was confined. Bt. Amisa went to find Bt. Mbwana and made her do this. Immediately Ayesi delivered a stillborn child.

The next morning Amidu and Kanyenga went to Cikoja and blamed him for the stillborn child.[2] Cikoja called Cilimba to listen to the complaint. Ayesi was inconsolable. She said that she had blown water for the sake of Bt. Mbwana who to-day had a child, whereas she was mourning her child. Once again Cikoja called in outsiders to act as arbitrators and the members of the two segments gathered to settle the dispute. At the end of protracted wrangling

[1] Ayesi was married to her MMMBD5 (Kanili (D33)), whose lineage lived in another part of the same village. See genealogy and hut count in Appendix D.

[2] Cikoja is a representative of his lineage even to the lineage members. This accusation simply means that the blame lies within the lineage.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

the arbitrators awarded 30s. compensation to be paid by Cilimba to Cikoja, less 5s. owing. This money was to be paid to Ayesi in compensation for the loss of her baby. Ayesi, however, refused to accept the money because she said she wanted to have her baby. The matter now became an inter-segment affair and Cikoja, Amidu, Kanyenga and Kaifa (F36), the son of Ayesi, with Bt. Amisa had a meeting on what to do. Ayesi was quite adamant about it. There was nothing to do but to drop the matter, and the state of tension between the segments remained as it was before.

The next incident occurred in 1943. Mpulula, the husband of Bt. Amisa, had some goats. One day two of them strayed on to the verandah of Bt. Madi's hut. Bt. Madi (F10) was the daughter of Asuna (F2) and a member of the senior lineage segment. One of the goats nosed its way into a basket of flour that was lying under the verandah and started to eat it. Bt. Madi came out and picked up a log that was lying nearby and threw it at the goat. It broke the goat's leg and the goat had to be destroyed. The owner, Mpulula, who was watching at that moment immediately rebuked the woman. He went and reported the matter to Cikoja and he sent a message to Mpulula's marriage surety who sent back to say that they would meet at Chiwalo's hut the following morning. The arbitrator in the case finally decided that the correct action should have been to take the goat to the owner and to lay a complaint against him. As it was he had to award compensation of 30s. to be paid to the owner of the goat. Mpulula, however, refused to take the money. He argued that although the goat was his, so was the offender.[1] He said that he was afraid of sorcery so he would take a token amount of 3s. only. Cikoja gave him this.[2]

A few months later the eldest child of Bt. Bwana Isa (F16) suddenly fell ill and died.[3] Kanyenga, Kaifa and Mnusa went to the diviner. Kaifa, the son of Ayesi, went as the headman's representative. Kanyenga went as the warden of the sorority-group, i.e. the child's mother's brother. Mnusa was the marriage surety of the child's father. Kanyenga consulted the diviner who indicated that Kanyenga's mother Bt. Amisa was responsible but that she was not a sorceress. Sorcery, he said, was introduced by an unknown person who was using Bt. Amisa's grumbling as a screen. Kanyenga refused to accept the finding of the diviner, saying that his mother had never been 'caught'

[1] He wife's collateral sister's child he also calls 'my child'.

[2] Mpulula is a stranger in the village and in this situation Cikoja represents both segments to Mpulula, even though the senior segment is guilty.

[3] Sudden illness, called chisese or 'the hammer', is believed to be without a doubt due to sorcery.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

rationalized in the Yao theory of conception.[1] They believe that after intercourse the semen clots and embeds itself in the womb. From this the child develops and is nurtured by the mother until it is due to be born. Subsequent acts of intercourse add semen to the body of the child and make it fat. Semen from other men may be used, too, to feed the child in its intra-uterine life, but its body and blood are derived from the semen which first clotted. In Yao opinion there can be one father only.

Not all acts of intercourse lead to impregnation because sometimes, for various reasons, especially in immature women, the semen fails to clot. There is therefore, to the Yao way of thinking, some difficulty in determining the 'father' of a child. This difficulty is met by the belief that the intra-uterine child in some way knows about the doings of its parents and in particular knows who its father is. It therefore refuses to be born unless its father is recognized.[2] Hence if a child is born without undue puerperal complications it is assumed to be the offspring of the man who is currently living with its mother. If labour is prolonged, however, the relatives call for confessions (kupaca) from both husband and wife. The husband's confessions are usually formal and simple. The wife's confessions on the other hand are detailed and complete. She confesses the name of an adulterer, and her midwives, including the husband's sisters as his witnesses, wait for the next birth-spasm. If the child is not born at this spasm she is told to confess again. Only after she has confessed to a lover whom the Yao assume to be the genitor will the child eventually be born. After this the aggrieved husband summons the adulterer to court and he is made to accept the fatherhood of the child.

The act of formally accepting the paternity of a child, which is also done when a woman has a child out of wedlock, confers rights of two types on the child. The first set of rights is directly economic and physical. The father is expected to give the mother salt, money for relish, and cloth to help her rear the child. But this side of a father's duties to his child ceases as soon as another man marries the woman. The new husband then takes over the

[1] I have dealt with this more fully in Marriage among the Machinga Yao.

[2] It also refuses to be born for other reasons, but the first considered is always the adultery of its parents. See p. 138.

3:Stanner D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

or a girl who has just returned from Chiputo must not touch the child, as it is said, "Her body is hot and would give fever to the child." To guard against such a happening, some "alosa" woman, after handing some beads to the mother, will ask to be allowed to take the infant. This indicates that should it sicken, the beads will pay the medicine-woman who comes to cure it. The mother and baby are simply washed in water and are not treated with medicine, unless meconium has been voided before the child was delivered.[1] If the infant dies before it is presented to the outside world, it is disposed of in the same way as a stillborn child, i.e. buried in the ash-heap. About the tenth day, the baby is adorned with a girdle of beads and two little pieces of stick obtained from a medicine-woman to make the infant grow fat.

The length of time during which the father and mother refrain from cohabitation after the birth of a baby varies greatly according to circumstances. Four months is probably a minimum, while two years, during which the woman suckles the child, is the common interval. After the first coitus, the man and woman wash themselves and the baby is bathed in the same water to prevent any ill coming to it.

Suckling often continues much longer than two years. If the mother dies, the child may be suckled by the grandmother, an aunt, or some other woman, but the breasts must first be treated with medicine or the child would die.

A child born breech first is called mlungu, a word which is also used to denote a variety of domestic fowl which always has the appearance of having its feathers ruffled. A child who dies before the father and mother have resumed sexual relations is buried in a grave-yard apart from that of adults. The grave, dug with sticks, not hoes, is very shallow, and when it is filled in, a heap of stones is made above it. Only women attend the burial. A deep grave would cause the mother to go on losing children at an early age. The body of such a child is called litawa, "hyaena."

A woman dying undelivered is placed in the grave in the usual way and then, before filling in the earth, one of the grave-diggers descends into the pit, cuts through the enveloping shroud, and incises the abdomen. One end of a long bamboo stick or reed is inserted in the incision and the other end is brought out to the surface of the grave. If this were not done, "many would die in childbirth."

Twins are not killed by the Yao but are well treated and always cared for equally. They are given similar clothing and food.[2] There is a story that the mother of Nkwamba,

[1] Chinyanja, vide infra, p. [illegible].

[2] H. S. Worsnop, 'Among the Congo Cannibals, by John H. Weeks, London, 1913, a review,' (Man, vol. 14, no. 58, 1914, p. 101).

I take this opportunity of referring to Miss Worsnop's review in which, speaking of twins, she says, "They are always among the Anyanja given the names Mwpili and Kyamo." Mwpili in Chinyanja refers to a kind of musical instrument and the Chiyao meaning is "measured pulse." Kyamo is a Chiyao word which certainly means "the lamb." It is sometimes used of the second born twin but does not occur in Chinyanja. I have never heard of twins either among the Wayao or the Anyanja spoken of by these names. A similar custom that first born on the right arm and the second born on the left, but, as far as I know, she does not give a duplicate greeting nor make a habit of eating equally with both hands.

3:Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

845 one of Malungu's men died, after giving birth to quintuplets, some thirty years ago. Deformed children are buried alive. A large number of children is always hoped for and where polygamy is practised, some families are of considerable size, although the mortality [165] among young children is very high. It is, of course, very difficult to state the child-bearing period among natives. It does not start so early as is commonly supposed, and I think the menopause is found within about the same limits as among Europeans.

764 Death. Natives of Nyasaland live to a good old age. That such is not the case I have found to be one of the many fallacious beliefs concerning natives which should be relegated 165 to the realm of exploded theories, as I have pointed out elsewhere.[1]

Death in old age is recognized as a natural event but apart from this, all sickness and [764] death were formerly and are still to a large extent looked upon as the result of the machinations of some person, an idea which forms the outstanding feature in their belief in witchcraft, usual.[2]

763 Here I shall mention the ordinary customs in the case of death. During the last hours of a mortal illness, a man is tended by his wife or wives; the head wife sits constantly supporting his head on her lap or against her breast. A woman is similarly tended by her mother, sisters, and friends. As unconsciousness sets in and the extremities become cold, they say, "His spirit has gone and only the heart remains alive."

The native does not like the idea of lingering on and a man on his death-bed will say to his sons, "Now watch me that I die quickly." He may take medicine to help him over that time or he may give his sons instructions as to what to do. Should a man linger unconscious for a long time, friends will ask his sons, "Did he give you any instructions?" If he has done so, the sons will then carry them out. This perhaps consists of bathing themselves in medicines left by their father, while they stand on the roof of his house. Sometimes, the natives say of a lingering case, "Ah, perhaps he has eaten of a tortoise's heart!" [805] knowing the phenomenon of the tortoise's heart and believing that by partaking of it, the same property can be conferred on the heart of a man.

764 When death is manifest, the body is covered with a cloth by a brother, a son, or some other person in attendance. The eyes are closed, the mouth shut, and at the present time, [197] the body straightened out. This, however, is a recent practice copied from the Anyanja, Europeans, and Mohammedans.

764 News of the death must be sent to the chief, and a messenger goes to his village where the chief and his people sit in the village open space. He carries a fowl in his hand. The 203 present of a single fowl always denotes bad tidings. One of the chief's men, seeing the stranger approach with the single fowl, will jump up and take the bird. He is joined by the others and they go away to the cross-roads where they kill the fowl, pluck it, cook it and eat it. In the meantime, the messenger delivers his news to the chief who will produce from his house about eight yards of white calico; if the deceased has been a much respected

[1] Hugh S. Stannus, "The life-span of negroes", (Lancet, April 11, 1914, p. 1022). [2] Vide infra, p. 266.

3:Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

775 setting out on a journey may ask the intercession of his deceased father to assure his safe conduct.

The spirits of the dead are in general said to dwell "above." They haunt the graveyard or visit the scenes of their life, and may be associated with natural objects or with certain animals, into which they are supposed to enter temporarily. Thus a dead man's spirit will visit the earth mound which marks the site of his old house in the village. The spirits of headmen are often thought to haunt the big trees of the village open space; such trees are held sacred for this reason. Some time ago in the old village of the chief, Malemya, a party of women cut down one of these trees for firewood, ignorant of its sacred character. With the crash of the falling tree, they became frightened, and one of the present Malemya's wives came upon the scene, predicting all kinds of evil to follow unless reparation were made to the insulted spirits of the dead chiefs. The remains of the tree lie there to this day, untouched except by natural decay.

To quote another example, near a bathing pool called japwali (from ku-japa, to bathe, and wali, the initiates) where boys bathe after initiation, on the Domasi river, there is a small cataract whence a cloud of spray rises and a continued rumbling sound comes forth. Here, the old men say, you can hear the drumming of the spirits, while you may see pythons and the crowing cobra in whose bodies the spirits live.

As I have already mentioned, the spirit-world so far as the native has speculated on the problem is "above" in a semi-materialistic heaven. If questioned closely, the phrase "I do not know" will figure largely in his replies. He will not say there is any "marriage or giving in marriage." If a child dies, they often say, "So-and-so (some deceased person) wants a water-carrier." Indeed they often use a phrase under the circumstances identical with an English expression, "They are calling away the children."

Natives attribute to the spirits of the dead the power to partake of anything on this earth, such as food. They have no exact ideas with regard to animals and what happens to them when they die. They will not tell you that an animal has an mzimu but at the same time, a goat is often killed at a funeral, with the remark, "The goat will follow the dead man." The goat's meat will be eaten by those assisting at the funeral; hence there is the suggestion of the idea that animals' spirits do go to the spirit-world. [825]

In referring to the spirit-world, the native generally uses the word ku-mulungu, and here we have the second element in their religious beliefs, namely a supreme being; ku-mulungu means at the place of or with mulungu, the supreme being. Mulungu, however, takes a very secondary place to the mzimu. He is referred to only in a general way. In answer to such questions as why has a woman an albino child born to her, she will say "Mulungu made it so"; in fact in reply to many questions to which the native has no answer, he will use practically our English phrase, "Oh, God knows!" and with about as much meaning. [845]

To Mulungu is ascribed the sending of the rain, but apparently he has no part in giving good crops or causing a plentiful harvest, neither has he any direct interest in man's affairs,

ndembo, a woman who is pregnant for the first time;[1] kacwabere, a woman who has one or two children; mjiwabere, a woman who has three or four children, and lastly, ndabwa, a woman who is past child-bearing age. 554 584

The information which I have been able to collect on abortifacients and contraceptives suggests that they are not used by married people merely to prevent their having more children, but that they are used by people who wish to avoid pregnancies which would be embarrassing, for example, by a woman whose husband is a labour migrant. To what extent the abortifacients and contraceptives are efficacious I cannot say; some, I know for certain, rely on a magical principle, for example, the medicated cord worn by a man during intercourse. On the other hand, the abortifacients taken orally may have some active ingredient. 842

A barren woman or an impotent man is regarded with some embarrassment and the marriage sureties (arisamangowe) of a childless couple will go to considerable trouble and expense consulting diviners and leeches in an attempt to make their wards productive. Childless couples are regarded as not fully adult and are treated in a patronizing way by those who have borne children. Since a man may marry other wives, barrenness in a woman is a cause of sorrow to her husband, but is not in itself a ground for divorce. Where the man is impotent, however, the woman may divorce him on this ground, though she usually takes a paramour and forces her husband to an action for damages which automatically leads to a divorce because it is the usual practice in these cases for the court to ask the woman if she wants to be divorced from her husband. [885] [554] [586] [837] [694]

In contrast to the satisfaction shown at the birth of a child is the sense of awe evinced when a child is still-born or the woman miscarries. The Yao do not distinguish between still-births and abortions, both events being known by the word kwasanga. This is a verb and refers to the process of abortion; there is no term for the dead foetus itself. I made no attempt to enumerate miscarriages and still-births because they are supposed to be due to breaches of sexual taboos on the part of the husband and wife, and interviewees were naturally reluctant to mention them. Miscarriages and still-births are greatly feared, and the woman is considered to be in a very dangerous condition until she and her husband have carried out a ritual purification. Should a man have intercourse with a woman who has miscarried and not yet been purified he will contract a disease called kwao which is believed to be invariably fatal. Still-born children or aborted foetuses are buried in a hole dug with sharpened sticks in the bush by the women, whereas children who are born alive and die afterwards are buried in the graveyard in graves dug by men with hoes. The burial spots of still-born babies or aborted foetuses are marked with a stone or broken pottery, since it is believed that to step on them will induce an illness. 845 [783] [753] [766]

The concern of the interested kin-groups is shown in the child-birth procedure. Birth normally takes place in a hut in the presence of the older female relatives of the woman and the female representatives of the man. The husband's representatives are necessary because the Yao, like many other Central African peoples, believe that an adulterine child will not be born to the woman unless she confesses (kapwa) the name of the genitor. If she persists in concealing the identity of the genitor, they 844

[1] ndembo = elephant, hence ivory. The terms ditibe and ndembo here both refer to the ivory bands traditionally worn by the women in the pregnancy initiation ceremony. [192] [861]

1: Tew E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

return to the lupanda, where the initiates are welcomed by their friends. An essential part of the ceremony which takes place at this stage is the exhibition of animal shapes made by the m'sicira, with mounds of earth outlined in flour. These animal shapes differ from lodge to lodge. On the last night before the return to the village the initiates undergo a ceremonial bathing, each boy being carried to the stream by a woman, who thereafter is addressed as 'elder sister'. Finally, with new names, and freshly oiled and decorated, they march to the chief's village to be redeemed by him from the m'sicira with gifts of cloth. After initiation it is a deadly insult to call a boy by his child-name. All who pass through initiation together consider themselves bound by mutual obligations of hospitality.[1]

Girls' initiation takes place in three stages. First, there is ciputa, the general initiation before puberty, which corresponds to the boys' lupanda. It takes place at the same time of year, and though it lasts for less than a week, its conclusion is celebrated at lupanda jointly with the conclusion of the boys' initiation. A hut is built in the bush, like the long dormitory of the boys, and four days are spent in dancing and singing. Each girl (aged about eight years) is accompanied by a sponsor, a woman friend who continues to be her mentor during subsequent rites, and who assists in giving the girl instruction in her womanly duties. At the end the girls are bathed and anointed, dressed in new clothes, and each is carried to lupanda by her sponsor. Here they prove their skill in dancing and receive gifts from their friends. Ritual defloration follows the ciputa initiation.[2] Among Mohammedans, clitoridectomy used to be performed by a woman operator, but, it is said, was discontinued in about 1903 on account of the heavy mortality.[3]

After this first general celebration, first pregnancy and first birth are the occasions of separate rites for each girl. According to some informants there were once two ceremonies connected with pregnancy. One, for the young married men whose wives had not yet conceived, used to take place at the same time as ciputa; each man was attended by a woman sponsor not his wife, given good advice, and put through various tests of manhood. Mitchell does not confirm the present existence of this ceremony, but in the old days if a man was betrothed or married to a child going through her ciputa he had to accompany her.

The liniwo ceremony takes place when a young married woman quickens with child for the first time.[4] The woman, with her sponsor and the married women of the neighbourhood, went out in procession for a ceremony of singing and dancing and instruction to the young couple, followed by a feast. Nowadays no men are allowed to attend liniwo. A child born of a woman who had not undergone this rite used to be buried alive; nowadays her anyene mbumba is charged by the chief.

Finally, six days after the first child is born, its naming ceremony forms a last initiation rite for its mother. The husband is formally led into her hut by her sponsor and the married women of the neighbourhood, and the child is taken out for the first time to the accompaniment of feasting and dancing.

Most Yao men and women act as sponsors of initiates at least once, and all parti-

[1] Sources for boys' initiation: Stannus and Davey, 1913; Werner, 1906, pp. 124-6; Stannus, c. 1910, pp. 247-63; Hoekel, 1933, pp. 19-25; Johnston, 1897, p. 409; Weule, c. 1909, p. 309.
[2] Stannus, c. 1910, p. 234.
[3] Ibid., c. 1910, p. 256.
[4] Ibid., c. 1910, p. 274; Hoekel, 1933, p. 25, ceila ie ciumbu (belly).

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

843 Pregnancy and childbirth. An event of the first importance in the Yao world is the 842 first consumption or rather the "quickening" with the first child, Lilisse; this is described below, together with the other ceremonies of the Unyago.[1] After the ceremony of Lilisse, the period of waiting until the birth of the child passes without further event. A point of medical interest is that native women suffer in many cases from "morning sickness" during pregnancy. That they may have perverted appetites is also recognised, grain husks
[71] and crabs being among the things most commonly desired. As the Anyanja,[2] the Yao believe that the child develops from the semen of the male, although the growth of the child is in some way connected with the mother.

844 When labor commences, the woman retires to the bush a few hundred yards away from her house, attended by some friend, seldom a midwife, and never by her own people, though the mother and the mother-in-law will probably be near the spot. If labor is not completed by evening, they return to the house and the birth may take place actually within its walls.
[71] The attitude assumed in labor is the same as that adopted by the Anyanja,[3] the patient semi-reclining in the arms of another woman who sits behind, grasping her belly. The vulva is smeared with a decoction made from the bark of the wposo tree as a lubricant, but no other help is given. Kwahuli is the name given to the place of confinement; w'huli means the house where the woman remains for a period after the confinement. The Yao recognise the protruding bag of amniotic fluid and call it the "oil-gourd". "Chiasi chikasiche? (The oil-gourd, has it broken?)." They wait until the placenta is delivered before dividing the cord. This is done with the sharp edge of the outer covering of a maize stalk or sugar cane; a knife is never used. The section is made near the placenta or half-way between it and the child, after tying the proximal end with a bark string.

The woman who receives the child at birth is the ambusanga, friend or godmother. If the infant is born in the bush, she carries it back to the house whither they go as soon as labor is completed. The mother herself, unless she is very ill, goes out shortly afterwards and buries the placenta in the ash-heap, using a stick to dig the hole, never a hoe.

● 846 After the birth, the mother and child must remain in the house until the umbilical cord separates, during which time the husband does not enter, though he may come to the door to look in at the child.

The day on which exit from the house is made, the floor is entirely replastered with mud.
[852 The baby's head is shaved and a cross is made upon it with upwa, a kind of red pigment.
553 The husband may then receive the child and in the case of a first-born, it is he who gives it
302] its name; other children may be named by the ambusanga, the mother, or the aunt.

When the mother leaves the house to appear in public, the salanga who put her lilisse on,[4] removes it.

So long as the infant remains in the house, care must be taken as to persons allowed to handle it. A woman who has recently had a menstrual period or coitus with her husband,

[1] Vide infra, p. 274. [2] Stannus, op. cit., p. 310. [3] Ibid. [4] Vide infra, p. 274.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

or a girl who has just returned from Chipuchu must not touch the child, as it is said, "Her body is hot and would give fever to the child." To guard against such a happening, some "clean" woman, after handing some beads to the mother, will ask to be allowed to take the infant. This indicates that should it sicken, the beads will pay the medicine-woman who comes to cure it. The mother and baby are simply washed in water and are not treated with medicine, unless meconium has been voided before the child was delivered.[1] If the infant dies before it is presented to the outside world, it is disposed of in the same way as a stillborn child, i.e. buried in the ash-heap. About the tenth day, the baby is adorned with a girdle of beads and two little pieces of stick obtained from a medicine-woman to make the infant grow fat. 846 [845 766] [856]

The length of time during which the father and mother refrain from cohabitation after the birth of a baby varies greatly according to circumstance. Four months is probably a minimum, while two years, during which the woman suckles the child, is the common interval. After the first coitus, the man and woman wash themselves and the baby is bathed in the same water to prevent any ill coming to it. 833

Suckling often continues much longer than two years. If the mother dies, the child may be suckled by the grandmother, an aunt, or some other woman, but the breasts must first be treated with medicine or the child would die 853

A child born breech first is called salanga, a word which is also used to denote a variety of domestic fowl which always has the appearance of having its feathers ruffled. A child who dies before the father and mother have resumed sexual relations is buried in a graveyard apart from that of adults. The grave, dug with sticks, not hoes, is very shallow, and when it is filled in, a heap of stones is made above it. Only women attend the burial. A deep grave would cause the mother to go on losing children at an early age. The body of such a child is called hiwee, "hyaena." 845 766

A woman dying undelivered is placed in the grave in the usual way and then, before filling in the earth, one of the grave-diggers descends into the pit, cuts through the enveloping shroud, and incises the abdomen. One end of a long bamboo stick or reed is inserted in the incision and the other end is brought out to the surface of the grave. If this were not done, "many would die in childbirth." 844 766

Twins are not killed by the Yao but are well treated and always cared for equally. They are given similar clothing and food.[2] There is a story that the mother of Nkwamba, 845

[1] Chinguru, vide infra, p. 286.

[2] 'T. A. Worsat, 'Among the Congo Cannibals, by John H. Weeks, London, 1913, a review,' (Man, vol. 14, no. 14, 1914, p. 14).

I take this opportunity of referring to Miss Worsat's review in which, speaking of twins, she says, "They are always among the Angonde given the names Mapali and Nyama." Mapali in Chiyonde refers to a kind of musical instrument and the Chiyao meaning is "unnatural pains." Nyama is a Chiyao word which certainly means "the back." It is sometimes used of the second born twin but does not occur in Chiyonde. I have never heard of twins either among the Wayao or the Angonde spoken of by these names. A mother carries the first born on the right arm and the second born on the left, but, so far as I know, she does not give a duplicate greeting nor make a habit of using equally with both hands. [114]

4: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1909) 1910 FT7 Yao FT7
Ngoni FR5
Maravi FR4

Women wear their cloth folded across the upper level of the breasts from right to left. Men and women often have two cloths, one over the loins, only the second fastening over the chest. M Y N 291

A menstruating woman also wears a small piece of calico corresponding to a diaper supported by string round the waist.[1] The same thing is worn after child-birth for six months. Angoni women always wear them. M Y N [841] [846]

The Angoni, Chipeta wear their cloth toga-fashion, carrying a fold of cloth on the left arm. An Angoni chief wears three such, blue, white and coloured, the first outside, the last next to the skin.

The material used is now practically everywhere European-made calico, formerly bark cloth only was used by Nyanja, though weaving had been accomplished by Angoni, where skins were and are used as articles of clothing. M Y N [246]

There is nothing to distinguish men of various grades, etc. Fashion at the present time is very capricious—some patterned cloth being much worn one month will have no sale a month later; this is true both of men and of women.

There is no class uniform, and no "costumes" are worn save in dancing (q.v.).

Men are now seen wearing a piece of calico twisted up on the head in turban form, a custom lately introduced from the coast—the only indigenous head-gear is the string skull-cap worn by Angoni widows. N [589]

Under the heading of dress must be included the bead aprons worn by Yao and Angoni. Among the former the use of this garment is restricted to the women, who in the house sometimes wear nothing else; among the Angoni the children often have them and no other clothing.

Sandals are sometimes made of skin and fastened on the foot with a thong when crossing thorny country.

Among Angoni the mawale only used to be worn; this is a small hard-cased fruit which was hollowed out and worn just covering the glans penis. N 291 824

FOOD, ETC.

The staple food throughout the country is either maize or rice, the latter only at various spots on the lake shore where it can be grown. Two fixed meals per diem are taken, at 9 or 10 a.m. and again at 6 p.m.; each consists of nsima porridge made from maize flour or rice flour or boiled rice with some ndiwo (relish) to which the salt is added. At odd times the native will eat anything that opportunity offers—a piece of cassava root, a boiled sweet potato, a roasted maize cob, etc. M Y 262 [264]

The nsima is made by stirring flour (ufa) into boiling water till a stiff paste is formed; this is kept cooking for five minutes and then scraped out with a wooden M Y 252

[1] Diaper or mikoto: a woman keeps five or six; they are never put away in baskets but always hung up; a woman changes every time she bathes, using two or three per diem; they may be given to a female child to wear, but are then not worn again by a woman.

6: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1947) 1949 FT7 Yao FT7

844 believe that she will die. The man's representatives are therefore able to establish the child's paternity from the birth-pang confessions of the woman.

●846 The child is kept in the hut where it was born, for six or seven days, while the umbilical cord dries and falls off. During this time (luuli) the child is unnamed, and [553] it is named only when it is taken out of the hut. Should it die during this period of seclusion it remains unnamed and is referred to by a special term (litaya, pl. mataya). [128] I have therefore been able to enumerate live births by means of the distinction made between miscarriages and still-births (kwatanga) and children who lived long enough to be referred to as mataya. After the birth of the child the woman may not have 846 intercourse for four or five months. To do so would be to endanger the life of the (854) child with a disease called ndaka,[1] which is contracted by a sexually inactive person 834 when he comes into contact with a sexually active person. The husband may have intercourse with a second wife, but must take care to medicate himself so that he does not endanger the life of his child. When the child is about 4 or 5 months of age the parents perform ritual intercourse and medicate the child against the mystical dangers of sexual activity; sexual relations are then resumed.

834 The Yao say that a second child should not be born while the first is still being [853] suckled. Since lactation continues for about two years I am uncertain whether monogynists remain continent, as they say they do, or whether coitus interruptus is 464 practised. It is quite usual for husbands to become labour migrants when their 842 children are still very young. I have known women to write to their husbands who are away working and tell them to return because their children have 'grown', i.e. have been weaned. Labour recruiters had difficulty in recruiting men immediately after the soldiers had been demobilized at the end of the war, because the women objected, saying that they had remained childless long enough and the men must first wait until children were born. However, actual examination of birth-dates [163] shows that children are sometimes born within a year of one another and sometimes there are quite big gaps. The two-year gap between children is probably an ideal which few attain.

5. The Estimation of Fertility

(a) Sundbaerg's Age Divisions

128 As a preliminary estimate of fertility, Sundbaerg's trichotomy of ages may be considered. The argument behind this division of the population into Youth, Middle Age, and Old Age is that those populations with a high proportion of youth have a greater tendency to increase. Table V shows this trichotomy for the Yao with the same material for some other populations shown for comparison. Where the gross reproduction-rate is known for the period shown in the table, this is included.

128 At any one time a certain proportion of the population is absent from the area, 162 usually at some labour centre. Hence the proportions of the population are distributed abnormally. In all there appeared to be a total of sixty-three men, women, and children absent from the hamlets, who would otherwise have been living there. Hence in Table V these have been included in the totals in the 'Yao with absentees' proportions.

[171] [1] A disease of this sort is believed in by many Central African tribes. Among the Nyanja-speaking peoples it is known as tsunjile.

1: Tew E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

return to the lupanda, where the initiates are welcomed by their friends. An essential part of the ceremony which takes place at this stage is the exhibition of animal shapes made by the m'micira, with mounds of earth outlined in flour. These animal shapes differ from lodge to lodge. On the last night before the return to the village the initiates undergo a ceremonial bathing, each boy being carried to the stream by a woman, who thereafter is addressed as 'elder sister'. Finally, with new names, and freshly oiled and decorated, they march to the chief's village to be redeemed by him from the m'micira with gifts of cloth. After initiation it is a deadly insult to call a boy by his child-name. All who pass through initiation together consider themselves bound by mutual obligations of hospitality.[1]

Girls' initiation takes place in three stages. First, there is ciputu, the general initiation before puberty, which corresponds to the boys' lupanda. It takes place at the same time of year, and though it lasts for less than a week, its conclusion is celebrated at lupanda jointly with the conclusion of the boys' initiation. A hut is built in the bush, like the long dormitory of the boys, and four days are spent in dancing and singing. Each girl (aged about eight years) is accompanied by a sponsor, a woman friend who continues to be her mentor during subsequent rites, and who assists in giving the girl instruction in her womanly duties. At the end the girls are bathed and anointed, dressed in new clothes, and each is carried to lupanda by her sponsor. Here they prove their skill in dancing and receive gifts from their friends. Ritual defloration follows the ciputu initiation.[2] Among Mohammedans, clitoridectomy used to be performed by a woman operator, but, it is said, was discontinued in about 1903 on account of the heavy mortality.[3]

After this first general celebration, first pregnancy and first birth are the occasions of separate rites for each girl. According to some informants there were once two ceremonies connected with pregnancy. One, for the young married men whose wives had not yet conceived, used to take place at the same time as ciputu; each man was attended by a woman sponsor not his wife, given good advice, and put through various tests of manhood. Mitchell does not confirm the present existence of this ceremony, but in the old days if a man was betrothed or married to a child going through her ciputu he had to accompany her.

The litiwo ceremony takes place when a young married woman quickens with child for the first time.[4] The woman, with her sponsor and the married women of the neighbourhood, went out in procession for a ceremony of singing and dancing and instruction to the young couple, followed by a feast. Nowadays no men are allowed to attend litiwo. A child born of a woman who had not undergone this rite used to be buried alive; nowadays her anyone mbumba is charged by the chief.

Finally, six days after the first child is born, its naming ceremony forms a last initiation rite for its mother. The husband is formally led into her hut by her sponsor and the married women of the neighbourhood, and the child is taken out for the first time to the accompaniment of feasting and dancing.

Most Yao men and women act as sponsors of initiates at least once, and all parti-

[1] Sources for boys' initiation: Stannus and Dewey, 1913; Werner, 1906, pp. 124-6; Stannus, 4, 1910, pp. 147-63; Hoskel, 1935, pp. 19-25; Johnston, 1897, p. 409; Weule, 1, 1909, p. 304.
[2] Stannus, 4, 1910, p. 159. [3] Ibid., 1, 1910, p. 296.
[4] Ibid., 4, 1910, p. 174; Hoskel, 1935, p. 25, nalo = simulo (belly).

3:Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

generous and popular, the donations may mount up to a useful sum. Dancing goes on late into the afternoon when all return to the village. 843

The man may not speak to his guardian again until after the birth of the child. The two women guardians, the nkumusi and the nahunga, as a rule cease sexual intercourse with their husbands during the same period or, at all events, during the last month before the birth of the child.

The child born of a woman who has not gone through Lilimo is buried alive. [847]

Chieftainship. The Yao when they migrated to their present country were headed by a number of their chiefs. These eventually settled in different areas adjacent to one another, each ruling over a considerable tract of country. The chief was supported by a number of headmen, each of whom looked after a village; the chiefs and headmen in turn being assisted by the village elders. 622 643

Often among a chief's counselors one found a number of his relatives, and sons and brothers were often made headmen. A man assuming chieftainship often had to dispose of a brother of whom he was afraid. 643

Chieftainship is hereditary, the chief's name being passed on to each successor. Succession is to eldest son of the eldest sister or a son of some other sister. Failing these, it passes to a grand-nephew. If there is no acceptable adult nephew, a full brother may succeed.

Macdonald's account of the Malemya's succession[1] is, I believe, incorrect. The old Malemya (Nalutumbo) was succeeded according to custom by his nephew, Kanbola who, as Malemya, was called Ndalama. Kuntaja was not a younger brother of Nalutumbo or Kanbola, but a cousin of the latter. Ndalama was succeeded by a nephew, not the eldest but the second son of a sister, the eldest having already succeeded to the chieftainship of Kuntaja was therefore ineligible. The present Malemya will be succeeded by a grand-nephew, the son of a daughter of his eldest sister, his sister having no sons. [114]

A successor inherited all the wives and slaves of the deceased chief and all his goods and chattels, guns, ivory and gardens. Any small possessions might be divided among the deceased's children and in the case of guns, those who had always used them often laid claims not to be separated from their weapons; these claims were often allowed by the new chief. 643 428

In the same way, any ordinary man's successor is his nephew, the son of a sister, who inherits all goods and chattels and slave wives, but not free-born wives, nor gardens, which go to the free wives. Stock is generally divided among the children.

Before 1891, when a British Protectorate was formally declared over Nyasaland, each chief ruled supreme. He was consulted as to the dates for Unyago; he directed the harvesting, etc.; he proclaimed war and generally was paramount among his people. It will be seen, therefore, that he was a busy man, but he received no direct remuneration. His wealth consisted of slaves and ivory. Slaves he obtained in warfare and as blood money. 643 [554]

[1] Op. cit., vol. i, p. 180.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

rationalized in the Yao theory of conception.[1] They believe that after intercourse the semen clots and embeds itself in the womb. From this the child develops and is nurtured by the mother until it is due to be born. Subsequent acts of intercourse add semen to the body of the child and make it fat. Semen from other men may be used, too, to feed the child in its intra-uterine life, but its body and blood are derived from the semen which first clotted. In Yao opinion there can be one father only.

Not all acts of intercourse lead to impregnation because sometimes, for various reasons, especially in immature women, the semen fails to clot. There is therefore, to the Yao way of thinking, some difficulty in determining the 'father' of a child. This difficulty is met by the belief that the intra-uterine child in some way knows about the doings of its parents and in particular knows who its father is. It therefore refuses to be born unless its father is recognized.[2] Hence if a child is born without undue puerperal complications it is assumed to be the offspring of the man who is currently living with its mother. If labour is prolonged, however, the relatives call for confessions (kupaw) from both husband and wife. The husband's confessions are usually formal and simple. The wife's confessions on the other hand are detailed and complete. She confesses the name of an adulterer, and her midwives, including the husband's sisters as his witnesses, wait for the next birth-spasm. If the child is not born at this spasm she is told to confess again. Only after she has confessed to a lover whom the Yao assume to be the genitor will the child eventually be born. After this the aggrieved husband summons the adulterer to court and he is made to accept the fatherhood of the child.

The act of formally accepting the paternity of a child, which is also done when a woman has a child out of wedlock, confers rights of two types on the child. The first set of rights is directly economic and physical. The father is expected to give the mother salt, money for relish, and cloth to help her rear the child. But this side of a father's duties to his child ceases as soon as another man marries the woman. The new husband then takes over the

[1] I have dealt with this more fully in Marriage among the Machinga Yao.
[2] It also refuses to be born for other reasons, but the first considered is always the adultery of its parents. See p. 138.

1: Tew E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

BIRTH

Birth takes place in the bush, some distance from the hamlet, in the presence of 844 female relatives of the woman and of her husband. If the child is stillborn, or miscarried, it is buried in the bush. The husband and wife must abstain from sexual intercourse [845] for some months, until a special ritual intercourse is performed. A man who breaks this taboo is liable to contract a fatal disease, kusasanga. Difficult births are attributed 845 to: (a) a curse spoken by a matrilineal relative—this is made effective by the intervention of the ancestors, and to remove it it is necessary to perform a rite making clear that no malice is borne; (b) the adultery of the woman or her husband, in which case confession will save the woman from dying; and (c) sorcery.

If a child is born alive it is brought to the hut of the mother or one of her female 844 relatives, where it is secluded until its naming ceremony, about six days later. Only 852 after the naming is the child considered to be a member of society. A second child should not be born while the first is still suckling, i.e. for about two years. When the child is about four or five months old it is ritually immunized against the dangers of sexual activity, and the parents may resume relations. Elaborate magical precautions are taken to ensure the child's survival. Children sleep with their mother, the boys until [513] they are old enough to go to the boys' dormitory, and the girls until marriage.[1]

INITIATION

The yearly initiation ceremonies, unyago, are the principal cultural institution of the 881
Yao. That for the boys, lupande, is the most important, and may only take place under 852 a chief or superior village headman, whereas a girls' initiation ceremony may take place under an ordinary headman. The right to hold a boys' initiation ceremony there- [554] fore becomes a mark of status which is jealously disputed.[2] The right is expressed as 'having a ciwele'. A ciwele is the small basket in which the special sacrificial flour is carried.

Yao carry out initiation between the ages of seven and eleven, whereas generally in East Africa it is postponed until puberty.[3] In response to requests from the headmen the chief appoints the time and place of the boys' initiation ceremony for a group of villages. It is held at the end of the dry season, before the bush is burned. Each initiate is accompanied by a sponsor, nhamani, who may be a brother, uncle, or friend. Before they set out for the place appointed to be lupande, they all assemble before the chief to be anointed with millet-flour specially prepared by his head wife. The word lupande refers to a forked stick over which the sacrificial flour is poured. This stick is planted at the place of assembly, the masakana. The boys, their sponsors, and the master of ceremonies, m'mirira, are accompanied with dancing as far as masakana by their friends. The next day the initiates go to a spot in the bush, where the circumcision (formerly only an incision) is performed, and remain in the bush school, ndagala, for about two months, until the wounds are completely healed. The Yao circumcision rite is said not to have been introduced by the Arabs.[4]

During these weeks the boys are subjected to rigorous discipline and instructed in various skills and tribal lore. They sleep in long dormitory huts, with partitions dividing the boys of different villages from each other. The chief appoints the day for

[1] Warner, 1918, pp. 140-3.
[2] Swanson and Dewey, 1915, p. 109.
[3] Duff, 1905, p. 312.
[4] Livingstone, 1874, p. 81.

1: Tew E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

return to the lupanda, where the initiates are welcomed by their friends. An essential part of the ceremony which takes place at this stage is the exhibition of animal shapes made by the n'mcirw, with mounds of earth outlined in flour. These animal shapes differ from lodge to lodge. On the last night before the return to the village the initiates undergo a ceremonial bathing, each boy being carried to the stream by a woman, who thereafter is addressed as 'elder sister'. Finally, with new names, and freshly oiled and decorated, they march to the chief's village to be redeemed by him from the n'mcirw with gifts of cloth. After initiation it is a deadly insult to call a boy by his child-name. All who pass through initiation together consider themselves bound by mutual obligations of hospitality.[1]

Girls' initiation takes place in three stages. First, there is ciputa, the general initiation before puberty, which corresponds to the boys' lupanda. It takes place at the same time of year, and though it lasts for less than a week, its conclusion is celebrated at lupanda jointly with the conclusion of the boys' initiation. A hut is built in the bush, like the long dormitory of the boys, and four days are spent in dancing and singing. Each girl (aged about eight years) is accompanied by a sponsor, a woman friend who continues to be her mentor during subsequent rites, and who assists in giving the girl instruction in her womanly duties. At the end the girls are bathed and anointed, dressed in new clothes, and each is carried to lupanda by her sponsor. Here they prove their skill in dancing and receive gifts from their friends. Ritual defloration follows the ciputa initiation.[2] Among Mohammedans, clitoridectomy used to be performed by a woman operator, but, it is said, was discontinued in about 1903 on account of the heavy mortality.[3]

After this first general celebration, first pregnancy and first birth are the occasions of separate rites for each girl. According to some informants there were once two ceremonies connected with pregnancy. One, for the young married men whose wives had not yet conceived, used to take place at the same time as ciputa; each man was attended by a woman sponsor not his wife, given good advice, and put through various tests of manhood. Mitchell does not confirm the present existence of this ceremony, but in the old days if a man was betrothed or married to a child going through her ciputa he had to accompany her.

The litiwo ceremony takes place when a young married woman quickens with child for the first time.[4] The woman, with her sponsor and the married women of the neighbourhood, went out in procession for a ceremony of singing and dancing and instruction to the young couple, followed by a feast. Nowadays no men are allowed to attend litiwo. A child born of a woman who had not undergone this rite used to be buried alive; nowadays her anyewe mbumba is charged by the chief.

Finally, six days after the first child is born, its naming ceremony forms a last initiation rite for its mother. The husband is formally led into her hut by her sponsor and the married women of the neighbourhood, and the child is taken out for the first time to the accompaniment of feasting and dancing.

Most Yao men and women act as sponsors of initiates at least once, and all parti-

[1] Sources for boys' initiation: Stannus and Davey, 1913; Werner, 1908, pp. 124–6; Stannus, 4, 1922, pp. 247–63; Hackel, 1935, pp. 19–25; Johnston, 1897, p. 409; Weule, 1, 1909, p. 304.
[2] Stannus, 4, 1922, p. 234. [3] Ibid., 1, 1922, p. 256.
[4] Ibid., 4, 1922, p. 274; Hackel, 1935, p. 23, calls it cimuko (belly).

1: Tew E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

ciputo yearly in the great initiation festival for boys and girls. Consequently as they repeat each year the lessons of their own initiation, the ceremonies are the main vehicle of Yao culture.[1]

There are also two Moslem ceremonies:

(1) Jando, the boys' Moslem baptism, which takes about seven days, and is usually worked in with lupande:

(2) Nsondo, the girls' Moslem baptism, which is the same as jando, but usually quite separate from ciputo. It is important that the wife of a Moslem should have her nsondo so that she knows how to prepare the food properly at Ramadan.

Menstrual and Other Taboos

Menstruation is held to be dangerous. A special mat is used by the woman during this time, and is rolled up and kept during the rest of the cycle. The hut is completely replastered after menstruation. Intercourse during menses leads to disease of the man. Sexual contact is dangerous to persons at certain other periods: during initiation ceremonies, during mourning, and for babies who have not been through the protective rite. The danger is thought to lie in ndaka, a dread disease characterized by swelling. This may be transmitted by salt in the food. Deaths are often attributed to 'salt'. Much of the significance of the mourning is that medicines are prepared which protect the mourners against the dangers attendant on sexual activity.

Burial Rites

News of a death must be sent to the chief by a messenger carrying a single fowl. The chief gives a present of calico for wrapping the body, and a goat for the burial men. These are called anile, neighbours unrelated to the dead, who volunteer for certain duties. They prepare the body for burial and carry it in procession to the graveyard outside the village. No uninitiated person is allowed to see the funeral. All who attend the burial are prohibited from sexual intercourse for one month. After this time the prohibition is lifted by a ceremony of beer drinking and feasting, and on the following day all fires in the village are extinguished, and then relit, and the mourners are shaved. A year later beer is brewed for a final ceremony.

For a period after her husband's death a widow is unclean, and has to be purified by ritual intercourse with a man who is paid. The widow is not allowed to remarry for two or three years. A widower leaves his wife's village, after receiving a parting gift. The widows of ordinary persons are not inherited. If a man has himself a 'name' (rank and social position), he has an heir, who inherits also the wives of his predecessor. But if the heir (the maternal nephew) has married a cross-cousin (mother's brother's daughter) he would not consider the wife's mother as his inherited wife.

Before the burial the dead man's hut used to be destroyed, together with his possessions. Immediately afterwards a consultation is held as to whether retaliatory action against sorcerers is called for. The anile's duties include not only the conducting of the burial, but also the subsequent inquiry and the conduct of the second ceremony, the beer drinking, at which they shave the mourners. A man who has

[1] Main sources for girls' initiation: Hackel, 1935, p. 19; Simonse, 1, 1910, pp. 182-7; 2, 1911, pp. 169-70; Simonse and Dewey, 1913; Duff, 1903, pp. 312-13; Abdullah, 1919, pp. 18-19; Macdonald, 1882, vol. 1, pp. 125-30; Wanner, 1908, pp. 126-7; Johnston, 1897, p. 400.

3: Stanmus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Tao FT7

843 Pregnancy and childbirth. An event of the first importance in the Tao world is the 842 first conception or rather the "quickening" with the first child, Lilion; this is described below, together with the other ceremonies of the Ungaga.[1] After the ceremony of Lilion, the period of waiting until the birth of the child passes without further event. A point of medical interest is that native women suffer in many cases from "morning sickness" during pregnancy. That they may have perverted appetites is also recognized, grain husks [71] and crabs being among the things most commonly desired. As the Anyanja,[2] the Tao believes that the child develops from the semen of the male, although the growth of the child is in some way connected with the mother.

641 When labor commences, the woman retires to the bush a few hundred yards away from her house, attended by some friend, seldom a midwife, and never by her own people, though the mother and the mother-in-law will probably be near the spot. If labor is not completed by evening, they return to the house and the birth may take place actually within its walls.
[71] The attitude assumed in labor is the same as that adopted by the Anyanja,[3] the patient semi-reclining in the arms of another woman who sits behind, grasping her belly. The vulva is anointed with a decoction made from the bark of the mpoma tree as a lubricant, but no other help is given. Kambali is the name given to the place of confinement; m'bali means the house where the woman remains for a period after the confinement. The Tao recognize the protruding bag of amniotic fluid and call it the "ali-guard". "Chimai chilawichi? (The ali-guard, has it broken?)." They wait until the placenta is delivered before dividing the cord. This is done with the sharp edge of the outer covering of a maize stalk or sugar cane; a knife is never used. The section is made near the placenta or half-way between it and the child, after tying the proximal end with a bark string.

The woman who receives the child at birth is the ambuanga, friend or godmother. If the infant is born in the bush, she carries it back to the house whither they go as soon as labor is completed. The mother herself, unless she is very ill, goes out shortly afterwards and buries the placenta in the ash-heap, using a stick to dig the hole, never a hoe.

After the birth, the mother and child must remain in the house until the umbilical cord separates, during which time the husband does not enter, though he may come to the door to look in at the child.

The day on which exit from the house is made, the floor is entirely replastered with mud.
[852] The baby's head is shaved and a cross is made upon it with mpoma, a kind of red pigment.
[853] The husband may then receive the child and in the case of a first-born, it is he who gives it [304] the name; other children may be named by the ambuanga, the mother, or the aunt.

When the mother leaves the house to appear in public, the mdongo who put her lilion on,[4] removes it.

So long as the infant remains in the house, care must be taken as to persons allowed to handle it. A woman who has recently had a menstrual period or coition with her husband, or a girl who has just returned from Chiputo must not touch the child, as it is said, "the body is hot and would give fever to the child." To guard against such a happening, some "clean" women, after handing some beads to the mother, will ask to be allowed to take the infant. This indicates that should it sicken, the beads will pay the medicine-woman who comes to cure it. The mother and baby are simply washed in water and are not treated with medicine, unless menstruation has been visited before the child was delivered.[1] If the infant dies before it is presented to the outside world, it is disposed of in the same way as a stillborn child, i.e. buried in the sub-kraal. About the tenth day, the baby is adorned with a girdle of beads and two little pieces of stick obtained from a medicine-woman to make the infant grow fat.

[1] Vide infra, p. [illegible]. [2] Swanson, op. cit., p. [illegible]. [3] Ibid. [4] Vide infra, p. [illegible].

The length of time during which the father and mother refrain from cohabitation after the birth of a baby varies greatly according to circumstances. Four months is probably a minimum, while two years, during which the woman suckles the child, is the common interval. After the first colon, the man and woman wash themselves and the baby is bathed in the same water to prevent any ill coming to it.

Suckling often continues much longer than two years. If the mother dies, the child may be suckled by the grandmother, an aunt, or some other woman, but the breasts must first be treated with medicine or the child would die.

A child born breech first is called mlongo, a word which is also used to denote a variety of domestic fowl which always has the appearance of having its feathers ruffled. A child who dies before the father and mother have removed sexual relations is buried in a graveyard apart from that of adults. The grave, dug with sticks, not hoes, is very shallow, and when it is filled in, a heap of stones is made above it. Only women attend the burial. A deep grave would cause the mother to go on losing children at an early age. The body of such a child is called kisuma, "kyuma."

A woman dying undelivered is placed in the grave in the usual way and then, before filling in the earth, one of the grave-diggers descends into the pit, cuts through the encompassing sheath, and incises the abdomen. One end of a long bamboo stick or reed is inserted in the incision and the other end is brought out to the surface of the grave. If this were not done, "many would die in childbirth."

Twins are not killed by the Yao but are well treated and always cared for equally. They are given similar clothing and food.[1] There is a story that the mother of Mwanaiwa,

[1] Chiperu, vide infra, p. 240.

[1] C. A. Werner, "Among the Congo Cannibals, by John H. Weeks, London, 1912: a review," (Man, vol. 12, no. 10, 1912, p. 151).

I take this opportunity of returning to Miss Werner's review in which, speaking of twins, she says, "They are always among the boyands given the names Mapali and Kyamo." Mapali is Chinyanja either as a kind of wooden hammer-mend and the Chipeto meaning is "successive pulse." Kyamo is a Chipeto word which certainly means "the back." It is sometimes used of the second born twin but does not occur in Chinyanja. I have never heard of twins either among the Wayao or the boyanja spoken of by these women. A mother carries the first born on the right arm and the second born on the left, but, so far as I know, she does not give a duplicate greeting nor make a bustle of carrying equally with both hands.

6: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1947) 1949 FT7 Yao FT7

believe that she will die. The man's representatives are therefore able to establish the child's paternity from the birth-pang confessions of the woman.

The child is kept in the hut where it was born, for six or seven days, while the umbilical cord dries and falls off. During this time (lusi) the child is unnamed, and it is named only when it is taken out of the hut. Should it die during this period of seclusion it remains unnamed and is referred to by a special term (ikuyu, pl. matyu). I have therefore been able to enumerate live births by means of the distinction made between miscarriages and still-births (kwisunga) and children who lived long enough to be referred to as matyu. After the birth of the child the woman may not have intercourse for four or five months. To do so would be to endanger the life of the child with a disease called ndeka,[1] which is contracted by a sexually inactive person when he comes into contact with a sexually active person. The husband may have intercourse with a second wife, but must take care to medicate himself so that he does not endanger the life of his child. When the child is about 4 or 5 months of age the parents perform ritual intercourse and medicate the child against the mystical dangers of sexual activity; sexual relations are then resumed.

The Yao say that a second child should not be born while the first is still being suckled. Since lactation continues for about two years I am uncertain whether monogynists remain continent, as they say they do, or whether coitus interruptus is practised. It is quite usual for husbands to become labour migrants when their children are still very young. I have known women to write to their husbands who are away working and tell them to return because their children have 'grown', i.e. have been weaned. Labour recruiters had difficulty in recruiting men immediately after the soldiers had been demobilised at the end of the war, because the women objected, saying that they had remained childless long enough and the men must first wait until children were born. However, actual examination of birth-dates shows that children are sometimes born within a year of one another and sometimes there are quite big gaps. The two-year gap between children is probably an ideal which few attain.

5. The Estimation of Fertility

(a) Sundberg's Age Divisions

As a preliminary estimate of fertility, Sundberg's trichotomy of ages may be considered. The argument behind this division of the population into Youth, Middle Age, and Old Age is that those populations with a high proportion of youth have a greater tendency to increase. Table V shows this trichotomy for the Yao with the same material for some other populations shown for comparison. Where the gross reproduction-rate is known for the period shown in the table, this is included.

At any one time a certain proportion of the population is absent from the area, usually at some labour centre. Hence the proportions of the population are distributed abnormally. In all there appeared to be a total of sixty-three men, women, and children absent from the hamlets, who would otherwise have been living there. Hence in Table V these have been included in the totals in the 'Yao with absentees' proportions.

[1] A disease of this sort is believed in by many Central African tribes. Among the Nyanja-speaking peoples it is known as chinyala.

believes that she will die. The man's representatives are therefore able to establish the child's paternity from the birth-pang confessions of the woman.

The child is kept in the hut where it was born, for six or seven days, while the umbilical cord dries and falls off. During this time (lusil) the child is unnamed, and it is named only when it is taken out of the hut. Should it die during this period of seclusion it remains unnamed and is referred to by a special term (lisyu, pl. matyu). I have therefore been able to enumerate live births by means of the distinction made between miscarriages and still-births (kwasage) and children who lived long enough to be referred to as matyu. After the birth of the child the woman may not have intercourse for four or five months. To do so would be to endanger the life of the child with a disease called ndoka,[1] which is contracted by a sexually inactive person when he comes into contact with a sexually active person. The husband may have intercourse with a second wife, but must take care to medicate himself so that he does not endanger the life of his child. When the child is about 4 or 5 months of age the parents perform ritual intercourse and medicate the child against the mystical dangers of sexual activity; sexual relations are then resumed.

The Yao say that a second child should not be born while the first is still being suckled. Since lactation continues for about two years I am uncertain whether monogynists remain continent, as they say they do, or whether coitus interruptus is practised. It is quite usual for husbands to become labour migrants when their children are still very young. I have known women to write to their husbands who are away working and tell them to return because their children have 'grown', i.e. have been weaned. Labour recruiters had difficulty in recruiting men immediately after the soldiers had been demobilized at the end of the war, because the women objected, saying that they had remained childless long enough and the men must first wait until children were born. However, actual examination of birth-dates shows that children are sometimes born within a year of one another and sometimes there are quite big gaps. The two-year gap between children is probably an ideal which few attain.

3. The Estimation of Fertility

(a) Sundberg's Age Division

As a preliminary estimate of fertility, Sundberg's trichotomy of ages may be considered. The argument behind this division of the population into Youth, Middle Age, and Old Age is that those populations with a high proportion of youth have a greater tendency to increase. Table V shows this trichotomy for the Yao with the same material for some other populations shown for comparison. Where the gross reproduction-rate is known for the period shown in the table, this is included.

At any one time a certain proportion of the population is absent from the area, usually at some labour centre. Hence the proportions of the population are distributed abnormally. In all there appeared to be a total of sixty-three men, women, and children absent from the hamlets, who would otherwise have been living there. Hence in Table V these have been included in the totals in the 'Yao with absentees' proportions.

[1] A disease of this sort is believed in by many Central African tribes. Among the Nyanja-speaking peoples it is known as ciwanda.

6: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1947) 1949 FT7 Yao FT7

Table V shows that the age-distribution for the Yao sample is very similar to certain other populations commonly held to have high birth-rates. There appears to be some correlation between the proportion of youth in a population and the gross

TABLE V. Sundbarg's Age Divisions

Population	Year	Youth 0-15	Middle age 15-40	Old age over 40	G.R.R.
Yao*	1948	47·5	45·6	11·0	--
Yao with abscesses	1948	40·6	47·0	10·0	--
Hondurans†	1940	40·6	47·7	9·7	--
Nicaragua	1940	40·9	47·7	9·6	--
Guatemala	1940	41·6	46·9	9·5	--
India	1931	39·9	39·4	9·7	--
Japan	1935	36·9	47·9	15·3	0·98‡
Bulgaria	1934	34·9	49·9	15·2	0·70
Czechoslovakia	1930	26·3	54·3	19·3	0·91
New Zealand	1936	27·3	50·7	21·8	0·94
Denmark	1940	24·9	54·1	21·0	0·98
Sweden	1940	20·4	54·8	24·8	0·89

* There were 25 in the sample whose ages were not known. These were all adults and have been included proportionately in the two adult groups.

† All data for other populations taken from The League of Nations Statistical Yearbook 1941/42.

‡ Interpolated between 1930 (0·95) and 1937 (0·98).

reproduction-rate. Judging from the material presented in Table V a high gross reproduction-rate may be expected among the Yao where the proportion of youth is much higher than in the case of those whose gross reproduction-rates are quoted.

(3) The Proportion of Children under 5 to Women 15-50

Fertility may be judged more accurately than by this trichotomy by considering the proportion of children under 5 to the total number of women between the ages of 15 to 50, i.e. the fertility ratio.* In the whole sample there were 147 children under 5 and 152 women between the ages of 15 to 50. This is a ratio of 966 children per 1,000 women. However, women who are going away from the area for a long time, as, for example, wives of men who are going with their husbands to some labour centre, possibly in South Africa or Southern Rhodesia, usually leave their weaned children with their matrilineal relatives. This means that the ratio quoted (966 per 1,000) is, in reality, an over-estimate of the true ratio. In order to arrive at a nearer estimate of the ratio we must consider the children actually born to women in the sample. Table VI classifies all children both dead and surviving born to women between the ages 15 to 55. From this table we adduce that there were 151 women between the ages 15 to 50 (for whom details were available), and among them they had 141 surviving children under the age of 5. This is a fertility ratio of 938 per 1,000 women. Table VII shows the fertility ratio for 18 countries with their gross reproduction-rate for the same period as the fertility ratio.

* It is more usual to take the number of women between 15 and 44, though recently the age-group between 20 and 49 has been used. I have taken the age-limits 15 to 50 because of the early age of marriage, and because it appeared that the average age of cessation of child-bearing is about 50 (see Table VIII). For a discussion of the suitability of this measure of fertility where birth registration is not practised, see T. Lynn Smith, Population Analysis, McGraw Hill Book Co., New York (1948), p. 198.

4: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1909)1910 FT7 Yao FT7
Maravi FR4
Ngoni FR5
Bemba FR5

M 501 Necklaces, most commonly for children, are made of a number of little square pieces of hippo ivory strung together, ornamented with geometrical designs.

M 789 Medicine is often carried in a little packet suspended round the neck, as also charms of various kinds. The medicine may be some powdered charred roots or little twigs, leaves, etc., of some tree; these are sometimes now wrapped up in a piece of paper on which is written some extract from the Koran (among Mohammedan Yao); this is then sewn in a little piece of calico and adorned with beads and suspended round the neck with a string.

Y [789] Charms take various forms. Small pieces of wood or, to guard against attack by lion, teeth are worn. Armlets of the same kind are worn against sickness, and others are worn by Angoni, made of beads to which knives are attached. Bracelets of ivory, plaited grass and elephant tail hairs are also worn.

M 501 Metal and wirework bracelets are commonly worn by Angoni, also twisted wire finger rings and rings of lead and ivory. Heavy brass ankle rings and spiral brass leg and arm rings 6 inches and 8 inches wide are worn by some of the women (Atonga).

M 501 Bracelets cut from the nail of the elephant's foot are worn by Awemba women, and little finger rings cut from the ends of the ant-eater are worn as medicine against fever by headmen.

Bulbs made of wound copper wire are worn round the waists by Wankonde.

M 502 The use of pigments applied to the body is very limited. I have seen stripes of clown, white and red, on the faces of young women, boys and dancers, generally after some ceremony. The significance I do not know. Pigments are now obtained from Indian traders, and I do not know how old the custom is. There is no beautification of face, body, nails, and eyes by pigments. The only application made to the skin is castor and ground-nut oils to keep it soft—no scents are used.

CLOTHING.

M 291 Among tribes of Nyasaland the amount of clothing worn varies very considerably from nothing to European garments.

M 291 [856] Of the large majority, however, including Mabaja people, Yao and Angoni, one may speak generally.

The young children commonly run about naked, or have a strip of cloth covering the pudenda, supported by a string round the waist.

M 291 [856] Among the adult population the amount of clothing depends largely on the affluence of the individual, and those who cannot afford much have little clothing. A man wears a strip of calico supported in front and behind by a string round the waist, a woman a piece of calico 18 inches wide reaching from the middle of the thighs to the ankles.

Of the more prosperous, the men wear calico from a little below the knee to the waist, carefully wrapped round the body, and kept in position by some kind of belt; sometimes it is folded across the upper part of the chest or sometimes crossed over in front and two ends tied behind the neck.

3:Stanage D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

or a girl who has just returned from Chipute must not touch the child, as it is said, "Her body is hot and would give fever to the child." To guard against such a happening, some "clean" woman, after handing some beads to the mother, will ask to be allowed to take the infant. This indicates that should it sicken, the beads will pay the medicine-woman who comes to cure it. The mother and baby are simply washed in water and are not treated with medicine, unless menstruation has been voided before the child was delivered.[1] If the infant dies before it is presented to the outside world, it is disposed of in the same way as a stillborn child, i.e. buried in the ash-heap. About the tenth day, the baby is adorned with a girdle of beads and two little pieces of stick obtained from a medicine-woman to make the infant grow fat.

The length of time during which the father and mother refrain from cohabitation after the birth of a baby varies greatly according to circumstances. Four months is probably a minimum, while two years, during which the woman suckles the child, is the common interval. After the first cotton, the man and woman wash themselves and the baby is bathed in the same water to prevent any ill coming to it.

Suckling often continues much longer than two years. If the mother dies, the child may be suckled by the grandmother, an aunt, or some other woman, but the breasts must first be treated with medicine or the child would die

A child born breech first is called mdwapa, a word which is also used to denote a variety of domestic fowl which always has the appearance of having its feathers ruffled. A child who dies before the father and mother have resumed sexual relations is buried in a grave-yard apart from that of adults. The grave, dug with sticks, not hoes, is very shallow, and when it is filled in, a heap of stones is made above it. Only women attend the burial. A deep grave would cause the mother to go on losing children at an early age. The body of such a child is called Ntemo, "hyaena."

A woman dying unbelieved is placed in the grave in the usual way and then, before filling in the earth, one of the grave-diggers descends into the pit, cuts through the enveloping shroud, and incises the abdomen. One end of a long bamboo stick or reed is inserted in the incision and the other end is brought out to the surface of the grave. If this were not done, "many would die in childbirth."

Twins are not killed by the Yao but are well treated and always cared for equally. They are given similar clothing and food.[2] There is a story that the mother of Mwambwa,

[1] Chinyanja, vide infra, p. 266.

[2] Cf. A. Werner, "Among the Congo Cannibals, by John H. Weeks, London, 1913, a review," (Man, vol. 14, no. 10, 1914, p. 18).

I take this opportunity of referring to Miss Werner's notice in which, speaking of twins, she says, "They are always among the Anyanja given the names Mapali and Nyamo." Mapali is Chinyanja either in a kind of musical instrument and the Chiyao meaning is "measured pulse." Nyamo is a Chiyao word which certainly means "the body." It is sometimes used of the second born twin but does not occur in Chinyanja. I have never heard of twins either among the Wayao or the Anyanja spoken of by their names. A mother carries the first born on the right arm and the second born on the left, but, as far as I know, she does not give a duplicate greeting nor make a habit of suckling equally with both breasts.

3:Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 ??? Yao ???

After the defeat of Kumtanje, Chibusi and his Angoni routed Kumtumanje, a brother of Malemya, who had also been making a nuisance of himself. Kumtumanje, who suffered from a large hydrocele, is supposed to have lost his balance on account of this impediment, and fallen into a stream where he had stopped to drink and to have been drowned. 175 167 648

The Angoni still burned for more warfare, and Malemya, fearing that with his work done, they might prove a nuisance to him, turned them on to the Amangwabe Yao around Phwetyre. Thither they set off on a raiding expedition and returned to their own country via Chiwindule. This raid took place in 1904.

During the next few years, Kawinga, who had always held a grudge against Malemya for having got ahead of him to the best country, occupied the chief with raiding and warfare. In 1909, Wandalama died, and was succeeded by Chimala, the son of his sister, Chingowo, and at the present time, he is the reigning Malemya.

It is of these Amachinga Yao under Malemya that the following notes are written. I have gone at some length into the history of these people in order to discount criticism by those who, familiar with other sections of the Wayao, may not agree with all my statements.

Life History. Generally speaking, the life of the Yao native in the old days was full of 181 more spiced with the excitement of intertribal warfare. He cultivated his crops, kept a few goats and chickens, and relieved the monotony by hunting. Even domestic slavery was not a great hardship, nor did the Yao probably suffer from coast slave-raiding to the same extent as many other tribes. As children, they are want to spend their days free from care, seldom reprimanded, and rarely or never physically chastised. During youth, the more 897 easy lot is theirs, with the addition from time to time of a few small tasks; minor household duties for the girls, such as drawing water, sweeping the hut, and "minding" the baby, while the boys low or bleat and carry for their fellows in the village or in the bush. Left to their own devices, they play games,[1] dig out rats' nests, or shoot birds with bows and arrows.

Now, as formerly, when they are about five years old, the girls usually go to live with their grandmother who may then have a number of children around her; or several girls of a somewhat more advanced age may sleep together in a hut dormitory. Boys of this age all live in a big hut called ngombe ja chachenda, "the boys' dormitory." This is their quarters until one by one they leave to get married. The girl, similarly, remains in the girls' dormitory or with her grandmother until she is taken in marriage.

Puberty. The first interruption of this placid life of youth is the coast of puberty or the 681 first initiation ceremonies.[2] Formerly, these ceremonies took place after puberty but of late years, as is pointed out elsewhere, they are performed much earlier.

Child betrothal. Betrothal in childhood or before birth is not uncommon. A woman 584 learning that some friend of hers is pregnant will arrange that if a girl is born, her son will marry the friend's daughter, or a man taking a fancy to a little girl will adopt her as his called bowy; mokowe or mawkowe, the words given by Dr. Sandeman, are not known to the Tao in this district. There is a simple game played among the Anyanja children and therefore called ukowe (ukilidak or for children), but the common game played in more difficult as shown by Dr. Sandeman. Mikowbow is being partly displaced by a Swahili variety called bao, or ohwa by the Tao, ohwa (Pl. IV, fig. 4). I may here also point out that the words mowe and mala, which Dr. Sandeman uses for the Manyanja and Angoni varieties of the game, are often replaced by ochwa and bao.

[1] This latter, p. 187. [2] This latter, p. 188.

3: Sudanese D-5 (no. 1912) 1932 F77 Tao F77

Tao children play at keeping house in little grass structures, made near the village or in the fields, while their parents work. Children who can only toddle may be seen practising dancing the steps of their elders. The boys play with miniature bows and arrows made of a kind of grass, mwa, and make a toy dart-tube, uti (Pl. XXII, fig. 3). Little dug-out canoes eighteen inches long are made for them to sail in pools.

Among the lads in a village, games of fighting are much indulged in; two sides are opposed and their weapons are of various kinds. Sometimes each is armed with a length of bamboo, into the hollow end of which seed and pebbles are put, representing powder and shot. This end of the bamboo is then rapidly swung in the direction of the "enemy" and will discharge the seed and pebbles into the face of the opponent. This is called uti ja mwanje ("gun for seed"). The boys are sometimes armed with cane ochwa for throwing at each other.

Chiwere is another form of fighting. Armed with a collection of small stones, each flicks his stone at the enemy with very good aim, using the fore-finger of the right hand to propel the stone, the index of the left hand acting as trigger and the left thumb as the spring. The name comes from wu the sound of the whizzing stone as it goes through the air.

In a pool opposing sides fight with rudimentary syringes made of bamboo, driving streams of water into each other's faces. This is called ipuwu, from the sound of the stream of water, or uti ja mwai ("gun for water"). In the water they also play chiwinjichinga, (ku-twinjichinga, to press down). Boys are ranged on two sides; each tries to "collar" one of the opposing side and put him down into the water, holding him down between his legs. An old water trick is for a boy to go down to the bottom and there squat with his face turned upwards, the mouth stretched wide open by the fingers; viewed from the surface the face looked flat and very grotesque. There is also diving for coins, ukiwelile (ku-wielile, to dive for).

A kind of skipping, called ukiwuwu, from wu! wu! the sound of the rope as it goes round in the air, is a great favorite. A rope with a heavy rope about fifteen feet long, with a handle of grass at the free end enclosing a lump of heavy wood or stone, swings it round and round his head. The faster it goes, the higher it will fly out, while the boys in turn run in and jump over it. Sometimes a boy is caught by the rope and gets a nasty blow, occasionally resulting in a broken limb.

3:Stanzas D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

Taking advantage of the natural inquisitiveness of youth, a favorite trick for making money is for a man to appear in a village making pretence of having a peep-show, something contained in a covered basket or in a cloth. On payment of some small amount, the youth is allowed to peep in, maybe only to see a dead mouse; finding he had been "done," he of course bursts out laughing and, anxious that all his companions should also be "done," he does not "give it away" and so the peep-show man makes quite a good living.

857 673 543

Yao girls play with dolls of two kinds, lilele, made from little gourd-like fruits called lilenge, and others called mwanaka, "a child," made from maize cobs. These dolls they carry about on their backs as mothers do their children. Lilele is made of three of these little spherical fruits glued together with beeswax; on the one which represents the head, seed, red and blue, of the ulengwipe tree are mounted in rows to represent hair, and often beads, as in the nakaka method of hair-dressing. One sees similar dolls made for the children of other tribes. Thus, among Mandowe's Angoni, a doll called mwana, "a child," is made in a dumb-bell form of two small spherical gourds joined by a bundle of sticks bound together with string and wax; on the head-piece string is mounted to represent hair. Their children also play with little clay images of cattle and men, a custom they have preserved from their old Zulu ancestors but foreign to the Yao. The Ankonde children have carved wooden dolls not seen in any other tribe. M'ananda is made from a maize-cob by shredding the papery coverings of the cob; on these shreds are threaded white and red varieties of maize to represent heads, or the shreds are plaited into a number of tags to represent hair.

857 524

Latterly, the children have taken to making hoops and show considerable skill in driving them with a piece of bent reed (Pl. XXII, fig. 8), while the older boys make two-wheeled representations of bicycles with a very clever imitation of all the parts of the machine.

[77]

The whipping-top, wanyalye or wanyanye (nyali, Chin.), is found among the boys' toys. It is made of a conical piece of wood with a flat top and no metal peg. It is started spinning by pulling off the string wound round the top. The whip consists of a piece of string fastened to the end of a stick. Sometimes tops of large size are used, and two boys whip them from opposite sides (Pl. XXII, fig. 6).

A game called ukipate is played by youths; it takes its name from ku-pata, to strike, and refers to the action of striking with a finger the hand in which a bean is guessed to be. A spiral is drawn with the finger in the sand with a central point to represent a village, and a tail-piece prolonged on one side to a second point which represents a show-market on the coast. Along the line, a number of other points are demarcated to represent sleeping places en route. At the village, two white beans are put to represent the two players and with each is a smaller brown bean to represent his slave. At the slave-market are placed a variety of beans to represent trade-goods, cotton, beads, etc. Each of the two players in turn shakes a single bean in his closed hands and then shows the hands, separating them at the

3:Stanner D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Tao FT7

857 527 same time so that the bean is contained in one hand; the other player has to guess in which the bean lies and this he does by striking with the finger the hand in which he imagines the bean to be. If the striker guesses correctly, he moves his stick and his skew to the first sowing-place. It is then his turn to hide the bean. So it goes on till one or the other arrives at the skew-market. Here he factors his skew for trade-goods and returns in the same way; whoever gets home first wins, and the loser is said "to have died on the road," a not uncommon event in the old days. It is interesting to note that cheating is sometimes attempted [788] by palming beans between the fingers, so that in the hand guessed, the bean is palmed between the fingers, and, in the other hand, a bean is released from between the fingers into the palm.

526 Njenje (native, Chin.): a kind of ninepins, which takes its name from the object which is thrown to knock down the ninepins. The game is played by youths and men, equal numbers sitting in two parallel rows fronting each other on the ground, the two rows composed of a dozen or more persons, a few yards apart. Each person has set up in front of him on the ground a maize cob from which the grain has been stripped, or each may have a number of them, perhaps six. In the former case, the cobs are perhaps two feet apart, in the latter only a few inches. Each player is provided with several njenje, from six to twenty-four in number. The njenje is a piece from the side of a gourd, slightly concave-convex and circular in plan, with the edge often cut into serrations. A piece of cord is fixed through a hole in the centre, projecting an inch or an inch and a half from the convex surface, thus forming a kind of tentorium, two or three inches in diameter (Pl. XXXI, fig. 9). It is held between the thumb and second finger by the foot-piece; by a sharp movement of the fingers, it can be spun out of the hand and, at the same time, jerked forward by another sharp movement at the wrist. At a given signal, the players on both sides start launching forth their little tops which spin away towards the maize cobs of the opposing side, the object being to knock them down. When there are many on a side, each with a number of cobs, many fall with the first onslaught, but as fewer and fewer remain, it becomes more difficult, and players try to show their skill by aiming at the cobs farthest away from them, along the opposite line. The game goes on till only one cob is left standing; then, if a player of the opposite side knocks it down, he puts one of his own up again, and the side which had the one remaining puts one up, and so the game may go on. When they are tired of playing, they say, "Kawale hwaqa," "We must finish the game," literally "Come on, we must swell."[1] A knife is then stuck in the ground on either side, the blade pointing to the opposite side, and each man, when he has hit the knife of the opposing side with his njenje, is considered to have shown his skill, and goes off. The last man remaining is laughed at as being a fool at the game. If a beginner is playing, he makes sure of having his try first, so that he will not be left in to the last. The game has a great fascination for the natives and it is said of Malenya, the uncle of the present chief (1922), that he was so unfamiliarize a player that if anyone wanted to make a joke at his expense, he would swap his fingers, imitating the action of throwing the njuga.

[1] Vide supra, p. 297.

526

Chipulupulu: a Mang'anja game now played by the Yao which takes its name from Sapulupulu, to scratch as a fowl does looking for food. The words used in the game are all Chinyanja. A number of beans, perhaps twenty, are put down in a row at intervals on the ground. One player manipulates the beans, while the other has his back turned so that he cannot see. The first player calls, "Chipulupulu chipulupulu!" the second answers, "Mawu Mwapa (child of a guinea-fowl)." The first then says "Kwapa apa! (What about here?)", pointing to the first bean; the second player answers "Pakuti! (Pick it up!)." At the second round, the first player having picked up the first bean, points to the place where it was and repeats his cry, but at the words, "Kwapa apa," the second player has to say, "Palibe! (There is none!)." Then he comes to the second bean and says, "Kwapa apa" and the second player, knowing that he has come to the second bean, answers, "Pakuti!" When three, four, or five beans have been picked up, the first player asks three, four, or five times, "Kwapa apa?" and the second player to each question should answer, "Palibe!" and then, when the first player points to a bean and not to a blank, the second player should know that he has come to a bean and answer, "Pakuti!" instead of "Palibe!" When played quickly, it is not altogether easy to answer correctly, as the end of the line of beans is approached.

Chipuzo cha swapulo (to strike with the hand) is played with four pebbles or beans. Starting with two in each hand, the fists are closed and then making similar movements of throwing from each hand, two are thrown from one hand, or one from each as the case may be, as a sleight-of-hand. One of the two thrown on the ground is then taken up in each hand, and the guesser has to say in which the three are. This he follows by striking the hand with one of his fingers. This game has many variations.

Chisimisimi: a game of jumping from a big cook over a fire. Before jumping, the boys sing, "Chisimisimi chisimisimi ada!" 857 524 526

Chindumudumu (to-tem, to pinch): each of a number of boys loosely pinches hold of the skin of the back of the hand of his neighbor, one hand above the other. They then sing:

"Chindumudumu chindumudumu, mikhala!"
"Pinch Pinch, not number!"

At the word mikhala, everyone should break away while digging his nails into the hand beneath his. Some one of them is sure to have had his attention distracted and forget to pinch hard, while he himself receives a pinch hard enough to make him jump.

Running cross, each boy learns a note: — "ma . . . ra," each one in a different key. Anyone changing his note is disqualified.

Ipuwe: a number of stems of a reedlike grass with long joints, or small rubber sticks are bound together by their upper ends. The free ends are bowed in a fire, then hanged down 524 857

3:Swanson D-5 [illegible] 1912] 1922 FT7 Too FT7

[S24 S5] on a stone. They explode with a noise like the sound of a gun. The boys send them off, one after the other, imitating fighting, or sometimes bang them down on some one's head. They go off, making the sound tpwee!

Small boys or girls among themselves play a clapping game called ppyplin. One sings:

[S34] "Ppyplin ppyplin, ppyplin ppyplin, ppyplin ppyplin, fumpere nomo!/a po ekinge po' mmi!
"Bang stamp stamp stamp stamp stamp the one who has passed movement the at the door at his mother's.

Ekpende, hanu, hanili!" etc., let him clap once, twice!" etc.

They all clap together at the word "once," "twice," and so on. No one knows how many times they are going to be called on to clap, and action one is sure to clap when no word is given and so is caught and made fun of, so the one who has misbehaved.

[S34 A10] Ldrumie (lu-dumie, to clap): simple clapping when pleased with anything is commonly indulged in, mostly by women and girls.

Little girls play at making little pots. This is called pombiniyin, (lu-pombe ekinge, to model a pot). They also play at pounding grain, called ekindubi, "learning to keep time," the word itself being an imitation of the sounds. Five or six pound in one mortar; in between strokes, they throw the wooden pestles up in the air, catching them again in time.

[S37] "Ankyindube hatuli pa' ego-mmoni po ekolopa!"
"The one who opens little mortar that that one which is bewitching!"

This is the song of a game played by little girls. One sits in the middle with a stopper on her head, to represent a grain mortar, while the others form a ring round her holding hands. As they sing, the circle at one point swings in, and one of the girls passes in front of the one sitting down, her back to her all the time, the hands passing over her head. This they do one after the other very quickly and anyone who touches the girl in the middle, "who knocks down the mortar," takes the place of the girl in the middle.

[S38] "Ammomoyo Ammomoyo ejokoni mbo!"
"Our wives, our wives, setting off (interjection)!"

is the song of a game played by a lot of boys together or a lot of girls together; they do not join with one another. Two opposing groups are formed of equal numbers. Each is led by one of the older children and behind him is the rest of the group, each holding on to the cloth of the one in front. The followers of each leader represent his wives. The two parties then sing and maneuver for the leader to get at the tail of the other group and "collar" a wife or two from his opponent. It becomes very exciting. As they go faster and faster, some of the tail may get swung off and captured by the other side before they can again join their own.

Sc Stanner D-5 (ca. 1912) 1932 FT7 Yao FT7

Trapping and catching of animals is pursued with great glee by small boys. They make many of the traps, particularly the two kinds of lilim, chiputo, chijumbo, chinum, limwa, and ngwa. Lilim is set in rat runs and the rats are driven into them (Pl. XX, fig. 6). Digging-out rats is a favorite amusement for the boys and brings meat to the pot. May is the best month for this sport. They are adepts at recognizing burrows which have rats inside. Digging is commenced at one entry to the rat-warren, the escape holes being closed with tufts of grass. As they get nearer the rat chambers, they smell the earth and so know when they are quite close to the rats. A bunch of grass is then put in this hole, lighted, and kept alight by blowing on it. One of the rats will try to bolt and is knocked on the head. He head is then squashed to kill him effectually, and the skin of the tail of the first rat is always pulled off for luck, "so that they may catch many." They will try to guess how many there are going to be, "two and ten and five and two!" Each rat when caught is buried under some earth, so that the hawks will not swoop down and carry it off. When they have finished one warren, one of the party is appointed to carry all the rats. He ties a string round his waist, and the rats are slipped underneath it and so secured. They then go on to another; the carrier will bear the whole catch for the day and may, before they have finished, have several strings of rats round his body, one above the other.

Digging-out crabs, ku-kupa napolo, is another favorite amusement for children; (ku-kupa is to dig up anything like mud which makes a squelching sound). Crabs are never eaten with flour, but always with nsunsi, the grain kunka, "crabs and brown-bread!"

Youths and girls fish with a rod, line, wire hook, and worm, ku-kupaya ansebu, to pull up fish. They also catch fish, using the fish poison, ntuta. Birds are killed with a bow and a blunt-pointed wooden arrow.

A small boy, seeing a girl or a younger boy with a cob of maize and wanting it himself, will say, "Let me make a path to the coast!" He will then remove, say a couple of rows of maize grains for himself, much to the interest of the owner; or "Let me make dimbo" (dimbo is a shaved head on the scalp), or "Let me make the crab's eyes!" when two solitary grains are left, surrounded by a simple ring of other grains, as the girl's portion.

Children are taught a little saying about their fingers which reminds one of the "This little pig went to market" of one's infancy. Starting with the little finger, they say:

> "Alabu kangalabu kangalabu!"
> "This little one (is) the one which cannot draw water!"

Pointing to the ring finger,

> "Kandulapuse ujunguwalu!"
> "This little one's brother (is) the one that picks the nuts!"

To the middle finger,

> "Ujunguwalu uwulu uwulu!"
> "(The brother of) the one that picks the nuts (is) the one who finishes nuts!"

3:Stanner D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

857 To the index:

524 "Lukungulu lwa ng'ombe lwa lumodilo mwilumbu!"

539 "(This one is) the leg of an ox which walks on the plain!"

To the thumb:

"Chimwene"

"The 5th"

857 Cat's Cradles are known as shingwe, "the spider's web" (Pl. XXIII). The position 524 of the string on the hands is as in Position I of Miss Haddon's book and this is followed by Opening A, given by the same author.[1] (Pl. XXIII, figs. 1, 2.) Three methods of arriving at the same figure, which is called "the net," are shown here (Pl. XXIII). Variety C is followed by the making of a knot, figured in C 13, known as "the child." There are probably a number of other forms made by natives, but these, which I saw one of my women patients make, will serve as an example.

534 Musical Instruments. The number of instruments proper to the Yao appears to be small, indeed probably only two in number, the mangulungulu and the shitepe, with perhaps the three holed flute, shitolo.

The former is constructed on the principle of a xylophone; it consists of two trunks of banana trees laid on the ground and held in position by stakes. They are not quite parallel but approach each other somewhat at one end, being from one to two feet apart; on these rest cross-wise a number of pieces of wood of varying thickness and length, kept in position by pegs driven into the banana trunks on each side of each billet. These are struck with sticks by a single player, or by two persons sitting on opposite sides of the instrument. Another variety is found in which the pieces of wood, which may have holes bored in them to effect differences in sound, are arranged over a hole scooped in the ground (Pl. V, fig. 1).

The shitepe consists of a piece of plank hollowed out to form a resonator on which are fixed a number of keys of bamboo or metal of different lengths. These are arranged across a bridge, and the free ends are set in vibration by twanging with the fingers.

[177] The instrument now most commonly seen is the ezee which was introduced, I think, from the coast about 1890 to 1900. It is a type of guitar.

An instrument played by women — and this again is of recent introduction among the Yao — is the mkungulu, which consists simply of a stick of wood about a yard long to which is affixed a single string. One end is held between the teeth, the other in the hand; it is twanged by being struck with the thumb and finger of the other hand close to the mouth, which is opened to different degrees, and gives a variety of notes resembling those of a jews' harp.

The ching'wengong'wengo and drums are referred to under Dancing.

[1] Kathleen Haddon, Cat's cradles from many lands, New York, 1931.

3:Sierra D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Tao FT7

535 steps are accompanied by movements of the shoulders which form the feature of the dance. Performers may go into the middle and do ku-pumila (see mbende).

Mbende resembles njende; it is an old dance not seen now.

Chihende is a dance for youths, the characteristic feature being that, at intervals, they squat down on their heels and spin round very fast, with frog-like movements (Pl. III, fig. 1).

Mbende is a favorite dance for men and women; drums, likuti, ndingiya, mukwa, chimisinga, and several lingoles. The dancers commence by going round in a circle, and then, facing the drums, they all continue their steps without moving from their places, while a few go out into the circle and dance in the open space about the drums. Two men go out from one side and are met by two women from the other side. Men love to carry their knives in their hands on these occasions, preferably the large knife with an ivory handle called mwaja; a man would go miles to borrow such a knife from a friend, for the dance. The women often carry rattles in their hands. After dancing in the middle for a time, they will severally withdraw to the circle, to be followed by others. A man dancing out into the middle, may go up to any woman in the circle or among the onlookers, and by touching her on the shoulder with his knife, invite her to come out and dance. In the middle of the ring, he may embrace her, after which each retires to his place. To make this embrace is called ku-pumila; the man folds the woman to his breast. It is very gently done with a certain air of gallantry, and there was formerly no objectionable element in it. A man does not extend this embrace to his wife or to any near relatives. Ku-pumila occurs in other dances: chihende, chikwa, mlonjoso, njende, mbumbu, mumwabula, chibilo, lishipi, and lipepe, and in ndwa.

Chikwa: the drums used are chimisinga and mukwa. It is danced by young men and women; as in other dances, a ring is formed, the men on one side, the women on the other. The song is usually started by two men on one side and answered by two women on the opposite side. When the song is well under way, the drums are signalled and all start dancing in a circle. Movement in all dances is counter-clockwise. After circling round, the dancers come to a stand-still, while men and women go out into the middle and dance a kind of quick heel-and-toe step, followed by ku-pumila.

535 In the intervals of dancing, the girls and boys often play at ndwa. They may stand or 857 sit in a ring. One of the boys standing in the middle sings, "Ndwa ndwa, ndwa ndwa, ndwa!" with an accompaniment of clapping by the ring of youths, but no drums. He then goes up to any girl sitting in the ring and asks her whom she wants; she names some one who is then called out, and the girl and boy dance up and down together, embrace (ku-pumila), and return to their places. Another girl is then asked. Sometimes the girls will take up the song, and ask the boys to choose. It is like a kind of "kiss in the ring."

There is another kind of dance for boys and girls. They are arranged in rows opposite one another, some paces apart. The boys grasp a long pole and bending forward, dance up to the row of girls, singing, "Anambwela ndawaka!" ndwala, "Mapendwa!" (be-pende, to give). Leaving the pole at the girls' feet, they retreat, after which the girls take it up and advance to the boys in the same way.

Sitamma D-5 (on. 1912) 1922 ??? Yao ???

Chilwe is danced rather like ndewanda. A group of men dancers go round in a circle, and within this circle may be a line of women dancing to the same time but with rather different steps than the men. This I have seen danced by a trained band of dancers, but ndewanda join in. A man may lead a woman into the middle and embrace her. There is a tendency among these trained dancers to forsake the old time steady embrace for something which is not so unobjectionable.

Lidzipi is a new dance, but one that is well-liked. The drums are as in ndewanda. Men, women, and young people dance in a circle followed by entry into the middle, and be-pende.

Mbende is danced by men on one side and women on the other side of a circle, to drums mdomo, ndinda and mangoko. Any of them may dance out into the middle after going round in a circle.

Lipenga is an old dance for the older men and women. Like ndewanda, the steps are slower and are characterized by side-to-side movements.

Mtokangu: drums, likuli, chingwanga, and a mdomo drum called mbidzi, because it is so played as to give the sound "mbidzi!" It is danced by men in a crowd. While the feet do little, shuffling steps, the buttocks are jerked out backwards and forwards.

Chandamali: a dance of recent introduction resembles ulali.[1]

There are three dances which are danced by special dancers.

Mwejuwa: the same as the ndewanda of the Anyanja,[2] generally danced by four men who wear a kind of kilt made of strips of palm-leaf, and rattles, mawawa, on their legs. They may also wear the lisungu, a headdress made of the tail-feathers, usipa, of the chinyanga bird: it is like a broad hat-brim without a crown, the feathers projecting radially. The ndawala, a piece of a shell which comes from the Zanzibar coast is also often worn (Pl. III, fig. 2). The drums which give the time are chimisinga, played very rapidly indeed. The steps are incredibly fast, with greater excursions than in the other dances, and usually end up with a jump into the air and a pose with grimacing. A circle is formed round them by the young people who, in the intervals, walk round singing and clapping. The dancers may call out any girl for the embrace.

Mwanja: danced by two or three pairs of men who wear the palm-leaf kilt, mawawa, and a broad, bark-cloth belt called chamba. When the drums start, these dancers walk round the circle of onlookers, and get the song going, and the clapping to time; then with a signal to the drummers, they start dancing alternately an extremely rapid dance with rattles in the hands, mawaja, and a kind of dance-do-wrong, chamba. The drums employed are mdomo, mipatipa, and chimisinga. The rapid dancing is too exhausting to last more than a few seconds. This is always danced at Lupanda.

[1] Cf. Sharpe, "Notes on some tribes of British Central Africa," op. cit., p. 204. [2] Ibid.

535
534
341
301

323
415

657
535

[End Plate 3]

G. Stannus D-5 (ca. 1909) 1910 FT7 Yao FT7
Marroi FR4

wrestle thus: each man passes his right arm round his opponent's waist and grips his opponent's left wrist. When one has thrown the other, the victor spits on his hand, dips it in the dust and then smears his victim on the forehead.

The boys practise long jumping. Small boys make miniature bows and arrows, spears, etc., to play with; in their ways and frolics small children resemble European children exactly. Little girls play at dolls—they cut cucumbers into shape and dress them in calico cloth, carrying them on their backs and making pretence to suckle them.

The first words spoken by an infant are ma (amai=mother) and ta (atata=father); at two years mama and tata are words used; a word soon learnt is ndawa "No! I don't want it."

The only setting I ever heard of occurred when my own Marbila men once acted a village scene, in which a woman (a man dressed up) while pounding corn was seized and raped by another man. At the right moment her husband and others rushed in and collared the man, who was condemned to have his head cut off; the execution followed.

Dances.

The following is a list of dances; opposite each is the name of the tribe who dance it:—

1. Chindindo, Yao.
2. Lilomo, Yao.
3. Ulula, Yao.
4. Matowei, Mahanja.
5. Kwapi, Mahanja.
6. Pindamitowe, Mahanja.
7. Mwawo, Mahanja.
8. Kwangwe, Mahanja.
9. Mlando, Mahanja.
10. Chilwi.
11. Pingwa, Mahanja.
12. Nindo, Mahanja.
13. Lilimo, Yao.
14. Njenda, Yao.
15. Sokwa, Yao.
16. Nawaja, Yao.
17. Nkonde, Yao.
18. Chikwada, Yao.
19. Mbwaw, Yao.
20. Mwapwji.
21. Sowji.
22. Chimwiniwini.
23. Mowow, Mahanja and Yao.
24. Mwaf'ombola, Yao.

1. Chindindo.—Danced at the mafwio (mourning ceremony) generally inside the house unless a very large number of people are present.

All sit round and clap while one after the other men and women get up and dance in a rocking motion from one foot to the other, a small drum held against the chest; in former times a large one lying on the ground used also to be used—now two or three, standing on legs, are employed. When danced in the dead man's house, the body lies at one end of the room with the Adambula sitting by it. On one side are the widows, and on the other the dancers, the dance being sometimes started immediately after death, sometimes the following morning and continued for three days.

This dance is also performed at almost any beer drinking.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

contents. Here once again the women, though they may have no boys in the initiation ceremony, are called 'the mothers'. The ritual co-operation of the mothers in the initiation ceremonies is paralleled by that of mothers and sons in political affairs: here sons are in charge of the villages, while their mothers and sisters form the nucleus of the localized kinship group, which in turn is the core of the village.

The ritual importance of the mother is nowhere more clearly seen than in the curse. The Yao believe that a mother may curse her child if he or she is disobedient or otherwise beyond control. Not many mothers do curse their children; the threat to curse seems to be more often used. Informants have told me of some mothers who have cursed their children, and the procedure and the wording of the curse have always been very similar. It is usually not applied to young children who could be punished by other means, but to adults and particularly adolescents. Usually the mother lifts her breast and points the nipple upwards saying, 'If you have never sucked from this breast nothing dreadful will happen to you.' The consequences of this are greatly feared. Where I have been told of curses, each time the child has either died suddenly shortly after the curse, or at least it has gone mad. The curse is vaguely supposed to operate through the ancestor spirits, but I could get no clear statement on how this happens.[1] Whatever the cause, however, the symbolic action of lifting the breast and the dire effects which are supposed to follow from this, indicate the importance of the mother in the lineage.

The Yao attach this sentiment, in general, not only to the mother, but also to all senior matrilineal female relatives. In general speech all female members of the matrilineage in ascending generations are 'mothers', and all members in the descending generations are 'children'. This fundamental relation of mother and child extends throughout the lineage. The Yao term acinangolo, used for the senior female members of the matrilineage, embodies this idea of 'the mothers'. More specifically, as far as men are concerned, the matrilineage is classified into

[1] Further evidence that the ancestor spirits are involved in the curse may be that madness is called masoko—spirits—and that it may be said of a madman that the spirits are beating him (gakumpata masoko). A curse may be revoked by blowing water out of the mouth, an act which is also vaguely connected with the ancestor spirits.

CIRCUMCISION AND INITIATION CEREMONIES.

Y 554 [1909] Circumcision was not practised among Anyanja. Among Amangandu, Mankanja and Yao, the practice was known as Isapango or Isapondo.

Ku-ombola Isapondo:—the prepuce was drawn forward and a stick made on the right side of the median line near the foreskin. An application mixed with oil was applied. At the present time the Mohammedan practice is common. Ku-ombola Jando:—the prepuce is drawn forward through a split piece of bamboo and cut off with a sharp knife.

Circumcision is performed on boys usually at the age of nine to twelve years by a medicine man called Kpolio, an honourable calling, in a hut at the Isapango camp. Both patient and operator stand, unless the former is young, when he sits. The ceremony is witnessed only by the boy's friend. Among Mohammedans clitoridectomy used to be performed by a woman operator (nakompe), but, it is said, was discontinued, on account of the heavy mortality, about seven years ago. At the time of the operation a woman was given medicine to make her vomit all unlawful things she might have eaten.

Y 394 981 Initiation ceremonies (including circumcision) take place at irregular intervals. The chief or headman settles the date at which the Isapango shall be held, generally once a year in July, when there is no work and little else to do. Boys who are considered ready will then take part. The elder brother or a friend of a boy settles whether he is ready for circumcision. The mother then takes a present to the chief. The boys, their friends and the medicine man then depart for the bush, sometimes a couple of miles away from the village. The number may vary from three or four to as many as thirty or forty. In the bush grass huts (ne nanai) are erected for their shelter. Food is brought by the mothers and deposited a little way from the camp, and the friends who have accompanied the boys fetch and carry and act as sentinels to prevent approach of any "outsiders." Six months used to be spent in the bush, now four to eight weeks only, and all the circumcision wounds must be healed by the time of the candidates' return. If a boy die, the mother is not informed, she is allowed to bring food each day; at the end when the return is made enquiring she is told by one of the men.

The exit from the village is accompanied by the friends dancing Tawji or Mawu, the boys in old calico (formerly always in bark cloth) walk and sit down on arrival at the place appointed. Y ● [967] The circumcision is performed the following day; during the time which follows instruction is given them on their duties in after life as men, in good behaviour in their married life, re coitus, eating of food, superstitions regarding salt, etc. When this is all over a message is sent to the village, and the youths, walking quietly dressed in new cloths, are met half-way by the women and girls, who dance and sing; after the return to the village there is Y 551 981 [836] drinking and dancing, the newly initiated refraining for one day. At the present time the youth probably has some "friend" of the opposite sex with whom he sleeps; until he has had coitus he may not eat food into which salt has been put. His

4:Stanner D-5 (ca. 1909) 1910 FT7 Yao FT7
Marau: F24

wrestle thus: each man passes his right arm round his opponent's waist and grips his opponent's left wrist. When one has thrown the other, the victor spits on his hand, dips it in the dust and then smears his victim on the forehead. FT7 Y 524

The boys practise long jumping. Small boys make miniature bows and arrows, spears, etc., to play with; in their ways and frolics small children resemble European children exactly. Little girls play at dolls—they cut cucumbers into shape and dress them in calico cloth, carrying them on their backs and making gestures to suckle them. FT7 Y 557 524

The first words spoken by an infant are ma (amai=mother) and ta (atata=father); at two years mama and tata are words used; a word now learnt is tatata "No! I don't want to." FT7 Y 525 525

The only setting I ever heard of concerned when my own Machila man Jamu acted a village scene, in which a woman (a man dressed up) while pounding corn was seized and raped by another man. At the right moment her husband and others rushed in and collared the man, who was condemned to have his head cut off; the execution followed. FT7 Y 524

Dances.

The following is a list of dances; opposite each is the name of the tribe who dance it:— FT7 Y 535

1. Chindindo, Yao.	13. Lilian, Yao.
2. Likwata, Yao.	14. Njoda, Yao.
3. Ulale, Yao.	15. Sakuse, Yao.
4. Mitowei, Matenje.	16. Nawaje, Yao.
5. Kwaje, Matenje.	17. Nkondo, Yao.
6. Tinkumbiwe, Matenje.	18. Chikondo, Yao.
7. Nkwawe, Matenje.	19. Mkwaw, Yao.
8. Kwamapwe, Matenje.	20. Mangwaji.
9. Mtondo, Matenje.	21. Sonji.
10. Chilwi.	22. Chiwwiniwini.
11. Vinapwe, Matenje.	23. Mawow, Matenje and Yao.
12. Ntale, Matenje.	24. Mong'ombolo, Yao.

1. Chindindo.—Danced at the malele (mourning ceremony) generally inside the house unless a very large number of people are present. Y 555

All sit round and clap while one after the other men and women get up and dance in a rocking motion from one foot to the other, a small drum held against the chest; in former times a large one lying on the ground used also to be used—now two or three, standing on legs, are employed. When danced in the dead man's house, the body lies at one end of the room with the Adondola sitting by it. On one side are the wailers, and on the other the dancers, the dance being sometimes started immediately after death, sometimes the following morning and continued for three days.

This dance is also performed at almost any beer drinking.

1: Tew E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

Birth

Birth takes place in the bush, some distance from the hamlet, in the presence of female relatives of the woman and of her husband. If the child is stillborn, or miscarried, it is buried in the bush. The husband and wife must abstain from sexual intercourse for some months, until a special ritual intercourse is performed. A man who breaks this taboo is liable to contract a fatal disease, bwanaga. Difficult births are attributed to: (a) a curse spoken by a matrilineal relative—this is made effective by the intervention of the ancestors, and to remove it it is necessary to perform a rite making clear that no malice is borne; (b) the adultery of the woman or her husband, in which case confession will save the woman from dying; and (c) sorcery.

If a child is born alive it is brought to the hut of the mother or one of her female relatives, where it is secluded until its naming ceremony, about six days later. Only after the naming is the child considered to be a member of society. A second child should not be born while the first is still suckling, i.e. for about two years. When the child is about four or five months old it is ritually immunized against the dangers of sexual activity, and the parents may resume relations. Elaborate magical precautions are taken to ensure the child's survival. Children sleep with their mother, the boys until they are old enough to go to the boys' dormitory, and the girls until marriage.[1]

Initiation

The yearly initiation ceremonies, unyago, are the principal cultural institution of the Yao. That for the boys, lupanda, is the most important, and may only take place under a chief or superior village headman, whereas a girls' initiation ceremony may take place under an ordinary headman. The right to hold a boys' initiation ceremony therefore becomes a mark of status which is jealously disputed.[2] The right is expressed as 'having a cinda'. A cinda is the small basket in which the special sacrificial flour is carried.

Yao carry out initiation between the ages of seven and eleven, whereas generally in East Africa it is postponed until puberty.[3] In response to requests from the headmen the chief appoints the time and place of the boys' initiation ceremony for a group of villages. It is held at the end of the dry season, before the bush is burned. Each initiate is accompanied by a sponsor, ahamusi, who may be a brother, uncle, or friend. Before they set out for the place appointed to be lupanda, they all assemble before the chief to be anointed with millet-flour specially prepared by his head wife. The word lupanda refers to a forked stick over which the sacrificial flour is poured. This stick is planted at the place of assembly, the mauhase. The boys, their sponsors, and the master of ceremonies, m'mirira, are accompanied with dancing as far as mauhase by their friends. The next day the initiates go to a spot in the bush, where the circumcision (formerly only an incision) is performed, and remain in the bush school, ndagala, for about two months, until the wounds are completely healed. The Yao circumcision rite is said not to have been introduced by the Arabs.[4]

During these weeks the boys are subjected to rigorous discipline and instructed in various skills and tribal lore. They sleep in long dormitory huts, with partitions dividing the boys of different villages from each other. The chief appoints the day for

[1] Warner, 1906, pp. 109–5.
[2] Swanson and Dewey, 1913, p. 119.
[3] Duff, 1905, p. 312.
[4] Livingstone, 1874, p. 81.

1: Tew E-4 (no date) 1950 FT7 Yao FT7

return to the lupanda, where the initiates are welcomed by their friends. An essential part of the ceremony which takes place at this stage is the exhibition of animal shapes made by the m'mizwa, with mounds of earth outlined in flour. These animal shapes differ from lodge to lodge. On the last night before the return to the village the initiates undergo a ceremonial bathing, each boy being carried to the stream by a woman, who thereafter is addressed as 'elder sister'. Finally, with new names, and freshly oiled and decorated, they march to the chief's village to be redeemed by him from the m'mizwa with gifts of cloth. After initiation it is a deadly insult to call a boy by his child-name. All who pass through initiation together consider themselves bound by mutual obligations of hospitality.[1]

Girls' initiation takes place in three stages. First, there is cipoto, the general initiation before puberty, which corresponds to the boys' lupanda. It takes place at the same time of year, and though it lasts for less than a week, its conclusion is celebrated at lupanda jointly with the conclusion of the boys' initiation. A hut is built in the bush, like the long dormitory of the boys, and four days are spent in dancing and singing. Each girl (aged about eight years) is accompanied by a sponsor, a woman friend who continues to be her mentor during subsequent rites, and who assists in giving the girl instruction in her womanly duties. At the end the girls are bathed and anointed, dressed in new clothes, and each is carried to lupanda by her sponsor. Here they prove their skill in dancing and receive gifts from their friends. Ritual deflloration follows the cipoto initiation.[2] Among Mohammedans, clitoridectomy used to be performed by a woman operator, but, it is said, was discontinued in about 1917 on account of the heavy mortality.[3]

After this first general celebration, first pregnancy and first birth are the occasions of separate rites for each girl. According to some informants there were once two ceremonies connected with pregnancy. One, for the young married men whose wives had not yet conceived, used to take place at the same time as cipoto; each man was attended by a woman sponsor not his wife, given good advice, and put through various tests of manhood. Mitchell does not confirm the present existence of this ceremony, but in the old days if a man was betrothed or married to a child going through her cipoto he had to accompany her.

The litiwo ceremony takes place when a young married woman quickens with child for the first time.[4] The woman, with her sponsor and the married women of the neighbourhood, went out in procession for a ceremony of singing and dancing and instruction to the young couple, followed by a feast. Nowadays no men are allowed to attend litiwo. A child born of a woman who had not undergone this rite used to be buried alive; nowadays her anyewe mbumba is charged by the chief.

Finally, six days after the first child is born, its naming ceremony forms a last initiation rite for its mother. The husband is formally led into her hut by her sponsor and the married women of the neighbourhood, and the child is taken out for the first time to the accompaniment of feasting and dancing.

Most Yao men and women act as sponsors of initiates at least once, and all parti-

[1] Sources for boys' initiation: Stannus and Davey, 1913; Werner, 1906, pp. 124-6; Stannus, 4, 1922, pp. 247-63; Henkel, 1935, pp. 19 ff.; Johnston, 1897, p. 409; Weule, 1, 1909, p. 304.
[2] Stannus, 4, 1922, p. 234.
[3] Ibid., 1, 1912, p. 198.
[4] Ibid., 4, 1922, p. 274; Henkel, 1935, p. 23, ulile is ulumbo (belly).

cipate yearly in the great initiation festival for boys and girls. Consequently as they repeat each year the lessons of their own initiation, the ceremonies are the main vehicle of Yao culture.[1]

There are also two Muslim ceremonies:

(i) Jando, the boys' Muslim baptism, which takes about seven days, and is usually worked in with kanda;

(ii) Nsondo, the girls' Muslim baptism, which is the same as jando, but usually quite separate from cipoko. It is important that the wife of a Muslim should have her nsondo so that she knows how to prepare the food properly at Ramadan.

Menstrual and Other Taboos

Menstruation is held to be dangerous. A special mat is used by the woman during this time, and is rolled up and kept during the rest of the cycle. The hut is completely cleansed after menstruation. Intercourse during menses leads to disease of the man. Sexual contact is dangerous to persons at certain other periods: during initiation ceremonies, during mourning, and for babies who have not been through the protective rite. The danger is thought to lie in ndoka, a dread disease characterized by swelling. This may be transmitted by salt in the food. Deaths are often attributed to 'salt'. Much of the significance of the mourning is that medicines are prepared which protect the mourners against the dangers attendant on sexual activity.

Burial Rites

News of a death must be sent to the chief by a messenger carrying a single fowl. The chief gives a present of calico for wrapping the body, and a goat for the burial men. These are called mnilo, neighbours unrelated to the dead, who volunteer for certain duties. They prepare the body for burial and carry it in procession to the graveyard outside the village. No uninitiated person is allowed to see the funeral. All who attend the burial are prohibited from sexual intercourse for one month. After this time the prohibition is lifted by a ceremony of beer drinking and feasting, and on the following day all fires in the village are extinguished, and then relit, and the mourners are shaved. A year later beer is brewed for a final ceremony.

For a period after her husband's death a widow is unclean, and has to be purified by ritual intercourse with a man who is paid. The widow is not allowed to remarry for two or three years. A widower leaves his wife's village, after receiving a parting gift. The widows of ordinary persons are not inherited. If a man has himself a 'name' (rank and social position), he has an heir, who inherits also the wives of his predecessor. But if the heir (the maternal nephew) has married a cross-cousin (mother's brother's daughter) he would not consider the wife's mother as his inherited wife.

Before the burial the dead man's hut used to be destroyed, together with his possessions. Immediately afterwards a consultation is held as to whether retaliatory action against sorcerers is called for. The mnilo's duties include not only the conducting of the burial, but also the subsequent inquiry and the conduct of the second ceremony, the beer drinking, at which they shave the mourners. A man who has

[1] Main sources for girls' initiation: Hechel, 1933, p. 19; Swanson, 1, 1910, pp. 189–7; 4, 1910, pp. 269–79; Swanson and Dewey, 1913; Duff, 1903, pp. 310–13; Abdullah, 1919, pp. 16–17; Macdonald, 1882, vol. 1, pp. 125–30; Werner, 1906, pp. 106–7; Johnston, 1897, p. 410.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

The chief identifies a man who comes to see him in exactly the same way, and the Administration has adopted a similar system, except that it has its own definition of the village. During the initiation ceremonies, the initiands[1] are housed in long grass sheds which are subdivided into sections. Each section or room of the long shed houses the boys or girls from one village. If villages share a burial ground, they have allotted portions where they bury their dead separately. In these and many other ways the village is looked upon by the Yao as a distinct unit in the chiefdom.

The chiefdom in the old days was distinctly a territorial unit and all the villages within that area recognized the superiority of the chief. The boundaries of the old chiefdoms were marked by rivers and hills and fixed after conquest and agreement. They are still well remembered. Modern chiefdoms are defined in their limits partly by Government decree and partly by custom. When Principal Headmen were appointed, the districts under them were demarcated with 'due regard being given to the composition of the Native population'. The traditional areas under the various chiefs, therefore, were recognized by the Administration as districts, so that the districts or their sections almost coincided with the chiefdoms. Some disputes between chiefs over boundaries have occurred from time to time and the Administration has had to arbitrate. For example, the Provincial Commissioner of the Southern Province reported a difference between Liwonde and Kawinga in 1936,[2] but through time these differences have been eliminated.

Traditional and Administrative boundaries do not coincide in a few places, for two reasons. Firstly, the Administration has accepted an obvious and physical boundary in preference to an indistinct and social boundary. It has taken the Domasi River as the boundary between Ntumanje and Mposa, though in fact a few villages under Mbela, Kawinga III's son, live on the south side of the river, and fall for Administrative purposes in Ntumanje's area. Mbela is still very strongly associated with Kawinga in ritual and kinship matters. His dealings with the

[1] I am grateful to Prof. Schapera for suggesting this word for those who are undergoing initiation ceremonies. The parallel is with graduands, i.e. those who are undergoing graduation ceremonies.

[2] Report of the Provincial Commissioner, Southern Province (1936), 20.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

622 robes (a gown not unlike a woman's dressing-gown), wears a
559 bright-coloured turban, and has one or two men walking behind
292 him, he is a rather important village headman. One particular item of clothing in the Kawinga, Liwonde and Nyambi areas, is the scarlet headband which some village headmen may wear. I shall discuss this later in the context of the competition of village headmen for rank.

622 Another external characteristic of rank, which seems to have 559 disappeared with the changing economic structure of Nyasaland, 411 was the carrying of knives (ukwejo) by important village headmen. Previously, status was indicated by the type and size of knife carried in public. The chief usually carried the largest and most ornate. The knife taken from Kawinga on his surrender in Portuguese East Africa was about 18 inches long and had a decorated ivory handle. Smaller knives of similar pattern belonged to his headmen.[1] Nowadays, many young commoners carry knives two or even three feet long, made from the broken blades of motor-car springs.

622 The right of important village headmen to build fences[2] at 559 the back of their huts is also a mark of prestige which seems to 351 have lost its significance. About 50 years ago only important headmen had the right to erect a fence at the back of their huts. [562] This fence, made of tall grass about six feet high, enclosed the grain stores and other food supplies of the household and formed a private compound in which the headman's wife and slaves carried on their daily tasks.[3] It seems likely that private compounds and slavery were positively associated, so that only the important village headmen who had many slaves found it necessary to build fences. All chiefs and most important headmen to-day still erect these fences. [88] Those who hold initiation rights are obliged to build them because, when the initiands return from the seclusion phase of the initiation ceremony, they are supposed to spend one night in the headman's private compound before going back to their villages. But nowadays, minor village headmen and commoners also frequently build these

[1] See f.n. 4, Chap. II, p. 38.

[2] Lutenje, pl. ndenje. The enclosed space or 'compound' is cimbundi. Typical hut compounds are depicted on Plate IX (a) and (b), facing p. 206.

[3] MacDonald suggests that the common term kuyeto for woman is derived from the adverb kuyeto—on the other side (of the fence).

622 554 648 annuity. This recognition publicly announced their superior status, because not all headmen could be Administrative headmen. We do not know exactly how the Administrative headmen were appointed when the Ordinance was introduced. The observable results, however, are that no headman, as far as I am aware, who was of superior status in the indigenous ranking system, is not an Administrative headman to-day. Being an Administrative headman is then in itself an indicator of rank.

622 554 643 415 769 881 Rather more important than this is the right to hold initiation ceremonies. MacDonald says that these rights were held by the chief only, but it is not clear whether the word 'chief' used here refers to the village headmen or the 'chief of the land'. Nowadays, the rights are held by village headmen as well as the chief. The right to hold initiation ceremonies is signified by the possession of a small flat basket (ciselo) in which the oblational flour for the ceremonies is carried. When a chief grants a ciselo or oblational basket to a village headman, what in fact he does is to grant him permission to approach the spirits of his ancestors. The headman uses the basket on three occasions during the initiation ceremonies. First, before the ceremony is announced he pours a little cone of sorghum meal at the root of a special tree in or near the village. This tree is known as the nsolo, or the shrine-tree where all offerings to the ancestors are made. While he works the flour through his fingers to allow it to fall in a cone, he calls on his ancestral spirits and asks them to intercede on his behalf with the spirits of the chief's ancestors. He then formally requests permission to hold the initiation ceremony. This cone is left intact through the night. Should it collapse the interpretation is that the spirits are not willing that the ceremony should take place and it is postponed for some days. Offerings are made until eventually the cone, by remaining intact through the night, indicates that all is propitious for the ceremony to be conducted. The second occasion when the oblational basket is used is when the village headman or chief goes down to the grass sheds where the rites of segregation and aggregation take place. Here he pours flour over a twig and begs the safe conduct of the initiands through this physically and mystically dangerous period. Third, each individual initiand, and his or her mother, is touched on the forehead and forearm with the flour on the evening that the initiands leave for the grass sheds. During the last rite the owner of the oblational basket exacts a payment of threepence or so from each parent. The headman does gain financially from the initiation ceremony, but it would be wrong to imagine that this is the only reason why he should want to have the right to hold it. The competition for the rights, which are limited to a few, is part of the general political process whereby village headmen compete for privileges and advantages over their fellows.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

Village headmen may hold either the boys' or the girls' initiation ceremonies, or both. Sometimes, when they hold both, they delegate the girls' ceremony to a younger brother or some other relative without referring to the chief. For example, Kawinga's clan relative and important retainer, Ngalawanga, had the rights to both initiation ceremonies, and he allowed his perpetual 'son' Isa [1] to hold the girls'. Also in Nyambi area, Majaja, who had both initiation rights, allowed his perpetual 'son' Nantunga to have the girls' ceremony. It is generally conceded that the right to hold the boys' initiation ceremonies is more valuable than the right to hold the girls'. H. L. Duff, writing in 1906, had also noticed this when he wrote:

> The respective ceremonies seem to be considered as on a somewhat different footing, for the boys' inyago can properly be held only at the village and under the patronage of, so to say, the paramount chief of the neighbourhood, whereas the girls' initiation may take place under the auspices of an inferior headman. This distinction is still jealously observed and any breach of the chief's privileges is apt to lead to bitter dispute.[2]

The sanction the chief holds over the headmen in this respect is mystical. A village headman believes that the initiation will be a success (that is, that the initiands will be free from the harm of wild beasts and illness, or the circumcision wounds of the boys will heal quickly and well), only if the approval of the chief's ancestors is obtained. He cannot hold the initiation ceremonies, unless he has obtained the basket from the chief.

Most people still follow tribal initiation customs, but in the extremes of the area in which I worked, religious ideas are bringing about a change. In the north in Jalasi's area where Islam

[1] The first Isa was the son of Ngalawanga and this relationship is preserved by the modern incumbents of the headmanships. See Chap. V, p. 122.

[2] Duff, H. L., Nyasaland under the Foreign Office (London, 1906), 312.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

881 178 795 622 554

is most powerful, there is a tendency for the Islamic initiation ceremony for boys, jandu, and the Islamic initiation ceremony for girls, nsondo, to displace the tribal equivalents, lupanda and ciputu. These Moslem initiations are conducted by Moslem teachers (mwalimu) and are not controlled by the chief. Though it also involves the circumcision of the boys, jandu is very much shorter and the boys are secluded for only a week. Some say it is becoming more popular because it is less expensive for the boys' parents. In Chiwalo's area the two ceremonies are run concurrently. The boys and girls go through the normal segregation rites at the beginning of the ceremony, but an mwalimu circumcises the boys according to Islamic practice. At the aggregation rites at the end of the period of seclusion, the star and crescent appears as one of the symbols along with the whale (namungumi), antelope (mbalapi), leopard (cisuwi), and the other tribal effigies which are shown to the boys. Christianity in the south has had a similar effect. The Missions actively discouraged initiation ceremonies in the past. Many of the people in Mposa's and Malemia's area have dropped the custom, or have integrated prayers and other parts of Christian ritual into the ceremonies, though circumcision is steadfastly retained. The effect of these changes is that the important ritual control the chief had over the ceremony has been undermined, and so the prestige attached to it has also begun to fade in these areas. What I describe about the prestige of village headmen and the rights they have to initiation ceremonies is only partially true, and is falling away daily. The correlation I seek to establish is also disturbed by the fact that among the Nguru there is a slightly different initiation ceremony (cidodoto) for boys. Most Nguru send their boys to the Yao initiations but there are still some who hold their own traditional ceremonies. These are not within the mystical control of the chief so that some Nguru headmen are outside the competition for the initiation rights. I should say, however, that most compete with the Yao for Yao initiation rights so that this factor is not as disturbing as appears at first sight. In addition, village headmen who move into a new area usually must obtain the permission of the chief before they may use the initiation rights they held before coming into the area.

622 554 576

There are other indicators of the general high rank of village headmen. Junior headmen, like commoners, must give a special

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

European-type clothing. In Nyambi area, abutting on Kawinga-Liwonde area in the north, there are 12 Administrative village headmen out of 57 who are entitled to the scarlet headband (21 per cent). For the Kawinga-Liwonde area the percentage is 5·7. An informant explained why a large proportion of headmen in Nyambi area had the right to wear the headband: 'The old Nyambis and the present one do not care. If a man has many huts, and if he says that his uncle had a scarlet headband, then he is given one too.' Even within the Kawinga-Liwonde area there is some variation in the number of headmen who are entitled to the scarlet headband. The following table sets this out.

Chiefdom	Total Admin. Headmen	% Scarlet Headbands
Kawinga	160	3·7
Liwonde	104	4·8
Mposa	30	10·0
Chikweo	48	8·4
Ngokwe	21	14·2
Chamba	61	4·9

Mposa area near Lake Chirwa shows such a high proportion because of the Nyanja ex-chiefs who are entitled to the scarlet headband. Chikweo and Ngokwe on the other hand are the Mpotola chiefs and seem to have taken the same attitude as Nyambi and his predecessors. In contrast to the statement about Nyambi, one Administrative headman in Mposa's area said: 'The chief's scarlet band is good enough for us all. If each had one it would be too gaudy!'

The Struggle for Initiation Rights

Village headmen are generally outside competition for the right to wear the scarlet headband. These rights have been established largely by ancient custom and are almost confined to the Invaders or to those who have had them before they came into the area. The competition for initiation rights, however, goes on steadily. H. L. Duff had noticed this as early as 1906.[1] Newcomers may approach the chief and agitate for the rights,

[1] See p. 81.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

622 554 881 pressing their claims on many grounds. They may stress that they have a large village under them and that they have many children to initiate, and argue that their villages are far away from the nearest headman who has these rights. Or they may use their rank and connection with the chief. If all else fails they may threaten to move to another chiefdom. Punyu threatened to do this.

622 554 881 578 In 1947, Punyu, an Administrative village headman in Chiwalo area, had 43 tax-payers under him and thought that he should have initiation rights. He had come to Chiwalo's in 1933 after the village had split in Chikowi's area near Zomba. He had relatives in Kapaloma's village in Chiwalo's area. He argued with Chiwalo that his uncle had had initiation rights. Chiwalo on the other hand, argued that Punyu village was so close to his own—a matter of under a mile—that he could not consider it. This argument went on for some months. Eventually Punyu told the chief that he was going to leave his area. Chiwalo then recanted to some extent and offered Punyu the permission to use the ciputu basket, that is, the right to conduct girls' initiation ceremonies. Punyu, after consulting his sister, took this and was satisfied.

But the chief is not always cowed by the threat to leave his area. He is sometimes able to draw on his official position to control his headmen. The argument between Makata and Ntimbuka illustrates this very well.

Makata was an Administrative headman of some standing in Chiwalo's area. He had been one of the invading headmen and was entitled to wear the scarlet headband. In 1947, he had 101 tax-payers under him and had been given the right to hold boys' and girls' initiation ceremonies at least 30 years ago. Ntimbuka on the other hand was a comparative newcomer. He came from Kawinga's area in about 1930. He is of Nyanja stock but has adopted the Yao language and customs. His village in 1947 had 23 tax-payers and was about 300 yards from Makata's. Early in 1947, Ntimbuka started quarrelling with Makata about the right to boys' initiation ceremonies. He felt that he ought to have rights as well as Makata. Eventually he told Makata that he would refuse to take the boys to his initiation ceremonies. Seething with discontent Ntimbuka went to complain about Makata to Chiwalo, and told him that he had had an argument with Makata and that he was going to leave the area because of it. Chiwalo called Makata and asked him what the trouble was. Makata told Chiwalo that Ntimbuka was jealous of the basket. Chiwalo then told Ntimbuka that he could not give a sacrifice basket to him because his village was so close to Makata's. Ntimbuka was not satisfied with this and continued agitating. Chiwalo, at last exasperated, threatened Ntimbuka that if he had any more trouble he would send him to Kawinga to be dealt with. Kawinga of course is the Native Authority in the area and holds the power of arresting headmen under Section 12 of the Ordinance. Ntimbuka was duly cowed by this threat and meekly agreed to send his boys to Makata's initiation ceremonies.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

Chiwalo had to support Makata against Ntimbuka. Makata was a powerful headman: he had rank from his descent and a large village under him. Ntimbuka was a Newcomer and he had only a fifth of the followers that Makata had. If it meant losing followers it was better to lose the smaller village. As it was Chiwalo could use the power of the White Administration to keep Ntimbuka within his area and yet keep him subservient.

A Newcomer is unlikely to be given both boys' and girls' initiation rights. He is more likely to be able to get only one of the rights. Table XVI sets out the number of headmen in

TABLE XVI

NUMBERS OF HEADMEN HOLDING BOYS' AND GIRLS' INITIATION RIGHTS AMONG ABORIGINAL, INVADER AND NEWCOMER HEADMEN

Type of Initiation Right	Aborigines	Invaders	Newcomers	Total
Both boys' and girls' init. rights . . .	—	17	14	31
Boys' init. rights only .	1	6	10	17
Girls' init. rights only .	1	12	31	44
No init. rights . . .	16	84	198	298
Total	18	119	253	390*
% Init. holders . .	11·5	29·4	21·7	24·5

Combining Aboriginal and Invader totals.

$n = 3$; $\chi^2 = 6{\cdot}48$; $p = 0{\cdot}09254$.

* Total excludes the 24 headmen who have the right to wear the scarlet headband.

each category who hold initiation ceremonies. While more Invaders have the right to both ceremonies the proportion holding

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

622
554
811

only one is roughly the same.[1] A Newcomer may approach the chief and ask for initiation rights in certain circumstances only. In general, these are that his village is a very large one, that he had the rights in the area from which he has just come, and/or that he is living in so isolated a part that it would be a hardship for his children to go to the nearest other headman who holds the rights; but he may press his claim if he is related to the chief and can approach him as a kinsman.

There is little doubt that the rights are closely associated with the size of the villages:

TABLE XVIIa

INITIATION RIGHTS AMONG INVADER AND NEWCOMER HEADMEN WHO HAVE VILLAGES WITH MORE AND LESS THAN 60 TAX-PAYERS

(The figures in brackets are percentages)

Type of Init. Right	Over 60		Under 60		Total
	Invader	Newcomer	Invader	Newcomer
Both init. rights . .	10 (32·3)	9 (29·0)	7 (22·6)	5 (16·1)	31 (100·0)
Boys' init. rights only .	2 (12·4)	5 (31·3)	4 (25·0)	5 (31·3)	16 (100·0)
Girls' init. rights only .	2 (4·8)	13 (31·0)	10 (23·8)	17 (40·4)	42 (100·0)*
No init. rights	9 (23·2)	26 (9·3)	75 (26·8)	170 (60·7)	280 (100·0)†
Total . .	23 (6·2)	53 (14·4)	96 (26·0)	197 (53·4)	369 (100·0)

$n = 3$ ‡; $\chi^2 = 53·49$; $p < 0·0001$.

* Excludes 1 village whose size was unknown.
† Excludes 2 villages whose sizes were unknown.
‡ Combining Invader and Newcomer groups.

[1] Invaders with both initiation rights (17 of 119) = 14·3 per cent; Newcomers with both initiation rights (14 of 253) = 5·5 per cent; Diff. of per cent = 8·8; S.E. of diff. = 3·07; C.R. = 2·85; $p = 0·0044$.

Invaders with rights to only one of the initiations (18 of 119) = 15·1 per cent; Newcomers with rights to only one of the initiations (41 of 253) = 16·2 per cent.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

TABLE XVII*b*

INITIATION RIGHTS AMONG INVADER AND NEWCOMER HEADMEN WHO HAVE VILLAGES WITH MORE AND LESS THAN 60 TAX-PAYERS

(Arranged to hold the influence of village size fixed)

Type of Headman	Over 60		Under 60		Total
	Init.	No Init.	Init.	No Init.
Invaders . .	14 (11·8)	9 (7·6)	21 (17·6)	75 (63·0)	119 (100·0)
Newcomers .	27 (10·8)	26 (10·4)	27 (10·8)	170 (68·0)	250 (100·0)
Total . .	41 (11·1)	35 (9·5)	48 (13·0)	245 (66·4)	369 (100·0)

$n = 3$; $\chi^2 = 3{\cdot}96$; $p = 0{\cdot}26667$.

Among all headmen (Table XVII*a*):

19 of 31 headmen who hold both initiation rights have villages with more than 60 tax-payers . . . . . = 61·3%
7 of 16 headmen who hold only the boys' initiation rights have villages with more than 60 tax-payers . . . . . = 43·7%
15 of 42 headmen who hold only the girls' initiation rights have villages of more than 60 tax-payers . . . . . = 35·7%
35 of 280 headmen who hold no initiation rights have villages with more than 60 tax-payers . . . . . = 12·5%

When the influence of village-size is held constant the advantages of Invaders over Newcomers in the competition for initiation rights is discernible, but the differences are so small that they are of doubtful significance (Table XVII*b*).

14 of 23 Invader headmen with villages over 60 tax-payers have initiation rights . . . . . = 60·9%
27 of 53 non-Invader headmen with villages over 60 tax-payers have initiation rights . . . . . = 50·9%
21 of 96 Invader headmen with villages less than 60 tax-payers have initiation rights . . . . . = 21·9%
27 of 197 non-Invader headmen with villages less than 60 tax-payers have initiation rights . . . . . = 13·7%

As we may anticipate, relationship with the chief is an important factor in the competition for initiation rights. Among the chief's direct and clan relatives for example, 36·4 per cent (51 of 140) hold initiation rights, but only 16·8 per cent (39 of

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

622
643
554
881

TABLE XVIII

INITIATION RIGHTS AMONGST INVADER AND NEWCOMER HEADMEN WHO ARE RELATED AND UNRELATED TO THE CHIEF

Type of Initiation Holder	Invader				Newcomer				Total
	D	C	N	T	D	C	N	T
Both init. rights .	5	8	4	17	2	3	9	14	31
Boys' init. rights only	2	2	2	6	1	1	8	10	16
Girls' init. rights only	5	5	2	12	5	12	14	31	43
No init. rights . .	26	25	33	84	13	25	160	198	282
Total	38	40	41	119	21	41	191	253	372
% Init. holders .	31·6	40·0	24·2	29·4	38·1	39·0	19·4	21·7	24·2

D = Direct relatives; C = Clan relatives; N = Non-relatives; T = Sub-totals.

Combining Invader and Newcomer totals.

$n = 6$; $\chi^2 = 22{\cdot}24$; $p = 0{\cdot}00112$.

232) of his non-relatives hold them [1] (Table XVIII). There is a slightly greater proportion of the clan relatives holding initiation rights than direct kinsmen, but the difference is insignificant.[2] Slightly more of the chief's relatives among the Newcomers hold initiation rights than those among the Invaders,[3] but once again the difference is so small that it might easily have arisen by chance. A much greater proportion of Invaders is related to the chief than of Newcomers,[4] so that among the Invaders the relative advantage of their kinship with the chief, as against the unrelated, is somewhat reduced. There are very many Invaders who can claim kinship with the chief in their struggle for initiation rights. Among the Newcomers, conversely, because there

[1] Diff. of per cent = 19·6; S.E. of diff. = 4·58; C.R. = 4·28; $p = 0{\cdot}00002$.

[2] Direct relatives (20 of 59) = 33·9 per cent; Clan relatives (31 of 81) = 38·3 per cent; Diff. of per cent = 4·3; S.E. of diff. = 8·2; C.R. = 0·52; $p = 0{\cdot}6030$.

[3] Newcomers (24 of 62) = 38·7 per cent; Invaders (27 of 78) = 34·6 per cent; Diff. of per cent = 4·1; S.E. of diff. = 8·2; C.R. = 0·5; $p = 0{\cdot}6170$.

[4] Excluding those entitled to wear the scarlet headband. Invaders (78 of 119) = 65·6 per cent; Newcomers (62 of 253) = 24·5 per cent.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

622
643
554
881

are so few of the chief's kinsmen among them, to be related to the chief is a distinct advantage in this struggle.

I recorded the origin of the initiation rights of only 38 of the 55 Newcomer headmen who hold these, excluding those who also have the right to wear the scarlet headband. Table XIX sets out these data. We cannot put too much reliance on these

TABLE XIX

THE ORIGIN OF INITIATION RIGHTS OF SOME NEWCOMER HEADMEN

Type of Initiation Right	Given by Chief of present residential chieftaincy	Brought from elsewhere	Total	% Brought in
Both init. rights . .	8	5	13	38
Boys' init. rights only .	9	0	9	0
Girls' init. rights only .	15	1	16	6
Total	32	6	38	16

figures because they cover only about three-quarters of the village headmen in this category, and these, moreover, were not randomly selected. As they stand, the figures support my earlier conclusion that Newcomers are more likely to obtain rights for only one initiation ceremony, than for both together. While 38·5 per cent (5 of 13) of the village headmen who hold both initiation ceremonies had brought in their rights with them from outside, only 4·0 per cent (1 of 25) of those who hold only one of the rights had done so.[1] An analysis of the periods when headmen were given their rights reveals consistent results.

From Table XX we see that:

Of 11 Invaders who hold rights to both initiation ceremonies, recent chiefs granted 3 . . . . . = 27·3%
Of 8 Newcomers who hold rights to both initiation ceremonies, recent chiefs granted 2 . . . . . = 25·0%
Of 12 Invaders who hold rights to only one of the initiation ceremonies, recent chiefs granted 3 . . . . . = 25·0%
Of 24 Newcomers who hold rights to only one of the initiation ceremonies, recent chiefs granted 14 . . . . . = 58·3%

[1] Diff. of per cent = 34·5; S.E. of diff. = 12·47; C.R. = 2·77; p = 0·0056.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

TABLE XX

WHEN INITIATION RIGHTS WERE GRANTED TO NEWCOMERS AND INVADERS

622
643
554
881

Type of Initiation Right	By early Chiefs		By recent Chiefs*		Total
	Invaders	Newcomers	Invaders	Newcomers
Both init. . .	8	6	3	2	19
One init. only .	9	10	3	14	36
Total . . .	17	16	6	16	55

* This is obviously a crude classification. I have taken roughly 35 years as the dividing line. As the early chiefs I have classified all the Kawingas before and including Kawinga V who died in 1913; all the Liwondes before and including Liwonde III who died in 1921; all the Ngokwes before and including Ngokwe IV who died in 1905; all the Mposas before and including Mposa II who died in 1913; and all the Chikweos before and including Chikweo II who died in 1914.

In other words, recent chiefs have been granting single initiation rights to Invaders in the same proportion as they have been granting both rights, but they have been granting Newcomer headmen the right to hold only one ceremony more often than the right to hold both. Of the six sets of rights to initiation ceremonies granted by recent chiefs to Invader headmen, three were rights to hold only one ceremony, while 14 of the 16 initiation rights granted to Newcomer headmen were for one ceremony only.[1]

622
554
881
795
619

Headmen do not make use of their bonds of common religion or tribe with the chief in their competition for initiation rights. Table XXI sets out the numbers of headmen of different religion. There is a substantially smaller proportion of Pagan headmen (9·7 per cent) holding initiation ceremonies than either Christians (25·5 per cent) or Moslems (24·4 per cent).[2] Most Pagans, however, are also Newcomers so that this difference is actually a reflex of the generally lower rank of Newcomers. Table XXII sets out the number of headmen of the chief's tribe and of other

[1] i.e. 50·0 per cent against 87·5 per cent; diff. of per cent = 37·5; S.E. of diff. = 20·08; C.R. = 1·87; p = 0·0614.

[2] Pagans = 9·7 per cent; Others 24·6 per cent; diff of per cent = 14·9; S.E. of diff. = 7·94; C.R. = 1·88; p = 0·0603.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

622
554
881
795
619

TABLE XXI

THE DISTRIBUTION OF INITIATION RIGHTS AMONG HEADMEN OF DIFFERENT RELIGIONS

Type of Initiation Holder	Moslem	Christian	Pagan	Total
Both init. rights . .	25	4	1	30*
Boys' init. rights only .	12	4	—	16
Girls' init. rights only .	31	6	2	39†
No init. rights . . .	211	41	28	280‡
Total	279	55	31	365

$n = 6$; $\chi^2 = 5{\cdot}05$; $p = 0{\cdot}53778$.

* Excludes 1 headman whose religion was unrecorded.
† Excludes 4 headmen whose religion was unrecorded.
‡ Excludes 2 headmen whose religion was unrecorded.

TABLE XXII

THE DISTRIBUTION OF INITIATION RIGHTS AMONG HEADMEN OF THE SAME AND DIFFERENT TRIBE AS THE CHIEF

Type of Initiation Holder	Same Tribe	Different Tribe	Total
Both init. holders	20	11	31
Boys' init. holders only . . .	7	9	16
Girls' init. holders only . . .	23	20	43
No init. rights	156	126	282
Total	206	166	372
% init. holders	24·3	24·1	24·2

$n = 3$; $\chi^2 = 2{\cdot}17$; $p = 0{\cdot}54167$.

tribes who hold initiation rights. Once again the proportion of headmen of the same tribe as the chief who hold initiation rights is the same as that of headmen of different tribes from the chief. We may say, therefore, that membership of tribe is not an operative factor in the granting of initiation rights.[1]

[1] The factors contributing to the granting of initiation rights are obviously all interrelated.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

622 554 881 292 The right to hold initiation ceremonies may be held concurrently with the right to wear a scarlet headband. For purposes of analysis thus far, I have treated the holding of initiation ceremonies separately. By common consensus, the wearing of this headband is an indicator of much greater rank than the holding of initiation ceremonies. The highest ranking headmen, like the chiefs, usually have the right to wear the scarlet headband together with the rights to both initiation ceremonies. In order to show how rank varies among the main categories of village headmen I have devised a numerical

TABLE XXIII

MARKS OF RANK AMONG ADMINISTRATIVE VILLAGE HEADMEN

Type of Headman	With Headband				Without Headband				Total
	Both	Boys only	Girls only	No rights	Both	Boys only	Girls only	No rights
Aborigines:
Direct rel.	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	2	2
Clan rel.	1	—	—	—	—	—	—	1	2
No rel. .	2	—	—	—	—	1	1	13	17
Total .	3	—	—	—	—	1	1	16	21
Invaders:
Direct rel.	8	1	—	—	5	2	5	26	47
Clan rel.	4	—	—	—	8	2	5	25	44
No rel. .	3	—	—	1	4	2	2	33	45
Total .	15	1	—	1	17	6	12	84	136
Newcomers:
Direct rel.	—	—	—	—	2	1	5	13	21
Clan rel.	—	1	1	—	3	1	12	25	43
No rel. .	1	—	—	1	9	8	14	160	193
Total .	1	1	1	1	14	10	31	198	257
Grand total	19	2	1	2	31	17	44	298	414

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

system of ranking. I have assumed that the rarer the mark of rank the higher the rank it indicates. Table XXIII sets out the incidence of marks of rank among the 414 Administrative village headmen for whom I have recorded the data. In all, there were 24 headmen with scarlet headbands, 69 with boys' initiation ceremonies and 95 with girls' initiation ceremonies. I have given the holding of a scarlet headband the value of the reciprocal of the proportion of village headmen who hold that right, i.e. $414/24 = 17{\cdot}3$.

The value of holding a boys' initiation ceremony by the same procedure is: $414/69 = 6{\cdot}0$.

The value of holding a girls' initiation ceremony is: $414/95 = 4{\cdot}4$.

DIAGRAM 3. PARADIGM OF THE POLITICAL STRUCTURE.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

622 The value of holding the various combinations of rights then 554 are these :

Scarlet headband and both initiation ceremonies	= 27·7
881 Scarlet headband and boys' initiation ceremony	= 23·3
292 Scarlet headband and girls' initiation ceremony	= 21·7
Scarlet headband alone	= 17·3
Both initiation ceremonies	= 10·4
Boys' initiation ceremony only	= 6·0
Girls' initiation ceremony only	= 4·4

We may now score the rank of headmen within any particular category by estimating the percentage score from a possible. For example, the score of the rank among Aboriginal headmen would be :

3 × 27·7 = 83·1
1 × 6·0 = 6·0
1 × 4·4 = 4·4
93·5 (expressed as a percentage of 21 × 27·7 = 16·1)

622 Using this method I have set out in Table XXIV the rank
554 scores for headmen in the categories in Table XXIII. Table XXIV shows that on the whole ranking among the Invader

TABLE XXIV

RANK SCORES FOR ADMINISTRATIVE VILLAGE HEADMEN OF DIFFERENT CATEGORIES

Aborigines :
Chief's direct relatives	0
Chief's clan relatives	50·0
Chief's non-relatives	14·0
All Aborigines		16·1
Invaders :
Chief's direct relatives	25·4
Chief's clan relatives	18·7
Chief's non-relatives	13·1
All Invader headmen		19·2
Newcomers :
Chief's direct relatives	8·4
Chief's clan relatives	11·3
Chief's non-relatives	4·6
All Newcomer headmen		6·1
All chief's direct relatives		19·6
All chief's clan relatives		15·8
All chief's non-relatives		6·8

621 making the oblation, pours the beer or sprinkles the flour at the 613 root (lipata) of a shrine-tree. As would be consistent with this 769 way of looking at the lineage, genealogically-distant ancestors are said to be 'below' (pasi), so that if a Yao wishes to say that a certain person was a matrilineal ancestor many generations back, he would say that he was 'very much below'.

The Concept of 'The Mother'

613 The matrilineal descendants of the founder look upon them-
562 selves as having been fed from the same breast and may express 843 this by saying 'we are of one breast'.[1] Deep sentiment is attached to the idea of the mother among the Yao. There is, for example, a sharp distinction drawn between those women who have had children and those who have not. When a woman becomes pregnant for the first time, she is given instruction in child welfare when she undergoes a special ceremony (litiwo). This is a ceremony which is publicly announced and attended by most of her matrilineal and other kinswomen and acquaintances. No woman may attend this ceremony if she has not herself had a baby. Thus her change in status in the community is clearly shown by the public recognition of her condition, and the fact that she is initiated into secrets which are shared by other mothers only. Her position in the lineage is much enhanced when she becomes a mother. It is the most important step towards becoming a village founder herself.

562 The concept of 'the mother', in general, also appears in the 601 boys' initiation ceremonies. Certain phases of ceremonies may 881 be conducted only with the help of the women. They have to clap the rhythm to which the 'tailmen'[2] do their dances. Here all women are classified as 'mothers' and without their co-operation the ceremonies could not be conducted. During the same ceremonies three women appear with baskets of food on their heads. The tailmen remove the baskets and sacralize the

[1] Tuli peŵele pamo. The word mlango, a doorway, is also commonly used. The idea in essence is exactly the same. It is the concept of the children who come to settle around a woman's hut door. It is used as ŵandu pamlango pao, the people of his lineage section.

[2] The m'mchira. These are the functionaries in the initiation ceremonies. They carry medicated zebra tails during these ceremonies, and this gives them their names. See especially Stannus, 'The Wayao of Nyasaland', 229 ff.

2: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1949) 1956 FT7 Yao FT7

contents. Here once again the women, though they may have no boys in the initiation ceremony, are called 'the mothers'. The ritual co-operation of the mothers in the initiation ceremonies is paralleled by that of mothers and sons in political affairs: here sons are in charge of the villages, while their mothers and sisters form the nucleus of the localized kinship group, which in turn is the core of the village. 562 601 881

The ritual importance of the mother is nowhere more clearly seen than in the curse. The Yao believe that a mother may curse her child if he or she is disobedient or otherwise beyond control. Not many mothers do curse their children; the threat to curse seems to be more often used. Informants have told me of some mothers who have cursed their children, and the procedure and the wording of the curse have always been very similar. It is usually not applied to young children who could be punished by other means, but to adults and particularly adolescents. Usually the mother lifts her breast and points the nipple upwards saying, 'If you have never sucked from this breast nothing dreadful will happen to you.' The consequences of this are greatly feared. Where I have been told of curses, each time the child has either died suddenly shortly after the curse, or at least it has gone mad. The curse is vaguely supposed to operate through the ancestor spirits, but I could get no clear statement on how this happens.[1] Whatever the cause, however, the symbolic action of lifting the breast and the dire effects which are supposed to follow from this, indicate the importance of the mother in the lineage. 562 861 789 [769]

The Yao attach this sentiment, in general, not only to the mother, but also to all senior matrilineal female relatives. In general speech all female members of the matrilineage in ascending generations are 'mothers', and all members in the descending generations are 'children'. This fundamental relation of mother and child extends throughout the lineage. The Yao term acinangolo, used for the senior female members of the matrilineage, embodies this idea of 'the mothers'. More specifically, as far as men are concerned, the matrilineage is classified into 562 601

[1] Further evidence that the ancestor spirits are involved in the curse may be that madness is called masoka—spirits—and that it may be said of a madman that the spirits are beating him (gakumputa masoka). A curse may be revoked by blowing water out of the mouth, an act which is also vaguely connected with the ancestor spirits.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

After the defeat of Kumtaja, Chikusi and his Angoni routed Kumtumanja, a brother of Malemya, who had also been making a nuisance of himself. Kumtumanja, who suffered from a large hydrocoele, is supposed to have lost his balance on account of this impediment, and fallen into a stream where he had stopped to drink and to have been drowned. 175 167 648

The Angoni still burned for more warfare, and Malemya, fearing that with his work done, they might prove a nuisance to him, turned them on to the Amangoche Yao around Blantyre. Thither they set off on a raiding expedition and returned to their own country via Chiradzulu. This raid took place in 1884.

During the next few years, Kawinga, who had always held a grudge against Malemya for having got ahead of him to the best country, occupied the chief with raiding and warfare. In 1891, Wandalama died, and was succeeded by Chisala, the son of his sister, Chisigere, and at the present time, he is the reigning Malemya.

It is of these Amachinga Yao under Malemya that the following notes are written. I have gone at some length into the history of these people in order to disarm criticism by those who, familiar with other sections of the Wayao, may not agree with all my statements.

Life History. Generally speaking, the life of the Yao native in the old days was full of ease spiced with the excitement of intertribal warfare. He cultivated his crops, kept a few goats and chickens, and relieved the monotony by hunting. Even domestic slavery was not a great hardship, nor did the Yao probably suffer from coast slave-raiding to the same extent as many other tribes. As children, they are wont to spend their days free from care, seldom reprimanded, and rarely or never physically chastised. During youth, the same easy lot is theirs, with the addition from time to time of a few small tasks; minor household duties for the girls, such as drawing water, sweeping the hut, and "minding" the baby, while the boys hoe or fetch and carry for their fathers in the village or in the bush. Left to their own devices, they play games,[1] dig out rats' nests, or shoot birds with bows and arrows. 181 857

Now, as formerly, when they are about five years old, the girls usually go to live with their grandmother who may thus have a number of children around her; or several girls of a somewhat more advanced age may sleep together in a hut dormitory. Boys of this age all live in a big hut called nyumba ja chachanda, "the boys' dormitory." This is their quarters until one by one they leave to get married. The girl, similarly, remains in the girls' dormitory or with her grandmother until she is taken in marriage.

Puberty. The first interruption of this placid life of youth is the onset of puberty or the first initiation ceremonies.[2] Formerly, these ceremonies took place after puberty but of late years, as is pointed out elsewhere, they are performed much earlier. 881

Child betrothal. Bethrothal in childhood or before birth is not uncommon. A woman learning that some friend of hers is pregnant will arrange that if a girl is born, her son will marry the friend's daughter, or a man taking a fancy to a little girl will select her as his 584

[1] Vide infra, p. 357. [2] Vide infra, p. 348.

584 betrothed. In this latter case, the child lives with one of his wives and is brought up in his house.

● 881 When this girl first menstruates, she tells the man's wife who in turn informs her husband. He then goes out into the bush with his axe, while the wife reports to the young girl's mother and to the man's female relatives. The girl is put to rest on a mat in the hut, the women remaining with her after shutting and fastening the door. The man, meantime, cuts a strip of bark, hammers it out into a piece of cloth, and puts the cloth, wound round and round the stem of the tree from which he has taken it, on the roof of the hut where the girl lies. The first passer-by who notices this sign, spreads the news; then all the women in the village assemble and trill with their tongues to show their joy, while the women in the house sing.

Until the girl's menstrual period is over, the old women relatives sleep each night in her hut, and instruct her in the taboos relating to menstruation. The front door is kept closed, and exit for purposes of nature is made only through the back door. When the girl is up again, the fire in the hut is extinguished, the bark-cloth which she has worn and her sleeping mat are rolled up and put away in the veranda-room, and the girl, having procured clay, replasters the floor of the entire hut. A woman then brings fresh fire from another hut.

841 At subsequent menstrual periods, there is no ceremony. The girl, as is the custom of all women at such times, must sleep on a mat apart from her husband. Sexual intercourse is strictly forbidden under penalty of dire sickness. For the same reason, no menstruating woman may put salt in the food, etc. Until the girl's first menstrual period is over, the man to whom she is betrothed stays in the hut of another wife. Later, he may cohabit with the girl.

881 833 If the girl has not been to her initiation ceremony, Chiputu,[1] on returning to her husband's hut after this ceremony, the first coitus takes place in the veranda. It must be incomplete, so that ejaculation takes place after withdrawal and the semen falls upon her cloth. This should be taken by the girl to some of the old women in the village who report on the proceedings. Should withdrawal not have taken place, the man is considered bad and the girl, unless doctored, may sicken. Later, ordinary cohabitation is allowed. This species of ceremonial coitus is called Kusoa mauta or in Chinyanja, Ku-tapa mafuta, "to roll away the oil," referring to the oil with which the girl was anointed at Chiputu. A girl who has no betrothed, on returning from Chiputu to her grandmother is given medicine similarly to prevent her sickening.

584 Betrothal and marriage in adult life. Apart from child betrothal, when a man seeking a wife, sees a girl he fancies, he talks the matter over with his brother, uncle, or some friend, who then goes and makes overtures to the girl's uncle or brother, her guardian or nponse[2] as he is called. The nponse corresponds very closely to our idea of a god-parent; he may be called the sponsor. The word "surety" is used by Macdonald.[3]

[1] Vide infra, p. 269. [2] Nponse is a word adopted from the Chin, Nhoose.
[3] Macdonald, op. cit., vol. 1, p. 118.

3: Stanzas D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

769 supposed to be the abode of spirits. Except in the case of chiefs, the Wayao never make any erections over their graves, like the Anyanja grass shelters, and the present-day Mohammedan earth imitations of Swahili tombs.

766 Chiefs, and the more important headmen, are usually buried in their own villages. Over the grave, a grass hut with a veranda is erected; the hut is covered with calico, and guns were formerly set in as veranda posts. Guns and ivory used to be buried with the corpse [567] but these Yao, I am told, never practiced the barbarous custom of burying slaves with their chiefs. Information of the death of a chief was always conveyed to other chiefs by slaves who were kept by the recipient of the message.

Since the time of the old Malemya, the corpse of a chief always lies with its head in the direction of the old chief's grave. The grave is swept around, and the house pulled down as in the case of an ordinary man, but the grave-hut is rebuilt every year and never forgotten.

Since the burial of the dead is more or less correlated with the idea of planting seed from which progeny will spring, the natives will not bury a leper, believing that if they did so, leprosy would spring up all around them. Persons dying of an epidemic disease such as small-pox are dealt with in the same way. In these cases and in that of a man dying of ordeal poison, the body is enclosed in a mat and put up in a tree, a manner of disposing of the dead common among the Anguru and some Anyanja. Concerning death from dropsy, similar precautions are taken to those in the instance of a woman dying in childbirth,[1] and a tube is put down to the body from the surface of the ground.

A leper feeling that the end is near, will ask to be put in a hut built outside the limits of the burial ground. Here, provided with water and food for a few days, he will wait to die near the graveyard wherein he knows he cannot be buried.

Anyone who is wounded with a spear or any other weapon is not taken into the village, [752] but is kept in a hut in the bush. If death results, the mourning ceremonies differ somewhat from the ordinary rites and are much curtailed.

881 Initiation Ceremonies. Under this heading I propose to deal with the three ceremonies, Lupanda, Chiputa and Litiwo. They are occasions of great importance in the life of the native and their educative effect for the good of the tribe is far reaching.

At Lupanda (Ndapula) the young boys attend; at Chiputa the young girls go through their initiation and a side ceremony for young married men takes place, while Litiwo celebrates the first quickening with child. All the ceremonies are included in the word Unyago. Macdonald in Africana while referring to "the mysteries"[2] gives scant information about the ceremonies and has, presumably, without much knowledge of what goes on, condemned these customs like many others as furthering "absurd superstitions." He has failed to recognise that they are occasions when a large amount of useful advice is imparted, good manners are insisted on, and tribal custom is made known. Sexual questions are dealt with in these mysteries, and, though mixed up with a large amount of superstition, a

[1] Vide supra, p. 230. [2] Op. cit., vol. 2, ch. 7.

3:Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

code of morals is imparted which is far reaching for the social welfare. Macdonald makes the statement that "when a girl is initiated, she must find some man to be with her on her return; otherwise she will die."[1] Speaking with reserve as to what happened among the Amangoche around Blantyre Mission thirty years ago, I believe that no such practice is or was part of the Machinga Yao ceremonies. I have heard similar stories from other Europeans but I am inclined to discredit the whole idea as a practice among any section of Yao. Of the Anyanja, I cannot speak with the same conviction. Similarly I believe that the practice of artificial dilatation of the vagina is foreign to the Yao though possibly introduced in some places from the Swahili. 881 177 832

At Lupanda and Chiputu, the youth have to undergo a good deal of hardship which is all for their benefit, but year by year, as civilisation progresses, greater numbers forego these ceremonies. Their manners and morals suffer in consequence, and one is forced to acknowledge with the "old people" that the younger generation, decked in European clothes, with an air of smug self-conceit, no longer shows that decorum and self-respect which characterise the older, unsophisticated natives. My experience with regard to the attitude of natives to their initiation ceremonies differs from those related in Africana and I am afraid that Macdonald's native friends[2] were laughing at the inquisitiveness of the white man and not at their own experience. 881 177

In the Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute for 1913,[3] Dr. Davey and I gave a short account of part of the ceremony at Lupanda. Since then, through the friendliness of some of the chiefs in Zomba district, I have been present at several more ceremonies. I have collected a number of fresh observations and made a complete set of sketches of the inpage or images in relief made on the ground at one of these ceremonies. I have also a complete account of the boys' ceremonies from a celebrated master of ceremonies or m'mickila as he is called, named Mlemala (Kumpika) of Che-chamba, in his own words, with his own songs. In writing down the songs, I have simply recorded the words, without giving the many full and partial repeats, and I have never attempted to score down the airs to which they are sung. 881 124

In the account given below I shall follow Mlemala's practice, giving such variations as I myself have observed. It will be understood that each m'mickila has his own way of doing things so that there may be many variations in detail.

Lupanda: Every year, a certain number of boys in a group of villages reach the age at which the ceremony is commonly performed. In response to requests made by the village headmen, the chief appoints a date on which the unyago shall be held; this is usually towards the end of the dry season (September) but before the long grass of the bush has been burnt, as this affords the necessary privacy to those taking part. 881

[1] Op. cit., vol. 2, p. 126. [2] Ibid., p. 130.

[3] H. S. Stannus and J. B. Davey, 'The initiation ceremony for boys among the Yao of Nyasaland', (Jour. Anth. Inst., London, 1913, vol. 43, p. 119–132).

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

●881 The chief, having appointed a day on which the ceremonies shall begin, sends a messenger with a fowl to a medicine-man whom he asks to conduct the ceremonies. The medi-
[791] cine-man is called m'michila "he of the tails." He carries his medicines stuffed in the tail-skin of a gnu or sabra and we shall see that his tail or tails play a very important part. Having sent word back to the chief of his acceptance of the invitation, he gets his wife to prepare some fresh castor-oil with which he will remake his medicines, and sends out the boys of the village to collect firewood. A big bonfire is made and dancing goes on all that night in his village. Early next morning he returns to the door of his hut where his wife hands him his "tails." He then immediately departs for the village of the chief. His wife [201] trills with her tongue, this being the sign of his departure, and dancing men, some friend (often his brother) who acts as his chief assistant, his wife, and others will go with him.

[539] He signals his approach to the chief's village by singing:

"Ku muai'ko ngwian, ngwian'ni! Tinguichal"
"You at the village! I shan't be long!"

As he enters the village, all the women hail his arrival by trilling the tongue (ku-lulula). He goes straight to the open space in front of the chief's house where the chief meets him. The chief immediately goes into his house and producing a cloth, gives it to the m'michila who then places his "tail" on the ground, (ndulila, "things put down"); these are the signs of the compact. A house is given to the m'michila wherein he may rest and sleep.

That night, all the mothers of the boys who are to undergo their initiation, now called usali (sing. musali), pound flour for the morrow. Early the next morning, the m'michila visits the place where the pounding is going on and collects a little flour from each woman's basket into a small basket he himself carries.

The chief then gives him a cock and a hen, an axe and a hoe; with these he goes off accompanied by the fathers of the usali to the spot where Lupanda will be made. Arrived there, he first points out the spot where his own hut is to be erected. This is quickly built, followed by the shelters for the usali.

The cock and hen are then killed and cooked, also some porridge; the entire fowl is cooked; the liver is not cooked separately. When it is ready, the m'michila takes a piece of the liver from the pot and some porridge from the other pot together in one hand and then throws them into a little hole where his "tail" has been resting. At this spot, Lupanda is made. The m'michila then partakes of both again and eats; after he has finished, the other men eat.

[532] After the building of the shelters is finished, fire-wood is collected. On the roofs of the grass shelters figures of animals in grass may be strung up on posts, but they have no definite significance.

In the meantime in the village, the chief has had ulupesi (ceremonial flour) prepared. It is made from millet by his head wife, who must not be near a menstrual period.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

When the sun sets, all the boys to undergo the ceremonies (wali) together with their sponsors or guardians, akamusi, (akamusi sing.) are called together to the village open-space (pang'anga). The akamusi attends his ward throughout the ceremony; he may be an elder brother, an uncle, or someone else who volunteers for the service. 881

The wali are lined up and headed by a "leader," nachilompola, who is usually the most important boy, perhaps a relative of the chief; thus they pass one by one in front of the chief who anoints each on the forehead with mbepesi from a small basket. As each boy passes, his mother runs up and throws into the basket a string of beads or nowadays small silver coins. When all have passed, the chief sends some near relative with the basket still containing some flour and the beads or money to the m'michila who is waiting at Lupanda.

This is his signal to prepare to receive the wali; he dresses, and accompanied by drummers goes to meet the file of wali. The wali accompanied by their akamusi, their mothers and sisters, sing as they approach: 881 539 533

"Twaje kanga (angapa) akakuli tawje!"
"Let us go back, perhaps there is no ceremony!"

The m'michila as he meets them sings:

"Anachichi pakwina nawo wanache'wa kalaka kilumba kwiza nalya!"
"Why to come with them these children to leave (a small drum) to come with it?"

and follows this in answer to the song of the wali with:

"Ku akuli akauja, (Repeat) Kwa kwa! (Chorus) Mkauja wose!"
"To the village don't go back. Don't go back all!"

The wali now on the outskirts of Lupanda are formed into a ring, behind them their akamusi and behind these their mothers and sisters. Then the m'michila leads the way to Lupanda singing:

"Likumba lya ndembu!"
"Spoor of an elephant!"

Next, he calls all the mothers to form in two lines resting at right angles on Lupanda and sings to them:

"Kapungu tala pasi kwin'ani kwanpali alonga!"
"The eagle lighted on the ground as in the air there is not near relationship!"

The m'michila and his chief assistant each provided with a "tail" strike lightly on the basket which each woman has on her head; then each with a hand on the basket, they lift it down to the ground. Starting with the mother of the "leader," they go round to each mother in turn. The m'michila then to the sound of drums and clapping by the women dances and runs round peeping into each basket exclaiming, "I see so and so in this basket!" saying noses, penes, medicine, women's pudenda and so on, after which the women take the baskets of food away to the boys' shelters. The m'michila next sings: 881

881 533 539

"Tinpanzele mwanangu ku Lupanda, pingu uje'pa kundanda mangangu!"
"I will go and bring my child to Lupanda, when I am going home I feel nervous!"

and running round he seizes hold of one of the wali and makes him sit down at Lupanda, continuing this until he has placed them all in a circle round Lupanda. He then sings a song about the little basket which the chief sent him containing the remains of the mbepesi flour:

"Kando ayuwa akwelikiya, nupale mbewanunda, amai!"
"Little basket the owner asks for it back, give me beans, mother!"

His wife who has been waiting in his hut nearby brings him the basket. Holding it in his hands, he prays to the spirits of his ancestors and all the previous medicine-men to whom his medicine-talis have belonged, invoking their aid that the ceremonies may go well.

Still holding the basket he begins to dance, singing:

"Apakula mbepesi jau!"
"Let them (us) smear flour their (Let us baptise them!)" and dipping his right elbow into the basket he smears each mwali on the forehead with the mbepesi flour. He then goes into his hut and fetches a bundle of powdered roots (which no woman may touch), medicine called mibulu, that is, a medicine used for its aphrodisiac properties. Holding the medicine between the palms of his uplifted hands, he starts singing:

"Kukusimonga kuchipopola, kwatunuga nkamu!"
"I cannot find out how to untie this, we tied (with) my brother-in-law!"

He is immediately surrounded by his assistants and the drummers, who dance round him, all holding their hands about his own, after which he unfastens the bundle of medicine and puts a little on the tongue of each mwali, beginning with the leader. He then takes some sweet-beer made by the chief's wife and pouring it into his old medicine-gourd, he mixes in some mibulu and gives some to each mwali to drink after which he sings:

"Amwela,[1] amwela mwanje wa imanga, chakulya mandanda
"You have drunk a mixture of water and maize flour, of eating eggs achileche penepano, Amwela, amwela ndundile nakusu;
you stop now, you have drunk (but) I have passed water (in it);
wali(ji) kalawuka!"
you thought to be clever!"

[302] Next he goes into his hut with the small basket containing the mbepesi and paints his assistant with the flour, a semicircle round the forehead, a line down the middle of the face, a band across the chest, a line down each arm with rings round the arms and forearms, and a line down the middle of the back. They go out again into the ring and while the m'michila sings:

[1] This may be a reference to amwela, the meritorial cup.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

881
533
539

"Nampepe	lendela	chiempe	amwali	ku malembe	kwendela	kwafa!"
"The lizard	casts	lots	boys	to graves	as to going	to die!"

his assistant with the basket held in his mouth acts the part of the nampepe, a medium-sized lizard with brilliant blue body and orange head which bobs its head up and down. The assistant lies on his belly and bobs his head and shoulders up and down, lifting himself on his hands. (Children often clap their hands as they watch the nampepe bobbing up and down "like a lot-caster" and call out to it to cast lots for them.) The assistant than crawls up to the leader and puts the basket on his head. Bowing his face to the ground for a moment, he again takes the basket and places it on the head of the next mwali and so on all around.

After this the wali go and sit near the bonfire which is not yet lighted, while the m'michila sings to the women:

"Ngund(a)	atalacha!	kajacala!"
"The beans!	Let him cook	a cricket."

and the women give him a basket of beans with which he makes sifting movements, singing: "Shall I throw them away, shall I put them in the cooking pot?" while the women clap.

His assistants are then told to go and light the bonfire. He himself goes to his hut and places his "tails" in the mbepesi basket, and carrying it to the bonfire, he throws some of the flour on the fire, "to regulate its heat." This is the sign to begin the dancing which goes on all night while the wali lie round the fire, each lying with his head on the waist of the next, the leader in front.

In the early morning of the second day, the m'michila holding his "tails" in his hands runs astraddle over all the reclining wali and facing the same way, runs back, after which the boys are called.

He sings a song:

"Mandau	(a) 'po	kandumaga!"
"The red ants	those	bite!"

and he pretends to pick them off the boys. After this, he sings:

"Natulumi	kunga	mkakulipuwa!	(mkakulupuwa)!"
"Push	clitoris	little mother!"

as he goes to each mwali and throws his "tail" into the boy's hands, receives it back and then puts it on his head till the mother places a coin on his head which is the payment made to the assistant. Ku-kupuwa = to occur; upakupuwa = not at home; mkakulipuwa = is it not at home, is it not present? The meaning of the phrase in the song is, "Is your mother not here to pay the fee?" Mkakulipuwa is a pun on mkakulupuwa, "little mother." This is followed by another song:

"Kapinda'pua,	upuwa	unuga	mtida!"
"The little lemur,	you	jump from	tree to tree!"

881 as he climbs a tree with his back to the trunk; at the top he hangs by his legs and looks 533 down on the crowd, his assistants doing the same. Coming down he runs to his hut; throw-539 ing his "tail" into the air and catching it again, he enters.

This is about nine A.M.; all rest till about eleven o'clock, the wali meanwhile eating food cooked by their mothers in the shelters. About eleven o'clock, the m'michila takes a big gourd and putting his "tails" into it covered with a calico cloth, gives it to his assistant who carries it on his head and follows him to a pool of water, accompanied by all the women except any young ones who have not borne children. He invites them to go "crab hunting."

At the pool he enters the water with his assistants round him, except the assistant with the gourd, who stands on the bank. The m'michila makes movements as of hunting for crabs in the water singing:

"Chisasangala	ngalili	ngali wanga	wosuma!"
"There must be hunting otherwise I should have had to eat porridge			my without relish!"

He pretends to catch a crab and his hands are immediately grasped by his assistants in the water who all help him to convey it to the gourd as the "tail" is taken out of it.

881 The crowd then returns to Lupanda to enact the nambande ceremony. Nambande is a representation of an animal made of bark on a frame-work covered with mud and painted with flour in spiral markings, hence the name (mbande is a part of a spiral shell from the Zanzibar coast much prised by natives as an ornament). The animal is really the sable antelope with horns and the m'michila's "tails" in place; there is a man inside it. It is made perhaps a mile away and then brought near to Lupanda and placed in a cleared area.

The m'michila on his return from crab-hunting has gone into his hut and put on his full regalia; then, accompanied by his drummers, he comes out and is immediately followed by the wali and the rest of the crowd; knowing where the nambande will be put, he leads the people in the opposite direction calling out to them to look out for the antelope. They, of course, all look in the wrong direction, so when he knows nambande is in place, he wheels around and sings, "There is the animal!"

In the old days the chief was present for this, a platform being built for him. When the nambande appeared, he gave his hunters much powder (no bullets) and they shot at the animal. The animal would fall as if hit and the m'michila would approach to claim it as his beast, but it would promptly get up and charge, to be driven off by the crowd, whereupon it would run away into the bush.

Lots are then cast by the m'michila, using a tortoise shell stuffed with medicine. The wali all stand in a circle with their mothers behind them, while the m'michila goes to the [777] leader and throws the tortoise at the boy's chest. If it sticks there, all is well and he proceeds to each boy. Should the shell not stick on the boy's chest, it portends ill-luck to that individual and he has to be dealt with further. The m'michila, holding his "tail," and his assistant holding a horn of medicine, stand back to back, with the boy between them. They then rub the boy up and down with their backs, after which the assistant throws the horn at the boy's chest. If it sticks, the bad-luck is overcome and the women will trill joyfully with their tongues; if it drops to the ground, evil is foretold and forebodings as to the boy's fate at Ndapala are whispered round. He is given further medicine against the predicted evil, but lots will not again be cast about him. 881

881
533
539

Next the m'michila sings:

"Nanchachere mumbo, wanjoko nganawe, jisa ngumaje
"The one who scrapes hairs, (your) father is still living, come that I may shave thee, nanchachere mumbo, wanjoko nganawe!"
the one who scrapes hairs, (your) father is still living! (Chorus) "Jondi, jondi!"

Jondi is a word meaning "sticking up in all directions" and refers to the hair.

One assistant holds a pot of water, a second, a leaf of the mpembu tree, and the m'michila a razor. They approach the leader; water is rubbed on the forehead by the first assistant, the second smears the place with the leaf. The m'michila then removes a little tuft of hair from the boy's forehead and puts it in the boy's left palm, followed by the nail parings from the left hand, and a tuft of hair from the back of the head. This is done to each mwali in turn after which he sings:

"Twamaje lipalamandula!"
"Let us shave them" (ku-palamandula, to trim by shaving) as he walks round them, after which the boys go to their mothers who are allowed to trim the hair on the forehead in any way they like. This may take ten minutes, after which they return, still holding their hair and nails in their hands. As they return, the m'michila, thrusting his "tail" under the left arm, starts off, all the wali falling in behind him, and thus he leads the way into the bush accompanied only by the wali, singing:

"Kapili ka maolo amwali!"
"The Kapili snake the maolo tree amwali!"

He searches through the forest until he finds chikula, a small dome-shaped ant hill about a foot high. He carries his "tail" under his arm and a reed-buck's horn of medicine in his hand. Arrived at the chikula, he chips the top off the ant hill with the horn and his "tail," scoops a hole in the exposed surface with the horn, and then smears this hollow with medicine from the horn. The leader then approaches and drops his hair and nail parings little by little into the hole, followed by each mwali in turn; each immediately turns about and never looks back on the ant hill. When all have done so, the m'michila sets the top of the ant hill back into its place, having the "tail" and medicine horn in his axilla; he then turns about and becomes the last of the file as they march back to Lupanda while he sings the same song as before.

This particular ceremony is the most sacred of the Unyago as it is known only to the wali. It is the sign of burying the past of childhood. If another m'michila could find such 881 a place, he would take part of it and its contents and add to his own medicine "to make him a more powerful m'michila."

533 539 On the way back, the m'michila takes a piece of bamboo in his right hand and when he comes to a mjombo sapling, the boys all surround him in a ring; with the "tail" in his left hand he strikes the mjombo sapling, and as it rebounds, he strikes it with the bamboo; while the sapling swings backwards and forwards, he sings:

"Ngama	ngomana	mlasi	ni	mjombo!
"Striking	I have struck together	the bamboo	and	the mjombo tree!
halinolela'	amwali	halinolela!"
sharpen for yourself"

The m'michila takes both his "tails." Holding them in his left hand against the mjombo sapling, the bushy part of the tails uppermost, and in the other hand a stick smeared with beeswax, he rubs the sapling at a point just below the "tails," still singing the song given above. The stick is said to represent an axe. After this, he takes a real axe and cuts off the top of the sapling. Then all the boys seize the sapling and work the bark off without cutting it anywhere, while the m'michila continues to sing. The bark he puts in his armpit and sings as he jumps about:

"Tinjiguila	peyenja,	(lichenje)	chiguluka	guluka!"
"I shall fall	into the pit,		jumping about	here and there!"

When they arrive at Lupanda, the m'michila unseen goes to his own hut to make string from the bark, the boys to the place where Lupanda is made. This is at about three in the afternoon.

When the string is ready, the m'michila takes it to cross-roads, plaits it into necklaces, and anoints them with medicine for the wali. On his return to his own house, the mothers have cooked porridge for the boys, and the baskets of food are put ready at Lupanda. The m'michila then steps in and sings:

"Tolo	(nji)	winji	wana	amao, wosepe wakwagowilapa!"
"(A) little mouse (has)		many children,	mother,	all are to be fed!"

As he does so, he takes some food in his hand and puts it into the mouth of the leader, and so on all round, while all the people keep at a distance. Then with a hoe he makes a small mound where ching'unda-ng'unda will be erected and puts on it a little of the mbepesi from his house. Here he seats the leader and round him sit all the other wali. The m'michila then sings:

"Tinawule	chuma	changu	lolo kwakuja'ko	akwacangala	ngasauja!"
"I will take off	beads	my	today where they go to	it seems	they will never come back!"

[1] Kwula, to whet a knife.

He collects from the boys' necks the beads they are wearing, lifting them off with his medicine horn; these are all his perquisites, to be sent off to his house. He then starts singing: 881 533 539

"Nochilangola Lupanda apuma ngulungwa yalala jakusomapa, mchila!"
"The leader (of) Lupanda (is) an animal big worth killing with a spear, tail!"

This means to the leader's relatives that the boy is worth a spear; one is promptly brought and leaned against the leader; the m'michila steps up and taking it, bends the spearhead and sends it towards his house. He then sings:

"Njejeka nati kalungu kwejeka nati
"Things which are put to lean up against even little sugar cane to lean things up against even kapamba kwejeka!" little arrow!"

The relatives then bring all kinds of presents and lean them against the boys; these are the perquisites of the dancing men. The wali go away to eat now with their akamusi behind the shelters. The akamusi tie up any food that is left in leaves, for later use. They then return to the roughly-made ching'undang'unda where the m'michila meets them. The wali stand in a circle round him and outside them in a ring, the parents, while the leader is set on the ching'undang'unda mound.

The m'michila sings:

"Anamjati ndanga ya mto'po tapani ulandi, ankunga, ambiranja!"
"You of the buffalo hair (lit. feathers) on the head you put flour ankunga call me."

as he then goes around and touches each mwali with his "tail." The idea here is that the wali with flour on their foreheads resemble buffaloes which have white patches on their horns, and they will therefore be as strong as these beasts in the bush whither they are about to go.

The m'michila then runs away to his hut and breaking a hole through the back, makes for the bush. The assistants know this disappearance is the signal of his departure for Ndapala. This happens about four o'clock. All exclaim "Aaaah!"; (to exclaim thus is kwamira, "to exclaim with apprehension.") The assistants head off in the same direction, followed by the akamusi and their wali, while the mothers of the boys who may never see them again, throw sticks on the path as they run away as the sign of forgetting their sons for the time being. 881

All the men will also accompany the wali until they find the m'michila. He having left the chief's basket at Lupanda has brought some of the mbepesi with him in his own basket. One of the men brings a gourd full of water; the m'michila pours some of the water into his basket of flour and gives a drink of this first to the leader and then to each mwali

881 in turn. After drinking, they sit down while the m'michila gives instructions that here they sleep tonight. He takes his basket and starts to run back to Lupanda, singing:

[533 539]

"Ku	twajile	yaleleipa	achambuje	kutwajire	ku M'undal"
"Where	we went to		masters		to Munda!"

Then going to the back of his hut, he enters and takes a piece of bark left there bent up into a dish containing medicine which has been put in by an assistant. This assistant holds in his hand the neck of one of the fowls which was killed at Lupanda. The m'michila washes his face and chest with medicine to cleanse his eyes and then leans forward to the assistant and bites a piece off the neck of the fowl which the assistant holds out, and eats it. This is ku-lumira, "to taste a small piece," often the liver, before starting to eat the flesh; this is generally done by the most important person. The m'michila has been followed by his assistants who do as he has done. They all follow him next round the cooking place for the boys at Lupanda, each standing for a moment on the stones which have supported the cooking pots, while the women sit looking on sadly. He begins to dance and the women join in, singing likwata. He then calls the parents of the wali and leads them to where the bonfire was. There assembled, he tells them they must not bathe, and that tomorrow morning early, porridge is to be sent to the wali which must be prepared by a woman who has had connection with her husband and who has not washed her hands; this is supposed to make the boys strong. Early in the morning, the husband, who likewise has not washed his hands, carries the food to the wali and personally gives portions to each boy to eat.

881 304 When they have partaken of the food, the circumcision is performed by the m'michila who has returned the same morning early. The wali one by one, commencing with the leader, go forward a little to the place where the m'michila awaits them. Each mwali is accompanied by his mkamusi who commonly says, "Come along and you shall eat of the honey made by the bumblebee." Such honey is very sweet and called maoma. This refers in sarcastic terms to the pain the boy is about to undergo. The boy squats down, leaning back on his mkamusi who supports him, while the medicine-man, having warned the lad not to cry out, performs the circumcision with a small knife called chisondo. It is a triangu-
[412] lar knife with one cutting edge and a handle produced from the opposite corner. Properly the Yao method is, I believe, only to nick the free margin of the prepuce just to the right of the middle line near the frenum, but complete circumcision is now commonly practiced, possibly as the result of Swahili influence. In this case, the prepuce is seized and held by the fingers, and division made by a circular incision without using a clamp or forked stick.
[752] A dressing of charcoal and oil may be applied or medicine is chewed in the mouth and the saliva spat on the wound and the boy sent on to rest under some convenient tree.

881 When all the wali have been circumcised, they are gathered together in one place and the m'michila dividing them into groups, puts on the neck of the leader of each group a [755] necklace made of plaited bark from the mjombo tree:[1] these necklaces contain medicine against all evils - witchcraft, attack by lions, etc.

[1] Vide supra, p. 254.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

against all evils — witchcraft, attack by lions, etc. The akamusi then set about building 881 shelters in which the wali will remain during their term of instruction. According to the number of the wali so the number of places where shelters are built may vary from one, two or three, to as many as eight. Each of these places is called Ndapala. They may be many [346] miles apart and are so placed for the convenience of the mothers in various groups of villages who bring the food daily to the group of boys from those villages.

The boys when they originally left the village were wearing a large bark-cloth covering, with beads and calico, which latter articles have been taken by the m'michila and his assistants. At Ndapala they wear simply a loin-cloth of bark.

During their stay at Ndapala, the wali are given animal names by the akamusi who [553] carry on the instruction of the boys until their return to Lupanda, the m'michila having gone back to his village immediately after the circumcision. The names given to the boys are commonly names of beasts of prey such as Alikule (likule = the jackal), Achisuwi [551] (chisuwi = the leopard), etc.

Certain restrictions as to diet are laid upon the wali by the m'michila, e.g. no meat of 881 an animal killed by a beast of prey, no mudfish, likambale. He will not allow any villager 262 to visit Ndapala after seven P.M. and visitors may only be men who have been through the ceremony. An uncircumcised man is called wabalale, one who has not been to his Unyago.

Other restrictions as to foodstuffs may be made by the akamusi, generally in connection with the mythical origin of such food substances. A finger-shaped yam called lipeta is taboo, as it is said to have first sprung from the grave of a leper, the inference being obvious. After the Unyago, the boys have to undergo a special doctoring before they may partake of them. Bananas and rice are similarly refused them, the latter on account of a story to the effect that rice grew from the nostrils of a dead man, the idea doubtless having relation to the resemblance of rice grains to maggots. Fish is denied them by some masters of cere- [825] monies, as it is said to have originated from the diaper of a woman which she threw away while bathing.

Each m'michila may have special observances of his own. One near Zomba caused all cassava to be roasted in a certain way. Rows of pieces of cassava were placed in split [252] bamboo spits and so roasted before the fire in the manner of fish. If roasted in the ordinary way, the cassava would split and show the white floury material inside, signified by the verb ku-lapala. If this is eaten by the wali, it is said that the preputial wound would reopen.

The length of time spent at Ndapala varies from four weeks to as long as three or four 881 months. In the first place they must wait till the circumcision wounds of all are completely healed. Delay may be occasioned by complications having arisen in some cases. Again, permission to return may be withheld by the chief for some reason or other. Should one of the wali die at Ndapala, the body is buried out in the bush and nothing [766] is said to the parents until after the ceremonies are over and all have returned to the village.

881 During the period of seclusion at Ndagala, rigorous discipline is maintained among the boys, the day commencing with bathing in a stream whither the wali are driven before sunrise, a favorite form of punishment being to make the boy sit for hours in the cold water. Other disciplinary measures take the form of frequent beatings. At one Unyago I know of, there was a kind of mutiny among the boys. The akamusi from a nearby Unyago were called in and the boys received very severe "hidings" for their trouble.

For the entire time, the wali are occupied in receiving instruction given by their akamusi, on the discipline of manhood; they are taught native custom as applied to their relations with their fellows, an exacting code of etiquette to be observed to their elders, and the observances of married life. They learn to become proficient in the arts associated with their sex — the making of baskets, mats, traps, etc., the method of agriculture, drumming and dancing. They stay up late into the night listening to the stories of their tribal history.

Until such time as the circumcision wound is healed, each boy must cook his own food, after which food is brought ready cooked by his mother.

Posted in the bush a little way from the encampment are some of the boy's guardians, akamusi or alombwe (sing. mlombe) who act as pickets to warn off innocent or intentional intruders. They are armed with sticks, etc., and give pretty severe treatment to any inquisitive persons they catch. A visitor to Ndagala may be required by them to give visible evidence of not being mbalale. The mothers who come with food call from a distance, "Alomwe ndute!" Answer is made, "Atutulile tulye!" "Put down for us that we may eat."

881 When the chief decides that the time has come for the return from Ndagala, he sends 273 for the m'michila. Arrived in the village with medicine which he has collected, he is given millet by the mother of the leader from which the malt for beer making is to be prepared, also a cock and a hen and a pot. Into the pot he puts a tail feather from the cock and one from the hen, together with his medicine; then the millet, and water is poured on, after which he goes to Ndagala and shaves the heads of all the wali beginning with the leader and then returns to his own village. When the millet has sprouted, the woman takes it out to dry on a mat, and the two feathers and the packet of medicine are laid on the mat by its side. From this time, all the mothers are busy preparing malted grain for brewing beer, and, when it is ready, the m'michila is again called to the village. He orders the women to prepare for brewing, to bring firewood, their brewing pots, and stones to support them on the fire. These are all set round in a circle in the presence of the chief and headmen. Across the stones the m'michila lays his "tails" and on the firewood he sprinkles some medicine; the "tails" are then removed and the pots set on the fire. Commencing with the pots belonging to the mother of the leader, he acts similarly all round. The following day, he again visits the scene of the brewing. Putting his "tails" on the ground, he dips from each pot in turn and pretending to drink the sweetbeer from the dipper, he empties it into other pots carried by his assistants. From his own pots, he then empties

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

some sweetbeer into a big gourd. These his assistants will carry away, together with a hoe, to Lupanda, whither the m'michila now goes to remain while brewing goes on for four days. 881

During their stay at Lupanda, the m'michila and his assistants live on flour and chickens begged from the mothers of the wali. On the first day nothing is done; on the second day they begin making the Inyago or figures in relief of animals, etc., to be described later; Namungumi is made this day. On the third day the other figures are made and on the fourth day ching'undang'unda. Into the ground where ching'undang'unda is made, some of the strong beer, known as ngonga, which is added to the flour and water mixture on the fourth day as signified by ku-kolojela, is poured by the m'michila. 273

When the work at Lupanda is finished, the m'michila carrying his " tail " leads his assistants wearing their feather headdresses back to the chief's village singing:

"Ningalele	ukana	konga	akolojele	ku	musi,	mulungu	achamao!	[533
"I must go and see	beer	perhaps	they have mixed	at	the village,	ancestors	oh dear!	539]
Chilawile	chamajusi		ngalya	sona	ningawile	sala!"
The going out	of a day or two ago		if I had not taken	tobacco	I would have died of hunger!"

Arriving at the village where the brewing is going on, the m'michila takes a cup and putting his " tails " on the ground, he dips into the pot of beer belonging to the leader's mother, pours some on his " tail," and then drinks some. Then he puts more into a gourd, together with some medicine, and going up to the chief who sits in his verandah overlooking the brewing place, he kneels, and first drinking a little himself, he presents the drinking gourd of beer to the chief who drinks and then returns the cup to the m'michila who finishes it. Picking up his " tail," he then goes straight back to Lupanda while his assistants with some men nominated by the chief go round choosing pots of beer in turn. The assistants choose by striking a pot with a medicine-tail. These pots of beer are then put aside to cool, while moderate drinking begins in the chief's house. This takes place in the morning of the day on which the wali will return from Ndagala to Lupanda, and in the afternoon, the people from the villages will go out to Lupanda to take part in the return. The return is made about sunset.

The wali at Ndagala are put into their shelters and the doorways barricaded. At sunset or just after, the place is set on fire and the wali have to charge their way through the back of the shelters. They then form in line, wearing a slip of bark cloth round their loins and over this, a kind of kilt called magajawisa if made of frilled-out bark-cloth, or majenga if made of palm leaves. Accompanied by the akamusi, they proceed towards Lupanda, each carrying a stick of smouldering wood and an unlit torch of bark-cloth. 881 [297]

The burning of the huts at Ndagala has been the sign to the m'michila that the wali have left; he puts round his waist a bark cloth belt, chambo, and a calico sash round his chest with the ends hanging down behind and on his head he wears the liunga headdress made of the feathers of chiunga, the widow-bird. In each hand he carries the tail of gnu or zebra, held right end up, with the hollow end filled with " medicine." Thus arrayed, he goes out 881 533 539

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

861
533
539

along the path towards Ndapala, to meet the wali, accompanied by the drummers and all the women, singing:

"Makomba kwiwapala sala!"
"The lemurs down the stream!"

When he meets the wali, they all throw their lighted torches at him and he flees back to Lupanda. The wali continue their procession and are brought round to the still unlit bonfire known as chilanpali.

At the order of the m'michila, the fire is now lighted and the wali lie around it. The m'michila again appears with the drummers, and all the women and other villagers form a big circle round about. He sings:

"Chombolo chikwaeja mbeja, wandu'wa chikwajapapa!"
"The (ford) fire is now flaring up people these it is afraid of them!"

Dancing and singing then go on all night while the wali lie round the fire where they are allowed to sleep. As dawn approaches, the m'michila again sings:

"Chonde! Mwalira, amwali, Amsuse mwanache, mbule
"Please! it is crying, you girl, arrange the child, the girdle of beads round its waist wanache ukapaqua!"
lest there be exposure of the person!"

Amsuse: a woman carries her child bound to her back by a piece of cloth passing under her own arms and tied in front. If the cloth gets loose, she jogs the child up higher on her back as she rearranges the cloth; this is what is meant by amsuse.

The akamusi waken the wali as the m'michila sings:

"Kwambulira waka!"
"To nose after the scent!"

That is, he is looking about for the inyago. He then leads them off to nalumgumi, the whale, the first of the inyago.

I shall first go on with an account of Mlemala's practice to the end of the ceremony and then discuss the inyago in greater detail.

Arrived at nalumgumi, the m'michila sings;

"Nalumgumi nalitanda, nalumgumi asiwili kuchika!"
"The whale in the pool, the whale has blocked the ford!"

after which he straddles the head of the whale while one of his assistants does the same at the tail and thus sitting, they do a kind of wriggling dance, singing to the time marked by clapping of hands:

"Nalumgumi atundumula, ah! ah! (Repeat) Apalapala wate kundema; apalapala
"The whale showed his back above the water, eh! There it did fall me; there wate kunumba; Kwa, kwa, kwa, kwa!"
it did half break;"

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

The m'michila then gets off on the left side, his assistant on the right and they stand in the shallow depressions. The m'michila starts asking riddles; he says, "Ndawi (riddle)!" and is answered by his assistant "Jiicha (let it come)!" Here is one: 881 533 539

"Kanyere, kapile pasi!"
"The little mouse it has defecated, it has gone into the ground!"
Answer: "Michipa! (roots)!"

He then goes round the crowd for the answer — if they cannot guess, they say, "Ali asyene," "it is yourself (to answer)." There are hundreds of such riddles.

The m'michila points to the tusks depicted in the chinyago and tells the people, "Long ago this used to be an elephant; look at the tusks." The hump at its back he tells them is the same as ching'undang'unda which they will find farther along.

They pass next to mbunda, the zebra; a pair, male and female, is always figured.

"Ajiji nati mbunda ja mbuje Achilemala! Yoserpe yekoto!"
"This one is it not the zebra of Mister Mlemala! everything (is) beautiful!"

Sometimes a story is told to show that the zebra used to go to the sea to drink but seeing the whale, he ran away and came to the country of the python.

Then to sato, the python; he sings:

"Anasato kwajanji! yewe, eja! Yoserpe yekoto!"
"You python come and answer! all (is) beautiful!"

At the crocodile, nyoena, he sings:

"Chenyoena ulamba, yewe! eja! akugona mungulugulu mwei!"
"Mr Crocodile cleverness, he sleeps at the side of the water!"

At mwezi, the moon:

"Amwezi ulamba, yewe! eja, amaa!"
"You moon cleverness, !"

Next, they come to wakolele ukana, the people drunk with beer. Two men lie on the ground, feet to feet with nothing on; the pudenda are covered with bark-cloth and the whole of their bodies painted with earth and flour to look like two female figures in earth. The song is:

"Wakolele ukana: kumlole amwali, wakolele ukana!"
"Drunk with beer: come and see the women, drunk with beer!"

A moral is pointed: the disgrace to a woman who gets drunk, lies on the ground, and exposes her person. As the m'michila makes these remarks, the figures breathe stertorously as a drunken woman would. He conducts the wali and all the other people past many of the other images such as chiwi, nguku, ndomondo, mbale, etc., and only stays at those he considers his own special inyago. The seven specially dealt with by Mlemala were as above together with mbalapi, the sable antelope: [834 689]

881
533
539

"Anamkolapi akamba, pempe pakata!"
"You noble dancit, everything (is) lovely!"

Next comes ekombolo, the ferry. There is no image but two posts represent the ferry; the n'michila stands on one side of the two posts with his two assistants opposite him, one holding a bunch of leaves, the other a burning log: the first fans the log of the second, using leaves as bellows, while the n'michila sings:

"Ngumba, ngumba, kujikututa, ngumba!"
"The female pudenda, where it pushes itself!"

after which the usili one by one are pushed through between the two assistants. Chombolo signifies the passage from one part of the ceremony to another; here, from the isyago to ching'undang'unda. Ku-jombolo = to cross a stream.

As they reach ching'undang'unda the n'michila sings:

"Ching'undang'unda nahilombile jinguwe ngwe jakupochela wanlonche!"
"Ching'undang'unda I have marked out if it were calico distinctive of chiefs!"

One of his assistants is told to go and get a pot of beer. When it is brought he sings:

"Amusili, kamumbe, nawila kunyuma!"
"You girl, little fly, wash your hands behind you!"

881
533
539
608

This is the sign for the woman who volunteers for the service to the leader, to come forward, followed in turn, as each musili is dealt with, by other women. The woman stands back to back with her musili and they hold hands, while the n'michila comes and pours a little beer on their hands; they make movements as of washing the hands and then separate, the woman rejoining the crowd, the boy standing to one side until all have performed the rite. This woman ever afterwards is treated by the musili as his adopted sister. After this, each nikawusi takes his musili into the bush near by and holding the boy's cloth over the lad's head, he waits there for the boy's relatives to come and redeem him with fees. It is a point of honor that as many relatives as possible shall turn out to show that the boy is much liked, this being, of course, so much the better for the nikawusi who gets a present from each. The nikawusi then uncover the boys' faces and hand over the lads to their mothers who take them away to rest in the shelters.

The n'michila, meantime, has withdrawn to his hut, where all the relatives later collect; he then comes out holding his "tail," singing:

"Kwenda nkajoja ukwanonpere kupa!"
"Come and bathe those who love to bathe!"

Each adopted sister or woman guardian takes her musili brother on her back and carries him off to the stream to bathe. The woman sets her musili down on the bank and then leans across his back while the n'michila comes along and dipping his "tail" into the stream, sprinkles the boy on the chest with the water. Then the positions are reversed and the woman receives the "tail" on her chest, after which they plunge into the water and bathe, each pouring water over the other. The woman rubs the boy's back and he in turn shyly rubs the back of his woman guardian. Clothes are not removed. Everyone looks on.

While this is going on, the m'michila and his assistants build a kind of fence across the return road; as the people start back, he sings:

"Moto	wangu	akusuma	namupewa	wakumba masoka!"
"Fire	my	they are buying	I myself	they give me the spirits!"

that is "everyone has got to buy from me the gifts I myself have from the spirits." As each woman comes up carrying her mwali, the mother runs out and makes a payment to the m'michila so that her son may be allowed to pass. The boys are carried back to the shelters where they rest. The mother of the leader cooks food into which the m'michila puts medicine; he then gives some to each mwali to eat, after which they partake of the food prepared by their mothers, while the m'michila goes to the village for the beer drinking, returning in the afternoon. In the interval the dancing men dance chamba, etc.

Oil standing in separate basins on the ground has previously been prepared for anointing the wali. The m'michila takes each basin and passes it across the palm of his hand on which he has smeared medicine, each basin being set down on the ground again. Taking a stick, he smears it with medicine from his "tail," and he dips it into each basin. He then comes with his "tail" to detect any woman who may have had any sexual intercourse instead of remaining continent during the stay at Ndagala. He dips his "tail" into each basin of oil in turn and holds it up for the oil to run off. If the oil runs off in a stream, the mother as she stands behind her basin of oil is welcomed as a good mother; if the oil runs off drop by drop, "ndoli," the woman is laughed to scorn. Her basin is changed for that of another woman or her oil is thrown away and some from another basin is put in its place so that no harm shall result to the boy.

The akamusi then take the boys into the bush near by. The magajawisa dress is removed, the body anointed with the oil, and fresh bark-cloth dyed black is put on. Little bows and arrows are made of small branches and grass and with these the wali shoot as they again enter Lupanda, putting the bows down on ching'undang'unda to the trilling of all the women present.

Immediately after this, the return is made to the village, just after sunset, the women having been busy gathering up all their belongings, while the boys were being anointed.

Some of the assistants lead the procession, the wali following in single file, all much subdued and walking very slowly, dressed in the new bark-cloth round the loins, with many ropes of beads round the neck and body, a headband of bark, and down the back a string of beads to which is attached a tassel. Each carries in his hand a wand about five feet long, ngonge, with a pattern burned in the shaft and two rattles, masuse, affixed at the upper end.

[881] While the wali thus march solemnly along shaking their wands, the assistants begin singing:

"Ku	mlango	aiwiri!"
"To	the gate	they have shut!"

[533] [534] to which the wali reply:

"Kusowa	kuchupila!"
"There is no place where to pass!"

The m'michila remains at Lupanda till everyone else has left; he then sets fire to the shelters and leaving without looking back, runs to overtake the procession and then leads it on towards the village still at a slow pace, while all around is a yelling crowd of delighted mothers and other relatives and the assistants and drummers, all singing and shouting.

When the outskirts of the village are reached, the m'michila halts and waits for the chief to come out and give them permission to enter. The chief brings calico which unrolled on the ground measures the length of the procession of wali. Headed now by their leader, the wali walk over this calico, while the assistants roll it up behind them for the m'michila, as it is part of his payment. Flour may be brought him at the same time, carried by the chief's wives.

At an Unyago I witnessed at Kuminama's, the halt was called on the bank of a stream at the edge of the village where a bamboo arch had been erected. The arrival of Chief Malemya at this point with calico and flour was the sign for a demonstration by his young men who ran forward as if in battle, firing off blank rounds from old Tower muskets and executing a kind of war dance.

After the calico has been handed over, the chief returns to his kraal and the procession continues into the village, across the village open space to the fence round the chief's house. There, the wali enter by a gateway and disperse over the courtyard where they find [777] their sleeping-mats laid out ready for them by their mothers. The m'michila lays his "tail" on the leader's mat to bring good luck thenceforth. With Mlemala, there is no further part for the wali, but in some cases they are called upon by the chief to give an exhibition of their dancing and drumming. The wali sleep that night in the kraal and disperse the following day.

In the morning, the m'michila takes his "tail" and a stirring stick made from a millet stalk with the roots on it, and strikes the ground at points in a row in front of the chief's [223] house. Here the pots of beer which have been prepared are placed in rows, those chosen by the chief and those chosen by the m'michila, and drinking commences. The m'michila, before he joins in, takes the wali to an ash-heap in the village and there sprinkles them with [574] medicine from a grain-mortar after which they go with their akuwusi behind a house and change into new clothes. They then go and salute the chief by clapping their hands and depart to their villages, duly initiated and somewhat subdued by what they have been [553] through. Their new names as "men" may be given them by the akuwusi either at Lupanda OR after the return to the village.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

or after the return to the village. The boys often wear all their beadwork and new cloth for several days; after carrying their ngongo for a similar period, they give them up to their akamasi. Together they go into the bush where they break up their wands and put them either into a pit or in the forked branch of a tree. Before the m'michila leaves, he brings to the chief all his takings and these are divided between them.

Mention has been made above of the inyago and it now remains to consider these more fully. The figures vary in subject, in number and in arrangement. At the ceremony at Kuminama's, the following were arranged in a long line beginning with the whale and ending with the python before ching'undang'unga (Pl. X, fig. 2).

1. Nalumguni ..... the whale (Pl. XI, fig. 7).
2. Ngwena ..... the crocodile (Pl. XII, fig. 1).
3. Chiwi ..... the leopard (Pl. XII, fig. 3).
4. Mbunda ..... the zebra (Pl. X, fig. 6).
5. Ngaka ..... the scaly anteater (Pl. XII, fig. 2).
6. Ndomondo ..... the hippopotamus (Pl. XII, fig. 4).
7. Kanga (nakanga?) ..... (Pl. X, fig. 5).
8. Mbalapi ..... the sable antelope (Pl. XI, fig. 3).
9. Wakangwa wa akituwu-balala .... the woman dead in child-birth (Pl. XIII, fig. 2).
10. Lguwa ..... the sun (Pl. XI, fig. 4).
11. Lchokolo ..... the scorpion (Pl. XII, fig. 6).
12. Mbale ..... the plate (Pl. XI, fig. 6).
13. Lihamamba ..... a kind of cloth (Pl. XI, fig. 5).
14. Njasi ..... the lightning-lizard (Pl. XIII, fig. 4).
15. Sakata ..... the iguana (Pl. XII, fig. 5).
16. Mundu ..... the man (Pl. XIII, fig. 1).
17. Lipulwa ..... the wild pig (Pl. XI, fig. 1).
18. Sungula ..... the hare (Pl. XI, fig. 2).
19. Sato ..... the python (Pl. XIII, fig. 3).

Beside these, Nyasa, the lake, nearly always appears;[1] Mwesi, the moon, the drunken women, and certain animals may be represented, and in addition, chiuta, "the dwelling place of all the old spirits." Each particular m'michila has his favorite figures about which he sings, always commencing, however, with the whale.

Reproduced here is the series of inyago at Kuminama's village sketched at the time of my visit. It seems probable that originally the same set of figures was always reproduced. It is hard to trace their significance with any certainty. Natives aver that they are made only for instructional purposes. "The animals are made so that the boys may recognise them, while some of the other figures have reference to customs." They deny the more in-

[1] Cf. Stannus and Dapsy, 'The initiation ceremony for boys among the Yao of Nyasaland,' op. cit., Pl. III, fig. 2.

3: Stanmus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

778 gives an excellent idea of the average figure; it is circular in plan, often with a little hillock in the centre known as kutumbi kungupuli, "the hill of debt," and disposed in the quadrants are four depressions.

881 When the wuli are introduced to Chinguno, they stand round in a circle while the 778 m'michila stands in one of the depressions with perhaps two of his assistants in others.
533 The m'michila sings:
539 "Nyanu kungunguli chinungungile anamunku ninguwili kwilumbu, amai
"The lake enormous was I born child I would have died on the plain, mother!"
Ninguwili ninguwili"

or

"I have lived by the great lake all my life; I should have died in the plains."

while all three make movements as of paddling a canoe. The depressions are said to represent canoes. I believe this is the recognised form but I have also seen an oblong figure with two outlines of unmistakable canoes. Chinguno is usually found near nakungumi.

Chiuta, when represented, stands beyond mbunda. It consists of two trenches at right angles forming a cross, which are covered over with logs and earth and the whole outlined with flour in a decorative pattern. The end of one limb of the cross is left open and round this opening a screen of grass is made. As the wuli approach Chiuta, some of the assistants or akawusi descend into the trenches for the ceremony. The m'michila takes up his stand at the centre of the cross and sings:

"Chiuta, amai, kwalala chiuta!"
"Chiuta, mother, come see chiuta!"

881 Then as everyone says "Listen, listen!" crying is heard "coming out of the bowels of the 778 earth," followed by drumming and the singing of the chindimbo songs (sometimes mbunda or masche); a horn is sometimes heard as well as kulubula, trilling with the tongue against [775] the lips. Chiuta is called "the resting place of all departed spirits" and the sounds are said to be the echoes of their doings. The word is not met with elsewhere among the Yao, although it occurs in the Chinyanja and in other languages of this country with the meaning "the heavens."

Chiuta is said by Hetherwick[1] to be "a large fish that forms one of the pictures at the Ungupo," but I have never seen it or heard of it, and I am doubtful of the correctness of the statement.

778 Ching'wadang'wada: Dr. Davey's photograph[2] is an excellent reproduction of this figure, which consists of a mound of earth flattened on the top, and decorated with geometric [531] patterns in flour which extend to the ground. In the centre and at the four corners, so to speak, are implanted billets of wood with decorative lines and dots in black and red on the white wood (Pl. X, figs. 1, 2). The billets are three inches in diameter and project twelve to fifteen inches above the ground.

[1] Handbook of the Yao language, op. cit., p. 141. [2] Op. cit., Pl. III, fig. 2.

3:Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

The actual meaning of this figure it is very difficult to ascertain. It may be referred to as "the little hill of debt" signifying, I believe, an idea that everyone owes a debt to his Unyago, to his progenitors, and to his own future progeny. It is the spot where medicine has been buried to insure the Unyago success, and may be looked upon as the keystone of the ceremonies which take place at Lupanda. The derivation of the word is probably from ku-unga, "to heap up earth into a mound," or maybe from ku-unda, "to teach children manners," but it is uncertain as the word is variously spelled; the spelling I have given follows the pronunciation of the old people. 778

Lupanda: This consists of a mound of earth closely resembling ching'undang'unda in shape and decoration with similar wooden billets at the base, while on the top is often planted a branch from a tree (Pl. X, figs. 3, 4). The word is derived from the verb ku-panda, "to plant" and signifies the place which the m'wichila marks for the ceremonies to take place.

Reference has already been made to the assistants of the m'wichila. The chief assistant has been already mentioned; some three or four others who aid him are friends of the m'wichila from his own village. They participate at the essential moments of the ceremonies, singing, drumming, or dancing, and together with some of the akawusi, take part in chinta. Beside these, there are regular bands of trained drummers and dancers who attend Lupanda and dance in the village in the morning and at Lupanda in the afternoon of the day of return. They usually dance chewba and sunje. They are men who come for the fun of the thing and, of course, may gain a good deal from presents. On so important an occasion, there is much criticism of their performance. Should one of them not dance well enough to please the old people, they may call out, "Pluck off his feathers!" and the unlucky fellow has all his dancing kit and any clothes beside stripped off and he is driven forth naked, the laughing stock of the crowd. 881

Chiputa: The initiation ceremony for girls is on lines very similar to the boys' ceremony. The age at which the girls take part is from about ten to fourteen years, though lately they have been much younger on the whole, in consequence of the elder people's wishes that their children shall benefit from its instruction before they come under civilising influences and the recently introduced mission teaching.

When a number of girls have reached the proper age in a village or group of villages, as with the boys, the chief is approached and he arranges a date for the ceremony during the same season as Lupanda and for similar reasons.

The woman corresponding to the m'wichila who arranges everything is called mawusi. Each girl mwali about to be initiated is looked after by a woman, her akawusi.

The girls, their guardians, and the mistress of the ceremonies, together with the inhabitants of the villages adjourn, as in the case of Lupanda, to a spot some little distance from the main village, called Chiputa. Here grass shelters have been erected beforehand and food has been collected.

[88] The evening of the first day is called lyuwa lya mahunami, or "the day of singing," as singing is kept up far into the night, but the exact significance of the word kunami I have been unable to find out.

[515] The second day is spoken of as lyuwa lya manawa, "the day of washing of hands," (kunawa, "to wash the hands") when the wali are specially instructed as to the necessities of washing hands before preparing food, etc.; precept is followed by practice. The night is spent quietly; for this day's proceedings few people probably will have remained.

On the third day, however, they come back again from their villages in crowds to witness the performance of usama, lyuwa lya usama, "the day of house moving" (kusama, "to change one's abode, carrying goods and chattels with one"). A representation is given of an onslaught on a village by enemies and all pretend to run away carrying their worldly goods with them. The part of the attackers is played by a number of women who, armed with guns and having donned belts and powder horns, rush in on the crowd from the bush and make prisoners of all they can catch. The men are put in miniature slave-sticks; women who are seen trying to run off with a child on the back, one round the neck and one on each hip, are driven as prisoners into a group. When all the noise and fun are over, the prisoners are released. This is often followed by a mock trial. Two women dressed up to impersonate chiefs of rival tribes, argue an old, imaginary quarrel, usually pretending that there has been a raid by one party on an ivory caravan going to the coast, with stealing of the ivory, while the other party in revenge has caught and killed some of the people belonging to the first mentioned. The thing may be kept up for an hour with much talking and great zest, all those taking part being women. Finally each party agrees to give compensation for the damage done; each presents the other with bundles of sugar cane, and friendship is reestablished. That night, everyone again rests quietly.

The fourth day is known as lyuwa lya kusyunga (kusyunga, "to go round about," referring to the dancing which goes on). Dancing takes place during the day and also the ceremony of Lukusi to be referred to later. One of the favorite songs sung this day runs as follows:

[533 539] "Ndembe'ji wkamba'ganja ainde mwana mkongwe'ya, amai! ambosanga ugwajanamai!"
"(Tusk this) a present don't give me free wait for me little girl, dear me! and we'll have some fun together!"

On the fifth day, return is made to the villages. The girl wali attended constantly by their akamusi then live together for the period of instruction in huts in a special enclosure in the chief's village or in similar enclosures in a number of villages. The wali may go out into the village but must go about with bowed head and look no man in the face; they wear bark-cloth called liwiko and should they meet anyone, they must pull over their faces the [753] kind of hood with which their garments are provided. They may not share food with outsiders. If they did so, the latter would sicken with a disease called chiumbelu.

3: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

The uali thus remain for about a month under the care of their guardians, during which time they receive most valuable instruction as to their behavior to others, especially to their elders and to members of the opposite sex. Their faults are brought home to them and many little pieces of advice given. They are taught the household duties which will be their lot thenceforth and they are forewarned of approaching puberty and what it means to them. 881

During this period their child-names are not used and until their new names are assigned to them, they are called after birds and animals, generally some of the smaller animals, e.g. Anyingalwe (nyingalwe = the shrew rat), Alitawala (litawala = a big species of rat), Analyelye (nyalyelye = the shrew). I have been unable to ascertain whether these have any totemistic significance. [551]

The girls are usually given a fright to impress on them the danger of lions; one night an imitation of a lion approaching their enclosure is made when all is dark; then all of a sudden one of the ahawusi armed with big thorns instead of claws will spring upon one of the girls, generally picking out the worst behaved.

When the term of instruction is completed, they again adjourn to Chipulu for two days where Unyago is danced on the first night by women, on the second night by men. The first day is spent by a party of men and women in the bush, preparing figures of animals and their dress for the dance. The women wear a small garment of bark-cloth called matakapaiula, a word which literally means "buttocks of a frog" but which is used with the meaning of trousers and refers in this case to the fact that the bark-cloth is sewn round the upper part of each thigh into a garment like a pair of knickerbockers. Round the abdomen and chest are worn bands made of short pieces of small, decorticated millet stalks; similar bands are worn on the legs and arms, two on each thigh, two on the leg, one at the wrist, below the elbow, and one round the upper arm. In the dark these give the body the appearance of being painted in alternate bands of black and white. They also wear a head-dress of the same material. [292] [301]

On the first evening of the return to Chipulu, this party of women appears after dark; they dance in a row, advancing and retiring in step, swinging their arms and moving their bodies to exclamations of Bi-dil Bi-dil Other women dress up as men, wearing long beards made of likunga, a kind of fibre plant.

The second night, the representations of animals made of grass and bamboo framework supported by men appear, the elephant, the rhinoceros, and various antelopes being the common figures, also the zebra made of painted bark cloth. These animal figures are similar to the nisyao or ninyao of the Anyanja and to those of the Awisa,[1] but the sanchima is unknown among the Yao. [171]

During all these presentations at Chipulu, the uali seated on mats are the chief spectators and are duly frightened by the performances of the last two days.

[1] Stannus, 'Notes on some tribes of British Central Africa,' op. cit., p. 298.

3:Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

881 The following morning at dawn, each guardian washes her ward, anoints her from head to foot with oil and puts on her body new calico, ropes of beads being worn round the neck, and on the head a little bark-cloth cap fringed with beads called chiuula. At a given signal, each guardian picks up her ward on her shoulders and pretends to run away with her to her own village. This is the signal for the fathers of the girls to run up and redeem their children by making presents to the guardians. Each usuli is given her new name by her guardian, often the guardian's own or that of the girl's grandmother. The girls are then set down again, a procession is formed and all return to the village, with great rejoicing, as in the case of the boys. The girls then disperse and go back to live with their mothers or grandmothers. The usuli may be made to give an exhibition of their dancing; they dance chawda.

On the occasion of the first visit to Chiputu, as a kind of accessory, there is a ceremony for young married men which forms, as mentioned elsewhere, the second part of their initiation ceremonies or Unyago.

It is known as Kulukwi and is a kind of test of manhood. It was formerly considered as important as Lupanda, but now, I think, the last Kulukwi has been performed; for the young men of the present day, largely emancipated from chief-rule and freed from the ties of tribal custom, care less and less for their old method of up-bringing.

881 842 When Chiputu is about to take place, any young newly married men whose wives have not become pregnant are pressed to go to their second ceremony. The wife may ask some woman friend to act as his guardian or some woman may volunteer for the service. Often the young fellow will make pretence of not wanting to go; he may be chased and caught, and with his hands tied behind his back, wearing bark-cloth, he is conducted to the ceremony by other men.

Each young man is attended by a woman guardian and during the first visit to Chiputu, they sleep in two rows of grass sheds facing each other, the women in one line, the young men in the other line, each facing his woman guardian, with fires in the free-way between the two rows of huts. Or they may sleep in one big grass shed, each woman guardian next to the young man she attends, and so in pairs all down both sides of the grass shed, the fires being made in the middle. The young men have to pay for a share in the food and beer made for Chiputu, but each guardian cooks for her man.

On the afternoon of lyuwa lya kuzyunga, the young men are taken off to a place in the bush perhaps a quarter to one mile away from Chiputu, ku-lukwi " to lukwi " as is said.

Here they are formed into a semi-circle of from half a dozen to ten or twenty of them, each with his guardian and a crowd of the grown-up population from the village in attendance. Good advice is given them as to their behavior, especially in regard to their wives and mothers-in-law. Anyone who has any particularly bad trait is sure to hear of it now, the mother or father of the young man having arranged that it shall be brought up. The woman guardian shows to her man red and white beads in her hand and tells him that white indicates health while red means sickness, thereby pointing out to him their deep-rooted beliefs in the diseases associated with intercourse or association with women during menstruation. 881 842

3:Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

Then follows a test of manhood. The women guardians put little pieces of stick (lukwi = sticks or firewood) on their heads and sing: [533 539]

"Ngempe nkwempe lukwi kwa mnulu'chamuno lia!"
"I must give my wife (when sick) firewood of the mnulu although it gives lots of ashes!"

What is meant is that when his wife is ill, the husband should fetch the firewood even though he does not know which woods give least ash; the mnulu tree gives many ashes. The little piece of wood a few inches long with a notch in the middle is then handed to the young man by his guardian. He places it on the ground in front of him, kneels down, and with a small axe he attempts to divide the stick at the notch. If he is successful, he is greeted with cheers, clapping, and much rejoicing. By proving his power to hit straight, he has also established his manhood; it is prophesied that he will soon have children. Should he miss through nervousness, shouts of derision welcome him and his guardian shows her disgust with his performance. If he is a young fellow well-liked in his village, he may be allowed to make a second attempt. After this ceremony, each couple bathes each other in their shelters by pouring water over the head and body without removing the clothes, thus making brotherhood. Forever after the man must treat this woman with great respect, must not address her for some time, and then only after making her a small present.

The woman guardian picks up the two pieces of the broken lukwi and on the morning before they all leave Chiputu, the mother or sister of the young man gives her a string of red or white beads saying, "These are to bind up the bundle of wood." The man's guardian binds up the pieces of wood with the beads and gives it to her man. When they have returned to the village, they go to the young man's wife and he presents them to her. The guardian, however, steps in and slips off the beads which she keeps, while the wife, pleased at her husband's success, drops the two pieces of wood into the fire.

During the weeks that the girl wali remain under instruction in the village, those young men who have been ku-lukwi sleep in one big enclosure away from their wives and do not cohabit until after the second return from Chiputu is made.

Another ku-lukwi test sometimes, I believe, introduced into Yao ceremonies but really one practised by the Mpotola people and not proper to the Yao, is as follows: [177]

The guardian lies on the ground, wearing a small loin-cloth, and holding beads in her clenched hands, red in one, white in the other. Her man standing at her feet, bends over her and projects saliva on to her abdomen through a rolled up leaf held between his lips, at the same time choosing one of her hands. If he chooses the hand containing the white beads, he is hailed with delight as a man indeed, but should he choose the hand containing

3:Stannus D-5 (ca. 1912) 1922 FT7 Yao FT7

●881 842 the red beads, he is jeered at and laughed to scorn. In this case, the white beads are held to indicate semen, the red beads menstrual blood.

843 Lítiwo: This ceremony is enacted at the time when a young married woman quickens with her first child. Lítiwo (lu-tiwa, to plait) refers to the plaited cord put round the woman's neck. The woman and her husband both are present, and in addition, only women, possibly with their babies.

For the man, Lítiwo is looked upon as the third or completing ceremony of his Usapa. He must have been to Lupanda and Chipatu, otherwise he cannot be admitted to Lítiwo. If, however, the husband is not eligible, some other man who has completed his Usapa, is married, and has children, may act as proxy to a woman at Lítiwo.

In every district there is generally some woman who arranges and conducts the ceremony. She is called nakanga; naturally, no European has been present at Lítiwo but my information was gained from Kuliati, a woman who for years acted as nakanga in the villages round Makanya's kraal, and Chilandana, her old mother who had acted in the same capacity before her and who had come from the old Machinga country where her mother in turn had been a well-known nakanga. [115]

When a woman quickens with child for the first time, her women-folk visit the local nakanga, saying, "We are going to shave so and so (naming the woman) and to get bananas. Tomorrow, we start pounding flour. In three days we shall be ready, and you will come over to arrange things." At the appointed time, the nakanga having partaken of food early because she will not eat for the rest of the day, goes out of the village to some spot a half-mile away in the bush and there sees that all preparations are made and sufficient food collected. The food is supplied by the mothers of the man and woman, and consists essentially of beans (njawa and nguandi), porridge, sugar-cane, and bananas, but no beer.

All being ready, a procession in single file leaves the village for the appointed place, the woman's sponsor leading, the woman followed by the husband and his sponsor (a woman), and the married women assembled from nearby villages. The sponsor is known as nkawusi or alombwe. Neither nkawusi nor nakanga may have sexual relations with their husbands till after the birth of the child. The woman wears bark-cloth stained black, but may wear blue cloth on returning to the village, while her husband is decked out in his finest cloths and ornaments. They have partaken of food early in the day as they fast until the next day.

Arrived at the place, the man and woman take up their positions on mats separated from each other by some twenty or thirty paces, each with his nkawusi. The man's nkawusi sits on the same mat with him and never leaves him throughout the ceremony. The woman preserves a dignified quiet but the man is expected to make the most of himself sitting with hands on hips, and displaying his fine clothes worn after the fashion of a chief.

While all the assembled crowd of women sit round in a semi-circle, the nakanga commences the proceedings, singing a number of songs to the woman and the man in turn,

4: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1909)1910 FT7 Yao FT7 Maravi FR4

CIRCUMCISION AND INITIATION CEREMONIES.

Y 304 M [304] Circumcision was not practised among Anyanja. Among Amangoche, Machinga and Yao, the practice was known as Inyago wa lupanda.

Ku-umbala lupanda:—the prepuce was drawn forward and a nick made on the right side of the median line near the frenum. An application mixed with oil was applied. At the present time the Mohammedan practice is common Ku-umbala jando:—the prepuce is drawn forward through a split piece of bamboo and cut off with a sharp knife.

Circumcision is performed on boys usually at the age of nine to twelve years by a medicine man called Ngaliba, an honourable calling, in a hut at the Inyago camp. Both patient and operator stand, unless the former is young, when he sits. The ceremony is witnessed only by the boy's friend. Among Mohammedans clitoridectomy used to be performed by a woman operator (nakanga), but, it is said, was discontinued, on account of the heavy mortality, about seven years ago. At the time of the operation a woman was given medicine to make her vomit all unlawful things she might have eaten.

Y 304 ●881 Initiation ceremonies (including circumcision) take place at irregular intervals. The chief or headman settles the date at which the Inyago shall be held, generally once a year in July, when there is no work and little else to do. Boys who are considered ready will then take part. The elder brother or a friend of a boy settles whether he is ready for circumcision. The mother then takes a present to the chief. The boys, their friends and the medicine man then depart for the bush, sometimes a couple of miles away from the village. The number may vary from three or four to as many as thirty or forty. In the bush grass huts (= masai) are erected for their shelter. Food is brought by the mothers and deposited a little way from the camp, and the friends who have accompanied the boys fetch and carry and act as sentinels to prevent approach of any "outsiders." Six months used to be spent in the bush, now four to eight weeks only, and all the circumcision wounds must be healed by the time of the candidates' return. If a boy die, the mother is not informed, she is allowed to bring food each day; at the end when the return is made rejoicing she is told by one of the men.

The exit from the village is accompanied by the friends dancing Tanji or Masuwe, the boys in old calico (formerly always in bark cloth) walk and sit down on arrival at the place appointed. The circumcision is performed the following day; Y [867] during the time which follows instruction is given them on their duties in after life as men, in good behaviour in their married life, re coitus, eating of food, superstitions regarding salt, etc. When this is all over a message is sent to the village, and the youths, walking quietly dressed in new cloths, are met half-way by the women and girls, who dance and sing; after the return to the village there is Y 551 drinking and dancing, the newly initiated refraining for one day. At the present 881 time the youth probably has some "friend" of the opposite sex with whom he sleeps; [836] until he has had coitus he may not eat food into which salt has been put. His mother is very careful about this in preparing his food lest he die in consequence. He henceforth bears his man's name, and it is an insult to use his child's name again.

4: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1909) 1910 FT7 Yao FT7
Bemba FQ5

Initiation of girls takes place in much the same way, instruction being given by the old women. After initiation most girls wear a string of big blue beads round the neck. In some cases, where it is not convenient to go far into the bush, a patch of bush near the village may be selected, the approaches are carefully guarded, and pieces of calico on bamboos are used as flags to mark the place.

Namwali ceremony witnessed at Kasanka's village (Awisa tribe) August 30th, 1907:—A girl about fourteen years of age, well developed. Among the Awisa the initiation ceremony takes place when the girl has reached puberty and is ready to be married. Four days are spent by the candidate in a small grass hut built in the middle of the bwalo (= village open space), when instruction is given her in all her future duties by a woman who is her "friend," in this case a woman of about twenty-six years of age.

About mid-day of the fourth day she was brought into the bwalo wearing old calico round the waist, and with two friends, one on either side, danced a kind of shuffling step backwards and forwards to the time of four drums; it was witnessed by the women of the village, who occasionally joined in the dance. After this she retired, and later in the afternoon reappeared with blue calico from waist as far as knees, white calico tied round waist as a sash, a rope of blue beads round neck and under arms. On the head she wore an erection made of flour and water with a central crest into which were stuck little pieces of reed, lines of red were painted on the white ground as shown in sketch. Always supported by her "friend" or "sponsor," she again danced for a few minutes and then departed.

FIG. 1.

This night about twelve midnight Zingan was to be danced; all the evening and up till midnight a boy went round and round the village calling in a shrill voice warning none to approach. It was a very dark moonless night, and to the beating of seven drums (four small, two medium sized, one big) the Zingan came into the bwalo. One was an elephant 8 feet high with a man in each pair of legs—made of grass, trunk and tusks complete; the other, called an Nswala (a small antelope), resembled a dwarf jack-in-the-green more than anything else. The elephant pranced, the Nswala spun round and round; each was attended by a man with a 621 'In 1946 village A had about 30 huts in it. A certain man B was the son of the previous headman called A_1 and hence mother's brother's son or cross-cousin of the 622 present headman called A_2. B had two wives living patrilocally and while B was 578 serving in the Army he had a letter from one of his sisters (i.e. his mother's brother's daughter or cross-cousin to the headman) to say that A_2 was sleeping with B's wives.

684 When B returned he started making inquiries from his wives and he eventually secured a confession from them. B then went to a man called C, who stood in the relationship of mother's brother to the original A_1 and complained about the behaviour of the village headman. C also instituted inquiries and ascertained that it was true. C then approached a local headman of some standing (whom I shall call D) and asked him to arbitrate in the case. D pronounced A_2 guilty and awarded compensation of £6. 10*s*. to B. B, however, refused to take the money, and said that he wished to leave the village. D observed that he had every right to do this and that A_2 had no right to complain 'since he had broken the village himself'. B took his sorority-group, who occupied about twenty of the thirty huts, to a place about thirty miles away and set up a village of his own. The sorority-group of the village headman A_2 remained behind in the old village.'

This case illustrates the points that I have made. It shows how the two groups in this village stand opposed to each other in that B's sister wrote to tell him of A_2's conduct. Also when the village did break up it did so along certain very clear lines of genealogical relationship. Second, it illustrates the operation of the desire for dependants in that B refused what by Yao standards is a very large sum of money for compensation and preferred to move off and establish a village of his own. This attitude is also shown by the arbitrator who takes the point of view that regrettable as it is, the village must in the circumstances split, and while he appreciates the headman's feelings he makes it clear that the headman has no one to blame but himself. Third, it is interesting to note that this split took place after the death of the old village headman when the personal ties with both opposed groups were severed. Though the new village headman A_2 assumes the kinship terms of his predecessor and also calls the children of A_1 'children' yet in fact he is their cross-cousin while the old village headman was their father.

622 The position of the village headman in Yao social structure may be summarized thus: the village headman is the leader of a group which may be a simple kin-group
554 or a composite group of two or more opposed matrilineages linked to each other through himself or one of his predecessors whom he represents to them. The 621 numerical size of the village determines the status of the headman, but the size that it can reach is limited by an immanent instability in the kinship structure which is expressed, in terms of their status system, first, in the competition of brothers for the wardenship of the sorority-group, and second, in the competition between the headman and the wardens of the patrilineally linked sorority-groups, who wish to set up villages of their own.

621 The Yao see villages as units and this is clearly shown at the initiation ceremonies of boys, when the initiates are kept in grass-sheds, each partition of which refers to a
● 881 particular village. In the same way a person is identified as belonging to a particular village known by the name of the village headman. Thus a man might say: 'I come from Kumpumbe's village.'

Village headmen themselves are graded in importance and there are certain marks of rank which distinguish the more important headmen. We have already examined one of the most obvious ways in which the village headman's importance is judged, that is, by the number of people in his village. In addition there are other ways in which village headmen may be distinguished both from the common people and from less important headmen. Thus, for example, some of the more important village headmen have the right to conduct initiation ceremonies, this right being granted to them by the man who is in a way the most important village headman of all—the Chief. The right to hold a boys' initiation ceremony (lupanda) is of more importance than the right to hold a girls' initiation ceremony (ciputu). Yet another mark of rank is the right to wear a plain crimson band around the forehead (mlangali), this right also being granted by the Chief. 622 554 881

The Administration has recognized the more important village headmen and has entrusted to them certain duties. By no means all the people called 'village headmen' in this paper are recognized as such by the Administration, but I do not know of any person who has the right to wear a red band and is not also an Administrative village headman. 622 554

The status system has apparently been taken over from pre-European days, but it is uncertain to what extent these important village headmen had powers. Some to-day have all the marks of rank that the Chief has, i.e., they hold both boys' and girls' initiation ceremonies, are entitled to the special greeting accorded to important village headmen (subahu), wear a red band, have the right to be buried in the village and not in the common cemeteries, and to have their bodies prepared for interment by people of similar rank. It appears that such people exercised a certain amount of power, by reason of their personal qualities, over less powerful neighbours, and some were able in the past to demonstrate their autonomy by moving off to establish petty chiefdoms of their own.

Nowadays the Administrative village headmen have certain statutory duties to perform towards other minor groups actually independent but considered, for the purposes of the Administration, to belong to the village. The relative importance of the headman is still the deciding factor in such questions as determining who is to be called in to arbitrate in a case. Thus, though for Administrative purposes a small village may be considered to be a part of a larger Administrative village under an Administrative village headman, yet when a case for arbitration occurs within that smaller village, some other person than the Administrative village headman may be called in as arbitrator. 622 554 631 692

Laws promulgated by the Administration are conveyed through the Chief to the Administrative village headman and in this way a hierarchy of power is being introduced. The small village headman now sees the Administrative village headman as a representative of the Chief and the Administration. The Administrative village headman in turn sees the Chief in this light. But in matters directly affecting the Administration, the small village headman also sees the Administrative village headman as his own representative vis-à-vis the Chief and the Administration. 622 631

In general the village is by far the most important corporate body in the social organization of the Yao, not only as a significant primary group but also as an element 621 622

6: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1947) 1949 FT7 Yao FT7

IT SHOULD
162 be noted that only 27—11 per cent. of the whole sample of 246 women—had never
589 married and that 23, 80 per cent., of these (or 10 per cent. of the total) were under the age of 20 and therefore stood a good chance of yet marrying. Furthermore, 2 of the 4 women over 20 who had not married were known definitely to be incapable of marrying (one is insane and the other has violent epileptic fits).

There were 53 women who were divorcees or widows (21·5 per cent.), but it should be noted that 27 (or 11 per cent. of the 246 women) were over the age of 45 and therefore were past, or nearly past, the child-bearing period. Those in the younger age-groups stood good chances of remarrying. Table IV shows that though [586] the divorce rate is high[1] remarriage is common. By the time a woman's child-
[587] bearing period has ended she has been married on the average 1·7 times. Few marriages are contracted after child-bearing ceases.

TABLE IV. Marriages and Dissolutions of Marriage experienced by all Women over the Age of 13

162
586
587

Present age	No. of women	No. of marriages contracted	No. of divorces experienced	No. widowed	No. still married	No. of marriages per woman	No. of divorces per woman	No. of marriages per woman ended by death of husband	No. of marriages per woman still existing
13–20	43	22	1	..	21	0·49	0·02	0·00	0·46
20–30	79	104	36	4	64	1·32	0·45	0·05	0·81
30–45	70	121	50	16	55	1·73	0·71	0·23	0·79
Over 45	52	88	29	34	25	1·70	0·57	0·65	0·48
Total	246	335	116	54	165	1·36	0·47	0·22	0·67

842 These statistics, showing the early age of marriage, the early commencement of child-bearing, the high incidence of marriage among women, and the high rate of remarriage during the child-bearing period, all point to the high valuation of [182] reproduction reflected in Yao culture. This is consistent with their social structure,
[61] where the major corporate groups are kinship groups and reproduction is the principal method of recruitment to the group. Furthermore, because the standard of living is almost at subsistence level, children do not entail the economic losses
[593] they do in Western society. On the other hand, they are expected to support their [888] aged parents when they themselves are economically independent. In other words, there are few factors militating against reproduction and many in favour of it.

554 We may expect the beliefs and customs surrounding child-birth to reflect the value
884 of reproduction. For instance, the Yao distinguish clearly between women who have [182] borne children and those who have not. When a girl becomes pregnant for the [842] first time she undergoes a special ceremony (litiûo) attended only by women who
[843] have borne children. This ceremony has many of the features of a rite de passage and appears to mark the passing of the woman to a new social status. Furthermore, women are ascribed status according to the number of children they have borne. The word anwali signifies a young woman who has not yet borne a child; anwali

[1] Between a third and a half of the marriages contracted by women had been dissolved by divorce by the time that the child-bearing period had ended.

6: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1947) 1949 FT7 Yao FT7

ndembo, a woman who is pregnant for the first time;[1] kacembere, a woman who has one or two children; mjembere, a woman who has three or four children, and lastly, nkolwa, a woman who is past child-bearing age. 554 584

The information which I have been able to collect on abortifacients and contraceptives suggests that they are not used by married people merely to prevent their having more children, but that they are used by people who wish to avoid pregnancies which would be embarrassing, for example, by a woman whose husband is a labour migrant. To what extent the abortifacients and contraceptives are efficacious I cannot say; some, I know for certain, rely on a magical principle, for example, the medicated cord worn by a man during intercourse. On the other hand, the abortifacients taken orally may have some active ingredient. 842

A barren woman or an impotent man is regarded with some embarrassment and the marriage sureties (acinamangoswe) of a childless couple will go to considerable trouble and expense consulting diviners and leeches in an attempt to make their wards productive. Childless couples are regarded as not fully adult and are treated in a patronizing way by those who have borne children. Since a man may marry other wives, barrenness in a woman is a cause of sorrow to her husband, but is not in itself a ground for divorce. Where the man is impotent, however, the woman may divorce him on this ground, though she usually takes a paramour and forces her husband to an action for damages which automatically leads to a divorce because it is the usual practice in these cases for the court to ask the woman if she wants to be divorced from her husband. [885] [554] [586] [837] [694]

In contrast to the satisfaction shown at the birth of a child is the sense of awe evinced when a child is still-born or the woman miscarries. The Yao do not distinguish between still-births and abortions, both events being known by the word kwasanga. This is a verb and refers to the process of abortion; there is no term for the dead foetus itself. I made no attempt to enumerate miscarriages and still-births because they are supposed to be due to breaches of sexual taboos on the part of the husband and wife, and interviewees were naturally reluctant to mention them. Miscarriages and still-births are greatly feared, and the woman is considered to be in a very dangerous condition until she and her husband have carried out a ritual purification. Should a man have intercourse with a woman who has miscarried and not yet been purified he will contract a disease called lwaso which is believed to be invariably fatal. Still-born children or aborted foetuses are buried in a hole dug with sharpened sticks in the bush by the women, whereas children who are born alive and die afterwards are buried in the graveyard in graves dug by men with hoes. The burial spots of still-born babies or aborted foetuses are marked with a stone or broken pottery, since it is believed that to step on them will induce an illness. 845 [783] [753] [766]

The concern of the interested kin-groups is shown in the child-birth procedure. Birth normally takes place in a hut in the presence of the older female relatives of the woman and the female representatives of the man. The husband's representatives are necessary because the Yao, like many other Central African peoples, believe that an adulterine child will not be born to the woman unless she confesses (kupaca) the name of the genitor. If she persists in concealing the identity of the genitor, they 844

[1] ndembo = elephant, hence ivory. The terms litiño and ndembo here both refer to the ivory beads traditionally worn by the woman in the pregnancy initiation ceremony. [192] [301]

4: Stannus D-5 (ca. 1909) 1910 FT7 Yao FT7 Marovi FR4

case mawi might be administered; if adjudged guilty the accused would be burned on a pile of wood. M 695

Evidence is given without taking any oath; a false witness is not punished. M 696

Justice is occasionally summary. At Mponda's, after conviction of adultery with one of the chief's wives, a man's throat was cut on the spot. Drowning was the usual punishment with Mponda.

Punishments for all offences practically meant payment.

CUSTOMS, SALUTATIONS, ETC.

The correct salutation among Machinga Yao and Mañanja on meeting is clapping the hands, the hands in front of and at right angles to the body parallel to each other, thumbs against the fingers. The clapping should be continued for ten minutes after having passed; after passing a chief it should be continued for half-an-hour. M Y 576

Another form consists in slowly beating the breast with the right hand, the head slightly inclined forward. The lower in station makes salutation first to the higher, a man to a chief, a woman to a man; exception is made in the case of an old woman, who is saluted by the man. Scattered all over the country a raising of one or both arms is a common form of salutation, but is probably only a corruption of the military salute. M Y [554] [888]

Slapping of the nates or thigh with the right hand is also seen, among old men usually. In imploring mercy from, or on the first occasion of meeting, the chief, a man lies prone on the ground and catching the foot of the chief, puts it on his neck—a sign of absolute submission. Women kneel at the approach of a man. Words and expressions of salutation are few—Moyo (=heart) being the only old expression used. Now commonly one hears a word (sounding like mōnē) probably a corruption of good morning, and the Swahili greeting Sukuhri with the double hand-shake of Mohammedans. M Y [201] [562] [177]

A man returned to his village after an absence rests awhile, then his wife comes to him and kneeling greets him, moyo, her husband returning moyo.

Years ago, a man of any importance was received with firing of guns and shouting. A headman is received now with Ntungululu, the women wobbling their tongues in their mouths. Ashes are put on the head as a sign of joy. M Y [152]

In the morning the husband and wife do not greet each other, but in the village friends "give each other good morning" (=Moyo). On waking in the morning, a woman cracks all her joints (=Kulima chala). She then massages her husband and cracks the joints of his fingers. M Y [512] [576]

One man wishing to see another goes to his house, and squatting outside the door cries "Icho!" three times (=there), at the same time clapping his hands. If no answer be given he goes away, even though he knows the man is within, no answer meaning that the inmate does not wish to be seen. If invited to enter he does so, the man of the house rises and gives him salutation. He makes small M 574 576

6: Mitchell E-5 (1946-1947) 1949 FT7 Yao FT7

IT SHOULD
162 be noted that only 27—11 per cent. of the whole sample of 246 women—had never
589 married and that 23, 80 per cent., of these (or 10 per cent. of the total) were under the age of 20 and therefore stood a good chance of yet marrying. Furthermore, 2 of the 4 women over 20 who had not married were known definitely to be incapable of marrying (one is insane and the other has violent epileptic fits).

There were 53 women who were divorcees or widows (21·5 per cent.), but it should be noted that 27 (or 11 per cent. of the 246 women) were over the age of 45 and therefore were past, or nearly past, the child-bearing period. Those in the younger age-groups stood good chances of remarrying. Table IV shows that though [586] the divorce rate is high[1] remarriage is common. By the time a woman's child-
[587] bearing period has ended she has been married on the average 1·7 times. Few marriages are contracted after child-bearing ceases.

TABLE IV. Marriages and Dissolutions of Marriage experienced by all Women over the Age of 13

162
586
587

Present age	No. of women	No. of marriages contracted	No. of divorces experienced	No. widowed	No. still married	No. of marriages per woman	No. of divorces per woman	No. of marriages per woman ended by death of husband	No. of marriages per woman still existing
13–20	45	22	1	..	21	0·49	0·02	0·00	0·46
20–30	79	104	56	4	64	1·32	0·45	0·05	0·81
30–45	70	121	50	16	55	1·73	0·71	0·23	0·79
Over 45	52	88	29	34	25	1·70	0·57	0·65	0·48
Total	246	335	116	54	165	1·36	0·47	0·22	0·67

842 These statistics, showing the early age of marriage, the early commencement of child-bearing, the high incidence of marriage among women, and the high rate of remarriage during the child-bearing period, all point to the high valuation of [182] reproduction reflected in Yao culture. This is consistent with their social structure,
[61] where the major corporate groups are kinship groups and reproduction is the principal method of recruitment to the group. Furthermore, because the standard of living is almost at subsistence level, children do not entail the economic losses
[593] they do in Western society. On the other hand, they are expected to support their [888] aged parents when they themselves are economically independent. In other words, there are few factors militating against reproduction and many in favour of it.

554 We may expect the beliefs and customs surrounding child-birth to reflect the value
884 of reproduction. For instance, the Yao distinguish clearly between women who have [182] borne children and those who have not. When a girl becomes pregnant for the [842] first time she undergoes a special ceremony (litiśo) attended only by women who
[843] have borne children. This ceremony has many of the features of a rite de passage and appears to mark the passing of the woman to a new social status. Furthermore, women are ascribed status according to the number of children they have borne. The word anwali signifies a young woman who has not yet borne a child; anwali

[1] Between a third and a half of the marriages contracted by women had been dissolved by divorce by the time that the child-bearing period had ended.